and it is found in the special verdict that the defendant, "without having first procured a license therefor from the treasurer of the state of North Carolina, did hire six laborers in the county of New Hanover, in the state aforesaid, to be employed beyond the limits of the said state, and did solicit other laborers in said county to hire themselves to be so employed, and that the said defendant on the day aforesaid, and in the county aforesaid, was engaged in the business of hiring in the said county laborers to be employed beyond the limits of said state, and that the said county of New Hanover is east of the line, as at present established, and as so established on the 6th day of February, 1891, for the receiving of patients by the North Carolina Insane Asylum." The act referred to excludes, in express terms, from its operation, any of the counties in the state which are west of the said line, except a few, which are therein specifically named; and thus it appears that the same occupation may be lawfully and freely pursued in many of the counties of North Carolina, while in others a license fee of $1,000 is required to be paid into the state treasury, and its pursuit without such a license is denounced as a criminal offense and punishable by a fine of "not less than five hundred dollars and not more than five thousand dollars," or by imprisonment in the county jail "not less than four months, or confinement in the state prison at hard labor not exceeding two years for each and every offense, within the discretion of the court." It must be manifest from these provisions that the principle of uniformity is entirely disregarded, and that, if the act is to be considered as an exercise of the taxing power of the legislature, it must, under the repeated decisions of this court, be declared unconstitutional and void. Const. art. 5, § 3, authorizes the legislature to tax "trades, professions, franchises," etc.; and, although it is not expressly provided that such taxes shall be uniform, "yet," says Rodman, J., speaking for the court in Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119, "a tax not uniform, as properly understood, would be so inconsistent with natural justice, and with the intent which is apparent in the section of the constitution above cited, that it may be admitted that the collection of such a tax would be restricted as unconstitutional." In Worth v. Railroad Co., 89 N. C. 291, the principle just stated was distinctly recognized, and declared to be within the spirit and meaning of the fundamental law. Smith, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We should be reluctant to hold, if there were no question of constitutional right involved, that this method of levying taxes was sanctioned by our own constitution, and consistent with the equality and uniformity which it contemplates. The 'uniform rule' to be observed in the exercise of the taxing power seems so far applicable to the taxes imposed on trades, professions, etc., as to require that no discriminating tax be imposed upon persons pursuing the same vocation, while varying amounts may be assessed upon vocations or employments of different kinds." Again, in Pulitt v. Commissioners, 94 N. C. 709, it was said: "The principle of uniformity pervades the fundamental law; and while not, in the constitution, applied, in express terms, to the tax on trades, professions, etc., necessarily underlies the power of imposing such a tax." In this last case the court adopted the words of Miller, J., in the Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, "that while one tax may be imposed upon innkeepers, another upon ferries, and a still different tax on railroads, the taxation must be the same on each class; that is, the same tax upon all innkeepers, upon all ferries, and upon all railroads, in their respective classes, as taxable subjects." And again, in State v. Powell, 100 N. C. 525, 6 S. E. Rep. 424, the same language was accepted as a correct definition of "uniformity," and it was repeated "that uniformity, in its legal and proper sense, is inseparably incident to the power of taxation." The act under consideration, if intended to impose a tax, in the legal signification of the term, very plainly falls within the inhibition of the organic law, as interpreted so often by this court, for it cannot, with the least show of reason, be contended that the principle of uniformity is not violated when the same occupation is heavily taxed in one county, while in an adjoining county it is entirely free and untrammelled. It is too plain for argument that if the legislature had passed an act imposing a tax upon merchants doing business in the counties of New Hanover, Pender, and Bladen, while like merchants in the counties of Brunswick, Robeson, and Richmond were not required to pay such tax, the act would be void; and yet such a discrimination in taxation would be no greater than that which is attempted to be made under the statute in question. It is not very unusual in this country for the state, either directly, or through its various municipal corporations, to require the payment of a certain amount for the privilege of prosecuting one's profession or calling; and this is required, indiscriminately, of all kinds of occupations, whatever be their character,—whether harmful or innocent; whether the license is necessary to the protection of the public, or not. "While the courts are not uniform in the presentation of the grounds upon which the general requirement of a license for all kinds of employments may be justified, on one ground or another, the right to impose the license has been very generally recognized. Whatever refinements of reasoning may be indulged in, there are but two substantial phases to the imposition of a license tax on professions and occupations: It is either a license, strictly so called, imposed in the exercise of the ordinary police power of the state, or it is a tax laid in the exercise of the power of taxation." Tied. Lim. 101; Cooley, Tax'n, 403.

We have seen that under the latter view the law under consideration cannot be sustained, for the want of the uniformity required by the constitution; and this brings us to the other branch of the inquiry,—whether it can be upheld as a regulation under the police power of the state.

2. "The police of a state, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks, not only to preserve the public order, and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others." Cooley, Const. Lim. 704. "The power is very broad and comprehensive, and is exercised to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society. Its exercise, in extreme cases, is frequently justified by the maxim, 'salus populi suprema lex est.' It is used to regulate the use of property by enforcing the maxim, 'sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas;' and under it, the conduct of an individual, and the use of property, may be regulated so as to interfere to some extent with the freedom of the one, and the enjoyment of the other." In re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98; Tied. Lim. 1. This power, under our federal system of government, has been left with the states; and "the only limits to its exercise in the enactment of laws by their legislatures is that they shall not prove repugnant to the fundamental law, the state constitution, and the federal constitution, with the laws made under its delegated powers." State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 714, 10 S. E. Rep. 148; Cooley, Const. Lim. 574. In its fair and reasonable exercise, the legislature, by reason of the very nature of the power, is not restricted by constitutional provisions in reference to uniformity, as, says Judge Cooley, "the circumstances of a particular locality, or the prevailing public sentiment in that section of the state, may require or make acceptable different police regulations from those demanded in another. These discriminations are made constantly, and the fact that the laws are of local or special operation, only, is not supposed to render them obnoxious in principle." Cooley, Const. Lim. 480. This principle has been fully recognized in this state, and is illustrated by many decisions. In Intendant, etc., v. Sorrell, 1 Jones, (N. C.) 49, an ordinance of the city of Raleigh requiring, under penalty, oats to be weighed by the public weighmaster, before being offered for sale, was sustained as a valid police regulation. So, an ordinance forbidding the sale of fresh meat in the town of Durham, except at the market house, (State v. Pendergrass, 106 N. C. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1002,) and an act regulating the sale of seed cotton in certain counties of the state, were held to be a proper exercise of the police power. So, also, it may be stated, as a general principle, that all callings and professions which, by reason of their peculiar character, may directly or indirectly do harm to the public, are subject to police regulations, and a license may be required for their prosecution. On this principle, says Tiedman, (Lim. 101,) "attorneys, physicians, druggists, engineers, and other skilled workmen, may be required to procure a license which would certify to their fitness to pursue their respective callings, in which professional skill is most necessary, and in which the ignorance of the practitioner is likely to be productive of great harm to the public, and to individuals coming into business relations with them. So, also, the licensing of dramshops, greengroceries, hackmen, and the like, is justifiable, in order that these callings may be effectually brought within the police supervision, which is necessary to prevent the occupation becoming harmful to the public." It must not be understood, however, that the exercise of the police power is without limit. On the contrary, it is settled by abundant authority that, while it is for the legislature to determine what regulations are needed to protect the public health, and secure public comfort and safety, and its measures calculated and intended to accomplish these ends are generally within its discretion, and not the subject of judicial review, it is nevertheless true that this extensive authority must be exercised in subordination to those great principles of fundamental law which are designed for the protection of the liberty and the property of the citizen. "Liberty, in its broad sense, as understood in this country, means the right, not only of freedom from actual servitude, imprisonment, or restraint, but the right of one to use his faculties in all lawful ways, to live and work where he will, to earn his livelihood in any lawful calling, and to pursue any lawful trade or vocation." In re Jacobs, supra; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 17 N. E. Rep. 343. In Butchers' Union Slaughter-House Co. v. Crescent City Live-Stock Landing Co., 111 U. S. 746, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 632, Mr. Justice Field said "that among the inalienable rights, as proclaimed in the declaration of independence, is the right of men to pursue any lawful business or vocation in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others. * * * The right to pursue them without let or hindrance, except that which is applied to all persons of the same age, sex, and condition, is a distinguishing privilege of citizens of the United States, and an essential element of that freedom which they claim as their birth-right." In the same case, Mr. Justice Bradley said: "I hold that the liberty of pursuit, the right to follow any of the ordinary callings of life, is one of the privileges of a citizen, of which he cannot be deprived, without invading his right to liberty, within the meaning of the constitution." In Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, Andrews, J., remarked that a man's right to liberty includes "the right to exercise his faculties, and to follow a lawful vocation for the support of life." Judge Cooley says: "The general rule, undoubtedly, is that any person is at liberty to pursue any lawful calling, and to do so in his own way, not encroaching on the rights of others. It is not competent, therefore, to forbid any person or class of persons, whether citizens or resident aliens, offering their services in lawful business, or to subject others to penalties for employing them." These authorities are referred to for the purpose of showing that, under the mere guise of a police regulation, a person cannot be unduly restricted, or substantially prohibited, from pursuing a lawful occupation. In order to justify such legislation, the business must itself be of such a nature that its prosecution will do damage to the public, whatever may be the character and qualification of those who engage in it. Mr. Tiedman, in his very reliable work, (Lim. 290,) remarks: "In order to prohibit the prosecution of a trade altogether, the injury to the public, which furnishes the justification for such a law, must proceed from the inherent character of the business. * * * But, if the business is not inherently harmful, the prosecution of it cannot rightfully be prohibited to one who will conduct the business in a proper and circumspect manner. Such an one would be 'deprived of his liberty' without due process of law." It is on the ground of their inherently harmful and dangerous character that the keeping of gaming tables or the selling of intoxicating liquor, or other things of a demoralizing nature, may be absolutely prohibited. Mugler v. State of Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; State v. Joyner, 81 N. C. 534. This may be, and is often, directly accomplished by legislation, which, in its terms, is expressly prohibitory, instead of the circuitous method of imposing a burden in the nature of a license as a police regulation, which is difficult or impossible to be borne, and which, in the end, may make the occupation unprofitable. Cooley, Tax'n, 404.

It must be apparent from an examination of the statute in question that the occupation of an "emigrant agent," as defined therein, does not belong to that class which is so inherently harmful or dangerous to the public that it may, either directly or indirectly, be restricted or prohibited. The statute defines the said occupation "to mean any person engaged in hiring laborers in this state to be employed beyond the limits of the same." It cannot be seriously contended that a laborer, under our system of government, as indicated by the unquestionable authorities to which we have referred, does not possess the right of hiring his services to any one, either within or without the state; and, if he may do this, we are unable to see, as we have just remarked, how an agent or other person engaged in hiring him to be employed without the state can be considered as following an occupation which, in itself, is inherently dangerous or harmful, in the sense above mentioned. Indeed, this position is fully conceded by the attorney general, and we will now consider whether the license imposed by the act is restrictive or prohibitory in its character.

While the probable harm and inconvenience of immigration, to the public, may not be averted by such legislation, it is of the greatest importance to all of the citizens of the state that the inexperienced and artless laborer may not be imposed upon by the false representations and other fraudulent practices of an emigrant agent; and it is one of the highest duties imposed upon the lawmakers to prevent such abuses by prescribing rigid and appropriate regulations, under which the said occupation can alone be followed. Regulations of this nature may be made in a variety of ways, but that which is most commonly adopted is the requirement of a license fee, which is exacted for the purpose of defraying the probable expenses of ascertaining the moral and other qualifications of the proposed licensee, and the proper inspection or other necessary police supervision under which the particular business is to be conducted. While the means adopted must have a relation to the accomplishment of these ends, it is not absolutely necessary, in all cases, that the law or ordinance imposing the license should prescribe any specific regulation, and it is sufficient if the court can see that the fee exacted is a reasonable proportion of the necessary expenses incident to the general police supervision. The entire absence, however, of any regulation or of any police supervision whatever is a powerful aid (and especially where the amount exacted is very large) in determining whether the license is not really a disguised species of taxation, or an indirect method of unduly restricting or prohibiting the business altogether. In this case, however, we have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that the act in question is not, and was not intended as, a mere regulation, but its object was either to tax or to restrict or prohibit the particular occupation mentioned therein. This is evident from the fact that it does not contain any of the features of a police regulation, nor is it connected in any way with any police supervision. No provision whatever is made for the ascertainment of the moral character or other qualities of the applicant. The statute provides that "any person shall be entitled to a license" upon the payment of the prescribed fee, and therefore the vilest impostor may demand a license, and the treasurer has no discretion to withhold it. Neither are there any regulations as to the manner in which the business is to be carried on, and the licensee is left entirely unrestrained, except so far as he may be amenable to the general law. Even if there were such regulations, there is an utter absence of any provision for an inspector, or other officer whose duty it is to enforce them. The general scope and tendency of the act, in connection with the exaction of the very large license fee, induce us to believe that, viewed as a police regulation, it is so far restrictive and prohibitory as to contravene those fundamental principles we have enunciated, and which are intended to protect the citizen in the pursuit of an occupation not inherently dangerous or harmful to the public. It may be regulated, but it cannot be indirectly prohibited, by an exercise of the police power. Whatever doubt, however, that may possibly remain as to the validity of the act as a police regulation may be dissipated when we consider the reasonableness of the amount required for the license. We have already adverted to this principle, and will refer to some of the many authorities upon the subject. In Cooley on Taxation, (page 408,) it is said: "Where the grant is not made for revenue, but for regulation, a much narrower construction is to be applied. A fee for the license may be exacted, but it must be such a fee, only, as will legitimately assist in the regulation; and it should not exceed the necessary or probable expense of issuing the license, and of inspecting and regulating the business which it covers." In Tied. Lim. 274, it is said that, "in the regulation of occupations, it is constitutional to require those who apply for a license to pay a reasonable sum to defray the expenses of issuing the license, and maintaining the police supervision." The principle has been emphatically recognized by this court in State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554. In that case it appeared that the town of Salisbury, had under its charter, the authority to regulate the manner in which provisions might be sold in its "streets and markets," and to enforce such regulations by appropriate penalties, etc. The ordinance provided that "no butcher or other person shall cut up and expose to sale any fresh meats within the limits of Salisbury without first obtaining a license from the commissioners of the town, which license shall authorize the person or persons to sell meat at a certain stand, shop or stall specified in said license, to be used as a market, and for which license said person shall pay the sum of $3.00 per month payable in advance." The court held that as the subjects of taxation were enumerated in the charter, and as the occupation of selling meat by butchers was not included therein, the town had no right to impose a tax upon that particular occupation; and, when it was urged that the license fee could be sustained as a regulation under the police power, it was held that it was not a police regulation, but a tax. The opinion was based upon the unreasonableness of the amount required for the license. The court (Ashe, J.) said: "There are authorities to be found to the effect that, under the police power, license may be granted for the exercise of particular avocations and employments, but in all such cases it is held that the fee or price exacted for the privilege must not be with a view to revenue; and in such cases it is competent and proper for the courts, where the effect and purpose of an ordinance are brought to be reviewed by them, to see that the fee or price paid for the privilege of exercising the franchise is reasonable, and not for the purpose of raising revenue. Desty, Tax'n, 306. And to the like effect is State v. Mayor, etc., of Hoboken, 33 N. J. Law, 280." The court then proceeded to quote Dill. Mun. Corp. 357, to the effect that, in the case of a license under the police power, only "a reasonable fee for the license, and the labor attending its issue, may be charged." Several cases were cited to show that, because of the unreasonable amount exacted for a license, its imposition was considered as an exercise of the taxing, and not of the police, power. The authorities are abundant in support of the proposition, but its correctness is so fully established that it is hardly necessary to reproduce them in this opinion. We will refer, however, by way of further illustration, to the instructive case of St. Paul v. Traeger, 25 Minn. 248. The city of St. Paul had, by ordinance, required a license fee of $25 for every huckster of vegetables who plied his trade in the streets of the city. In determining whether this was a license or a tax, the court, in the course of the discussion, said: "It cannot be claimed that it was enacted in the exercise of any police power, for sanitary purposes, or for the preservation of good order, peace, or quiet of the city, because, neither upon its face, nor upon any evidence before us, does it appear that any provision is made for inspection, etc. * * * The annual sum exacted for the license is manifestly much in excess of what is necessary or reasonable to cover expenses incident to its issue. * * * No regulations being prescribed in reference to its prosecution under the license, there could be little, if any, occasion for the exercise of any police authority in supervising the business, or enforcing the ordinance, and no cause for any considerable expense on that account." The court held that the ordinance was not a police regulation. Inasmuch as a license fee must be prescribed in advance, and in many instances it cannot be determined with accuracy what the expenses incident to the regulation may be, the courts are not inclined to be too exact in placing an estimate upon them, so long as the sum demanded is not altogether unreasonable. But we have no difficulty in holding, in the present case, that the amount of $1,000, to be paid in each county in which the occupation is pursued, is enormously in excess of the probable expenses incident to the regulation. We have seen that in fact there is no regulation at all, and therefore no expense, except the insignificant amount necessary to defray the cost of simply issuing a license. If a license fee of $3 per month was held excessive in State v. Bean, supra, where very many of the elements of a police regulation were present, what shall we say of the license fee of $1,000 in this case, in which there is virtually no expense, and where there is not a single feature which indicates any police regulation whatever?

As the questions discussed are of much importance, and especially because they involve the constitutionality of an act of the legislature, we have been somewhat elaborate in the expression of our views. Entirely mindful of that most salutary principle that no court should declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional, unless it is plainly so, and deeply conscious, as we are, of the profound responsibility imposed upon those whose province it is to exercise so delicate a duty, we cannot hesitate in deciding that the act under examination is incapable of being sustained, in any point of view. Considered as a tax, (and this, we think, is its true character,) it is void for want of uniformity; and, considered as an exercise of the police power, it is likewise void, because of its restrictive or prohibitory character, as well as the unreasonable amount exacted as a license fee. Affirmed.

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—DEVISEES—ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN.

Testatrix devised property to her daughter, "free from the control * * * of her husband, * * * for and during her life, and at her death to all the children of her body, share and share alike." At the time the will was made, the daughter had two children living, by a deceased husband, and was living with a man who had an undivorced wife living, but to whom she was married, and by whom she then had four children. Testatrix also lived with her daughter. Held, that the word "children," in said will, included the daughter's illegitimate children, born both before and after the will was made, by the man with whom she was living as his wife when the will was made.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; H. R. Bryan, Judge.

Action of partition by Ollin Sullivan and others against H. E. Parker and wife. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The parties to this proceeding agree upon the following statement of facts: "(1) That Ann Garvey, at the time of her death, was seized in fee simple, and in possession, of the following described tract or parcel of land in North Carolina, Duplin county, and Kenansville township, lying on the west side of the Northeast river, and on Horse branch, adjoining the Dobson lands, the lands of Josephine Farrior and others, bounded as follows: Beginning," etc., — "containing 135 acres, more or less, which said land passed under the third item of the will of Ann Garvey, and which said will was executed on the 2d day of August, 1872, and duly probated and recorded on the 7th day of September, 1872, and which said will, marked 'A.' is hereto attached, and made a part of this statement of facts. (2) That said Ann Garvey died between the 2d day of August, 1872, and the 7th day of September, 1872; that, at the time of the execution of her will, she was living in a house on the said lands with her daughter, Martha J. Bostick, who was living there with one Samuel T. Bostick, under the relations hereinafter set out. (3) That at the time of the execution of the said will the defendant Charity C. Bostick, (now Parker,) and her brother H. T. Bostick, and all the plaintiffs except Dorothy W. Bostick and Marshall E. Bostick, were born and alive; that the plaintiffs, excepting O. L. Sullivan, the husband of one, are the offspring of the said Martha J. Bostick by the said S. T. Bostick. (4) That about the year 1854 the said S. T. Bostick duly intermarried in the county of Duplin with one Barbara Merritt, with whom he lived for about a year, when she left him, and resided in the county of New Hanover the greater part of the time till 1885, but resided part of the time in Charleston, S. C.; that S. T. Bostick never saw the said Barbara after she left him, but all the while had information that she was residing sometimes in New Hanover county, and sometimes in Charleston, S. C.; that about the year 1885 or 1886 the said Barbara came back to the county of Duplin, and died here about the year 1889 or 1890, in the poorhouse; that no divorce was ever granted between the said S. T. Bostick and Barbara Bostick, so far as the records of this county show. (5) That about the year 1859 the said Martha Jane (Garvey) duly intermarried in Duplin county with one Joseph Bostick, by whom she had two children, the defendant Charity C. Parker and one H. T. Bostick, now living in the state of Georgia; that said Joseph Bostick died in the Confederate army about the year 1862. (6) That in March, 1866, in the county of Duplin, a justice of the peace, having a license for the purpose, went through the legal form of solemnizing a marriage between the said S. T. Bostick and the said Martha J. Bostick. (8) That the said S. T. Bostick and Martha J. Bostick lived together under these relations until the death of Martha J. Bostick, in November, 1891; that about the year 1868 the said S. T. Bostick was convicted of fornication and adultery in living with the said Martha Jane Bostick."

A. D. Ward and W. R. Allen for appellants. H. R. Kornegay, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The third item of the will of Ann Garvey is as follows: "I will and devise all the balance of the estate of which I may die seised and possessed, or to which I am lawful owner, unto my daughter, Martha Jane Bostick, for and during her natural life, to have, hold, and enjoy the same free from the control, management, or contracts of her husband, or any other person, for and during her life, and at her death to all the children of her body, share and share alike, and their heirs, forever." In Howell v. Tyler, 91 N. C. 207, Chief Justice Smith, discussing the case of Thompson v. McDonald, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 463, says: "It is not necessary to question the correctness of this rigid rule of testamentary interpretation, which seems to ignore to some extent the inquiry as to what the testator intended in using the word, since there was nothing in that case to explain the sense of the testator, or to qualify the legal principle that such children have no parent, and cannot be designated by a relation they do not sustain." The "rigid rule" of which he was there speaking was that where there was a bequest to two sisters, (naming them,) with a limitation over if either "should die without a child or children living at her death," the word "children" was to be understood to mean legitimate children. And he proceeds to say that "a more general and fundamental rule, underlying all others, is to look at the whole instrument in the light of the surrounding circumstances when it is made, and see, if we can, in what sense the testator used the word, for his intent must prevail over any legal mode of construing it, where there is no antagonism." Apply this fundamental rule to the will now before us. The words used are themselves significant,—“all the children of her body.” At the time these words were written to express the intention of the testatrix, there had been born of the body of her daughter two children by a former marriage, who are the defendants and appellants, and four children, who are plaintiffs, and who were the result of that cohabitation between her and S. T. Bostick, the illegality of which is set out in the agreed facts. The testatrix, at the time she executed the will, was living in the house with her daughter and this man, towards whom that daughter stood in the relation of a wife in fact, if not in law. An officer of the law, under a duly-issued license, had solemnized a marriage between them. She speaks in the will of the husband of her daughter, evidently meaning this man, to whom she no doubt considered her daughter lawfully united. Considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances when it was made, we must conclude that there should not be applied to the interpretation of this will that rigid rule, of the correctness of which Chief Justice Smith seems to intimate a doubt; having in mind, perhaps, what had been said by Judge Battle in Fairly v. Priest, 56 N. C. 383, in relation to the effect of the act (Rev. Code, c. 64, § 5) to legitimate a child, as to its mother, and to make offspring, that at common law was cruelly called nobody's child, the heir, and in law, as well as in fact, the child of the mother that bore it. Or, to speak perhaps more accurately, the rule itself does not establish the defendants' contention, for under it the word "children," prima facie, means only legitimate issue. Kirkpatrick v. Rogers, 41 N. C. 130. And here we have, in the will itself, considered in connection with all the circumstances that we are allowed to call to our aid, or in our search for that all-important fact, (the intent of the testatrix,) more than enough to rebut this prima facie case against these plaintiffs who were born before the death of the testatrix. Having concluded, for the reasons stated above, that those four of the plaintiffs who were in esse at the death of the testatrix are entitled, notwithstanding their illegitimacy, to be considered as included in the words, "all the children of her body," we think there can be found no good cause to stop short of the further conclusion that those children, the other two plaintiffs, who, after the death of the testatrix, were born of that cohabitation which has been spoken of, should also be so included. The words are comprehensive.—“all the children of her body.” This interpretation does, then, no violence, and is consonant with reason and justice. It effectuates what we believe to have been the true intent of the testatrix. Affirmed.

JONES v. RICE.

CHARGES ON WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE.

1. On the presumption that the common law prevails in North Carolina, unaltered by statute, as to the rights and powers of a married woman to charge her separate estate, a mortgage upon her land, executed by her to secure the payment of a debt created for the benefit of her husband, would be valid, it not appearing that there was any restriction upon her power of disposition imposed by the terms of any settlement, or other conveyance under which her property was held. If, while her land was incumbered with such mortgage, she, desiring to exchange the same for other land, in order to facilitate this object procured a stranger to advance money or property in part discharge of the mortgage lien, and gave to him her promissory note for the amount, this note being executed and delivered in North Carolina, and afterwards she removed to the state of Georgia, and here executed other promissory notes in renewal of the one so given in North Carolina, the renewal notes are not without consideration moving to her, but are valid and binding upon her separate estate here, their real consideration being the benefit which she derived from the advance made by the payee to disincumber her land in North Carolina.

2. There was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Towns county; C. J. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by J. M. Rice against M. A. Jones to recover on promissory notes. Plaintiff had judgment, and a new trial was denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. F. Underwood & Son and J. J. Kimsey, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Pickrell, M. G. Blackwell, and Howard Thompson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. Nothing appearing to the contrary, we may presume that the common law prevails in the state of North Carolina, unaltered by statute, as to the rights and powers of a married woman to charge her separate estate. The common law disabled her to charge herself personally by any contract for the payment of money. No judgment against her could be recovered on such a contract, but she had capacity to charge her separate estate by her contract, whether that estate received the benefit or consideration of the debt with which she incumbered it or not. In order to charge it for anything which was not directly beneficial to it, it was necessary that she should manifest her intention so to do, and mortgaging or pledging her separate estate for the payment of the debt of another was a sufficient manifestation of such intention. That law did not disable her from binding her separate estate for the payment of her husband's debt. Prior to the adoption of the Code she could in this state, if unrestrained by the instrument creating her separate estate, secure her husband's debt in this manner. Carmichael v. Walters, 33 Ga. 316. It was the Code that attached this new disability to her former disabilities. No similar legislation by the state of North Carolina was proved on the trial of this case. We take it, therefore, that in that state a mortgage by a married woman to secure the debt of her husband would be valid and enforceable. In this case the jury could find from the evidence that Mrs. Jones had incumbered her land situate in North Carolina with such a mortgage, and, desiring to exchange the same for other land situated in this state, she procured Rice, the plaintiff below, to advance a promissory note which he held upon McLeod, the owner of the incumbrance, for that purpose, she giving Rice her promissory note for the amount so advanced; that she afterwards removed to this state, and here executed other promissory notes in renewal of the first. If this was so, these renewal notes were not given for the debt of her husband, the real consideration of them being the benefit which she derived from the advance made by Rice to disincumber her land in North Carolina. This consideration moved to her, and not to her husband. Of course, if it was lawful in North Carolina for her to incumber her property as security for her husband's debt, it was lawful for her to pay that debt, and, if her separate estate was relieved from the incumbrance by the money or property which Rice advanced in North Carolina, that estate was benefited by the advance; and though the original note given in North Carolina might not have bound Mrs. Jones personally, yet the notes given here in renewal of that would bind her personally, for in the present state of our law a married woman may bind herself personally by promissory notes, the consideration of which is a benefit to herself or to her separate estate. These notes were executed in November, 1890, and are the basis of the present action. The request on which Rice acted in advancing the McLeod note upon the mortgage was made by Jones, and not directly by Mrs. Jones; but the jury could infer that her husband preferred the request for her interest and at her instance, inasmuch as she shortly thereafter gave to Rice her promissory note for the amount, and in that note, as Rice testified, bound the Georgia land for its payment, and agreed that, if this mode of binding it was not sufficient, she would give a mortgage or any other kind of paper to accomplish the purpose. Rice parted with the McLeod note by surrendering it to McLeod according to the arrangement; and though it is contended that the amount of that note was not in fact deducted from McLeod's claim against Jones, but that that claim, with others embraced in the incumbrance, was paid off chiefly by another Jones, the brother of Mrs. Jones' husband, yet there are circumstances from which the jury might have inferred the contrary; and inasmuch as Rice advanced the McLeod note as he was requested to do, and Mrs. Jones recognized this advancement by giving her note for the amount, the jury might have concluded that it was her business to see to the application of the McLeod note, and not the business of Rice. Moreover, they could conclude from her executing, after coming to Georgia, the notes in suit in renewal of her first note, that this was an admission on her part that she had obtained the benefit of Rice's advance. Some of the instructions complained of in the charge of the court are not accurate, but they were not calculated to mislead the jury, as against Mrs. Jones, on the real merits of the case. One or two of them may have been misleading as against Rice, the plaintiff.

2. The evidence was in some respects directly conflicting, and the verdict ought to have depended on whether the jury gave full credit to the testimony of Rice, the plaintiff. Doubtless they did so, for they found in his favor. Taking his testimony as true, and looking to the circumstances tending to support his theory of the case, the verdict was correct, and there was no error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

PRITCHETT v. STATE.

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE—POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS—FORCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The fact that the door of a house was usually kept locked at night is some evidence that it was locked on a particular night, there being nothing tending to show that the usage was not observed on the night in question. Under such circumstances, the usage, together with proof that goods stored in the house disappeared therefrom, and were shortly afterwards found, some of them in the possession of the accused, and some in possession of a witness for the state against him, will be sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the witness, he testifying that the building was burglarized by himself and the accused in the night by unlocking the door, entering the house, and stealing the goods.

2. Where the pressure of the case was upon the credibility of an accomplice as compared with the credibility of two daughters of the accused, the accomplice testifying that the accused was a party to the burglary, and the daughters testifying that the stolen goods found in possession of the accused were purchased by him from the accomplice in their presence, a charge of the court to the jury that "ordinarily, when a burglary has been committed, when the evidence shows to the jury that a burglary has been committed, a house broken, the goods stolen therefrom, and shortly thereafter the defendant upon trial is found in possession of the stolen goods, that fact—the fact of possession—authorizes the jury to convict, provided the defendant does not satisfactorily explain his possession to the jury," though not verbally, and perhaps not substantially correct, since it is true in some cases only, yet the jury having, in effect, found by their verdict that the explanation set up by the accused was false, and the testimony of the accomplice being sufficiently corroborated, there was no cause for a new trial.

3. Though burglary cannot be committed without force in the legal sense, it is not error to charge the jury that force or violence in a popular sense would not be necessary. Such, in effect, though not in terms, was the charge of the court in the present case. The charge contrasted the breaking of a house by unlocking the door with a key and breaking it by force or violence of a different order and higher degree.

4. There was no error in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county; C. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Clark Pritchett was convicted of burglary, and from an order denying a new trial he brings error. Affirmed.

John R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Felton, Jr., Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. Was the accomplice, Will Battle, sufficiently corroborated in that part of his testimony which implicated Pritchett in the burglary? We think he was. It appeared from the evidence of other witnesses that the door of the house was usually kept locked at night; that goods stored in the house disappeared therefrom on a particular night, and were shortly afterwards found, some of them in the possession of Pritchett, and some in the possession of Will Battle, the witness. The evidence tends strongly to show that the usage as to locking the door was observed on the night in question, and there is no evidence having the slightest tendency to establish the contrary. The door was found the next morning closed, but unlocked. The accomplice testified that Pritchett had a bunch of keys, and that he and Pritchett opened the door, and went in; but did not say expressly whether a key was used in so doing or not. The jury could probably infer from his evidence that a key was used, and such seems to have been the understanding of counsel, for the witness was not pressed to be more specific on this point than he was. We infer this from reading his examination, which is set out in the record by questions and answers.

2. The charge of the court on the effect of possession of stolen goods in a trial for burglary was not accurate, but for the reason indicated in the second headnote we think the inaccuracy, as applied to this case, was not cause for a new trial.

3. Without using force—force as understood in a legal sense—no burglary can be committed, but force as understood in the popular sense is not necessary. Opening a door by unlocking it with a key is using force in the former sense, though not in the latter. In presenting this distinction to the jury the court's phraseology was not accurate, but the substance of the instruction as applied to the facts of the case was not misleading.

4. It was not error to deny a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSTON v. PATTERSON.

CONTINUANCE—DISTRESS FOR RENT—SET OFF.

1. On the special facts there was no error in refusing to postpone the trial to a later day or hour.

2. Where the rent contract between landlord and tenant embraces mutual stipulations as to divers particulars, and each party violates some of the stipulations, the damages resulting therefrom should, in a contest on a distress warrant and counter affidavit as to the amount of rent due, be set off, those on the one side against those on the other, and nothing should be allowed the tenant as a deduction from the amount of the distress warrant except the net balance of damage in his favor on squaring the damage account.

Error from superior court, Bibb county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

Action by R. M. Patterson against John T. Johnston to recover rent by distress warrant. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

For report on former appeal, see 13 S. E. 17.

Steed & Wimberly, Jas. A. Thomas, and C. & H. Estes, for plaintiff in error. R. W. Patterson and R. Hodges, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. On the special and somewhat complicated state of facts upon which the application for a postponement of the trial rested, there was no error in denying the application. It must be remembered that such matters are generally discretionary with the trial court, and, no abuse of the discretion appearing, the decision of that court will not be disturbed.

2. In a statutory contest between landlord and tenant as to the amount of rent due, there are no pleadings except the affidavit for a distress warrant and the warrant itself on the one side, and the counter affidavit on the other. Upon these pleadings alone the tenant may prove that the landlord has violated the rent contract, and reduce the rent by so much as the damages occasioned thereby amount to. Johnston v. Patterson, 86 Ga. 725, 13 S. E. 17. May not the landlord meet violation with violation, damages with damages, have a full instead of a partial reckoning as to damages, and uphold his warrant to the extent of the sum really due him for rent after a just settlement of the damage account? Here the rent contract embraced mutual stipulations, and involved divers particulars. The tenant undertook to do more than merely to pay the rent, and the landlord had more to do than to receive it. Each party defaulted, and occasioned damage to the other. The breaches, as well as the covenants, were mutual. Why should not the principle of recoupment be applied in favor of the landlord as well as against him? The net balance in favor of the tenant on squaring the damage account measured the credit to which he was entitled on the rent account. This, and no more, could properly be deducted from the amount of the distress warrant. Judgment affirmed.

BRYAN v. MAYOR, ETC., OF THE CITY OF MACON.

INJURIES FROM DEFECTIVE STREETS—SUFFICIENCY OF DECLARATION.

The declaration sets forth a cause of action, the allegations being in substance that, in August, 1891, plaintiff was driving a mule hitched to a buggy in a street of the city of Macon. His mule becoming frightened, he jumped from the buggy; and while his attention was thus directed to his mule, plaintiff, without fault on his part, fell into a hole,—the mouth of a sewer in said street. The sewer was unprotected, and in a dangerous condition, and had been so for 10 days, and its condition was known to the city, to whose negligence it was due. That, in consequence of such fall, he was greatly injured, suffered from concussion of the spine, was unconscious for 24 hours after the injury, suffered great pain, which still continues, and is now totally unfitted for business, and has become liable for $100 for medical attention. At the time of the injury he was 46 years of age, and was earning $200 per month; to his damage $15,000, etc.

Error from city court of Macon; J. P. Ross, Judge.

Action by William Bryan against the city of Macon to recover for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from a defective street. There was judgment for defendant, dismissing the action on demurrer to the declaration. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hardeman & Nottingham, for plaintiff in error. R. W. Patterson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The court erred in dismissing the action on general demurrer to the declaration. Taking the facts, as alleged, to be true, the plaintiff sustained a serious personal injury, while free from fault on his part, by falling into the unprotected mouth of a sewer which opened into one of the public streets of the city, along which he was passing. The dangerous condition of the mouth of the sewer was caused by the negligence of the defendant, was known to it, and had existed for 10 days. The declaration explains how the plaintiff came to be near the mouth of the sewer, and why he did not see it, but fell into it unawares. He was driving along the street; his mule became frightened; he leaped from the buggy, and, while his attention was directed to the frightened mule, he fell into the mouth of the sewer. It is not alleged precisely how the sewer was connected with the street relatively to the position of the opening, but it is alleged that the danger it occasioned was due to the defendant's negligence. Can the defendant admit that the plaintiff was injured, that he was without fault, that the city was negligent, and that a dangerous hole, left open by its negligence, was the one into which he fell, and yet avoid liability? Clearly not. The declaration may be defective in form by reason of not setting out with more particularity and distinctness the position of the hole, whether at the edge of the street or how far inside, etc., but it is good in substance; and to withstand a general demurrer nothing more is requisite. Judgment reversed.

McCRARY et al. v. GLOVER.

REAL ACTION—NEW TRIAL.

This being the first grant of a new trial, and no abuse of discretion being clearly apparent, the judgment is affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Twiggs county; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action in ejectment by I. N. McCrary and others against George Z. Glover, guardian. There was a verdict for plaintiffs, and a new trial granted. Plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Ejectment on the several demises of I. N. McCrary, as head of a family, Aaron Boynton, and V. A. Frasier, was defended by George Z. Glover, guardian for Rosa M. Peacock. The premises in dispute are described as eight acres of land, more or less, known as the "Tom Solomon New Ground," being that portion of the 350-acre tract formerly known as the "Lawson Place," and later as the "McCrary Place," which is included in the following metes and bounds: Bounded on three sides—on the northwest, northeast, and southeast—by a fence separating said new ground from woodland of I. N. McCrary, and on the southwest by the true land line separating said 350-acre tract from the Rosa Peacock land, said true land line commencing at a large locust tree on the west side of the Jeffersonville and Gordon public road; and extending thence north, 47 degrees west, between said 350-acre tract and lands belonging to Miss Rosa Peacock. The jury found for the plaintiffs the premises in dispute, and for rent one dollar per acre per annum. The court granted a new trial on defendant's motion, and the plaintiffs excepted. The grounds of the motion are that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence, and that it is contrary to the following charge of the court: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the premises in dispute are embraced in the body of land assigned to M. E. Lawson and Alice L. Taylor by the report of the commissioners who divided the lands of Sabra Durham, made by Fred D. Wimberly, William Beal, and J. S. Evans, commissioners, dated August 5, 1874, the plaintiff and defendant are tenants in common, and the plaintiff cannot recover. There is no ambiguity in this report except as to the location of the land assigned to Alice L. Taylor, and, if the testimony shows that the part assigned to her was embraced in the description given in this report, then they are tenants in common, and the plaintiff cannot recover. The report itself is the highest evidence of the division and the assignments thereunder. If plaintiff and defendant were tenants in common of the parcel of land of which the land in dispute is a part and parcel, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover rents, unless the defendant was occupying more than her fair share or proportion of the land held between them as tenants in common. It is my duty to construe the report of the commissioners, and your duty to accept it, and I charge you that, if the description of the land assigned to Mrs. Taylor is embraced in the description of the land assigned to Mrs. Lawson, they and those holding under them were tenants in common, and you should find for the defendant."

The evidence for the plaintiffs was, in brief, as follows: A division of the lands of Sabra Durham, deceased, shown by the records of the court of ordinary of Twiggs county; signed by Fred D. Wimberly, William Beal, and J. S. Evans, commissioners, dated August 5, 1874, the relevant portion of which is: "In the Sandy place we find 600 acres. We give all that part of the land lying on the left of the road leading from Jeffersonville to Durham's old mill place, starting from the corner at J. B. Peacock's quarter, immediately at corner of his fence on said public road, to the point where an old house was located near the old mill in corner of said land, to M. E. Lawson, and all the land lying on said line and west and north of the same we give to Alice L. Taylor. We therefore assign said several parts of land to said heirs as an equal distribution." A deed from Mary E. Lawson to Aaron Boynton, September 8, 1885, to "all that tract of land, including 350 acres of land, more or less, known as the 'Lawson Land,' on Big Sandy, bounded on the south by the Peacock place; on the west by the estate of S. P. Gragg; on the north by lands of Stokes and Floyd; on the east by R. M. Benford's and W. F. Cannon's land,—being in the 26th land district, Twiggs county." Order of the judge of the superior courts of the Macon circuit, December 8, 1888, appointing F. M. Jones trustee for I. N. McCrary and family, to sell his homestead property in Bibb county, and reinvest the proceeds in 350 acres of land, more or less, in Twiggs county. Deed from Aaron Boynton to F. M. Jones, trustee for I. N. McCrary and family December 18, 1888, to "all of that tract or parcel of land lying, being, and situated in the 26th land district of Twiggs county, Ga., number not known, but bounded by lands of Stokes & Floyd, east by lands of Benford and W. F. Cannon, west by the lands of the Peacock estate, and known as the 'Lawson Place,' and more fully described in deed from Mary E. Lawson to Aaron Boynton, dated Sept. 3, 1885, and containing 350 acres, more or less." Testimony by R. M. Benford: The land in dispute was always known by him as a part of the Lawson lands. Supposes there are 350 or 400 acres in the Lawson place. Knows nothing of the location of the Taylor lands. Always understood the Lawson land extended to the line between the Peacock lands and the Lawson place. The new ground in dispute is on the land he had always known as the "Lawson Place." The line shown in the diagram in evidence (a straight line) divides the Peacock lands and the Lawson lands. The Lawson lands belonged to the old "Durham Place," sometimes known also as the "Wimberly Place." By S. I. Denard to the same effect: He supposed the land in dispute to be worth about $30 per year for rent, but not so much the first year it was cultivated. By W. B. Tarver: He heard Mrs. Alice Taylor say during her life that in the division of the Sabra Durham lands she drew land on the right-hand side of the public road leading from Jeffersonville to Durham's old mill. He was brother-in-law of Mrs. Alice L. Taylor and Mrs. Mary E. Lawson, and his wife drew one of the shares in the division of the Durham place. He was familiar with the place and the division made of it, and knew what each heir recognized as the part falling to him or her in the division.

Evidence for the defendant: Alice L. Taylor (formerly Wimberly) was the wife of John L. Taylor. She died a few years after her marriage, leaving him and two children. One child died shortly after her; the other died at the age of two years. January 29, 1876, J. R. Taylor made a deed to S. E. Peacock and J. B. Peacock, natural guardian for H. C. Peacock and M. C. Peacock, to "all that one-half undivided interest in the lands, being three hundred acres, more or less, drawn by A. L. Taylor as distributee of the estate of Sabra Durham, deceased, the same lying on the left of the road leading from Jeffersonville to Durham's old mill, which one-half interest is the distributive share of estate of said A. L. Taylor, who is now deceased, belonging to said J. R. Taylor as heir of her estate, all lying in Twiggs county, Georgia, and bounded by lands of S. E. Peacock, T. J. Joyner, Mary E. Lawson, and W. H. Stokes." J. B. Peacock and S. E. Peacock died leaving only two children.—H. C. Peacock, now the wife of George Z. Glover, and Rosa M. Peacock. They were the only heirs at law. J. B. Peacock was the husband of S. E. Peacock. The minutes of the court of ordinary show the appointment and qualification of G. Z. Glover as guardian for Rosa M. Peacock, the defendant. From the records of that court appear a division of the lands of S. E. Peacock by M. E. Solomon, T. J. McCoy, and J. L. Harrell, commissioners, January 22, 1882, assigning to H. C. Glover all of the Radford and Wimberly places, the same being whole lot No. 9 in the twenty-sixth district, and 150 acres, more or less, of the Wimberly land in the twenty-sixth district, being 400 acres, more or less, as her share in said land; and to T. S. Jones, guardian for Rosa Maud Peacock, a house and lot and storehouse in Jeffersonville, and "two hundred acres of land, more or less, in the 26th district, said county, known as the 'Alligator Place,' and five hundred acres, more or less, lying in the 26th and 27th districts of said county, and known as the 'Taylor' and 'Murphy' places, aggregating seven hundred acres, more or less, as the full and complete share and interest of the said Rosa Maud Peacock, both as an heir at law of the said S. E. Peacock, deceased, and as a tenant in common with the said H. C. Glover." From the testimony of W. H. Stokes, Steven Jones, Fred D. Wimberly, and J. T. Horne, Peacock's Alligator place was never a part of the Durham lands. The lands lying on the north and west sides of the public road were a part of the Durham lands. In this body there are 600 acres;

maybe more. The diagram in evidence represents the road from Jeffersonville to Durham's old mill place, and the lines around this body of land. The fence around the Peacock lands cornered at the point designated on the diagram as the "Locust Tree." There is an old hedgerow there. There was never any more land embraced in the Durham place, lying on the left and north and west of the public road leading from Jeffersonville to Durham's old mill, than this 600 acres as shown by the diagram, which is correct. Neither Wimberly nor either of the other commissioners who divided the Sabra Durham lands went upon the same to divide them. The division was mutually agreed upon between the heirs. The commissioners made the division as instructed by them, and reported the same to the court. Wimberly does not think they ever divided the land between Mrs. Lawson and Mrs. Taylor. The 600 acres were set apart for both of them; this was the agreement between them. They did not assign any land to Mrs. Taylor on the right of the road; all the land assigned to her lay on the left. The other two partitioners are dead.

Steed & Wimberly and L. D. Moore, for plaintiffs in error. L. D. Shannon and F. Chambers, for defendant in error.

INTERPLEADER—SOURCE OF FUND—EVIDENCE.

Under the pleading and the evidence in the record, the finding that the fund in controversy was the produce of the timber, as distinguished from saw timber, was incorrect, there being no evidence to vary or contradict the inference arising from the so-called "bill of interpleader" to the effect that all the timber which produced the fund was 12 inches or more in diameter at the stump, and the interpleader being the basis of the special reference to the court, which was made by consent, in order that the whole case might be decided by the judge without a jury.

Error from superior court, Pulaski county; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by J. O. Perkins, administrator, against Thompson and others and W. A. Morgan. There was judgment for defendant Morgan, and a new trial denied. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. L. Grice, for plaintiff in error. Martin & Smith, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The persons composing the firm of Thompson & Co. were sued individually by Morgan for trespass upon certain land and cutting and carrying away pine trees therefrom. Pending this suit an action was brought against them as a partnership by Perkins, administrator of Perkins, deceased.

ed, on an account for trees sold by the administrator to the defendants, and cut by them from the same land, being all the saw timber thereon measuring 12 inches and over in diameter. To the latter action the defendants filed an equitable plea setting up that they had bought from the agent of the administrator all of the timber on the lot measuring 12 inches and over, agreeing to pay for it $225, and under the contract they proceeded to cut the timber, and while cutting it were notified by Morgan not to pay over the money to any one but him, as he claimed and owned the land and timber; that they were also notified by Perkins not to pay over the money to any one but him. They alleged that they were stakeholders, and ready at all times to pay over the money to the proper and lawful owner. They prayed that Morgan be made a party to this suit, that he be enjoined from proceeding with his action, and that he and Perkins be required to interplead. By consent of all parties, including Morgan, this plea was filed and allowed. Morgan was made a party, and enjoined, as prayed for. Perkins answered, setting forth his claim to the fund, and calling upon Morgan for discovery, propounding to him certain interrogatories, which Morgan answered. In order that the whole case might be heard by the presiding judge without a jury, it was referred to him by consent of parties, and he awarded the money in controversy, $225, to Morgan. Perkins moved for a new trial, and the motion was overruled, the order overruling it indicating as a reason for the judgment that Thompson & Co. did not cut any mill timber off the lot of land in controversy, but did cut the tie timber belonging to Morgan. The basis of the special reference to the judge and of the trial thereon which followed was the bill of interpleader, so called, contained in the equitable answer of Thompson & Co. The irresistible inference arising from the language of this answer is that the fund touching which they invited Perkins and Morgan to interplead was produced wholly and exclusively from timber measuring 12 inches or more in diameter at the stump. No evidence to vary or contradict this inference appears in the record, although there is evidence that all the timber cut was tie timber. Its being tie timber did not prevent it from being mill timber also if it was 12 inches in diameter at the stump, for the written contract between Morgan and Perkins, deceased, embraced "all of the saw timber measuring twelve inches, and over, in diameter at the stump." No witness testified that any of the timber which produced the fund did not fulfill this description, or that any of it was not mill timber or saw timber. No doubt, it was adapted to use for cross-ties, and it may all have been cut and used for that purpose; but this would not negative its character as saw timber, the sort of timber which Morgan had sold to Perkins, deceased, and which the administrator of Perkins had sold to Thompson & Co., and for the price of which the suit by the administrator against them was brought. If the fund in the hands of Thompson & Co. was not produced by that kind of timber, the interpleader was wholly unfounded. Why should the administrator and Morgan interplead touching the proceeds of any timber which was not saw timber, for the administrator had not claimed or sold any other sort or sued for its price? On the contrary, Morgan did claim that the sale of saw timber which he had made to Perkins, deceased, was not binding upon him as to any such timber as was not cut within a given time. This furnished a ground for interpleading with the administrator of Perkins, deceased, if the fund in the hands of Thompson & Co. was the proceeds of saw timber cut after that time; but, if it was the proceeds of such tie timber as was not also saw timber, it afforded no grounds of interpleading, no matter when the timber was cut. The real controversy between Morgan and the administrator seems to have been left untouched if the reason given by the court for denying a new trial was the reason on which the finding in favor of Morgan was based; and no doubt it was. Taking this view of the matter, the case should be remanded, in order that the real controversy may be met and determined. Judgment reversed.

HIRSCH v. OLIVER.

ACTION ON NOTES—STRIKING OUT PLEA—DEFENSES—AGENCY.

1. The striking of a plea that the notes declared upon were without consideration is not cause for a new trial, when it affirmatively and clearly appears from the facts disclosed at the trial that there was a full and sufficient consideration for the notes.

2. To an action against the maker on his negotiable promissory notes, a plea that he executed them with the understanding that he was not to be bound, and for a purpose wholly at variance with their plain tenor and import, is no defense, there being no denial that the notes were made and delivered, and no suggestion in the plea that the understanding and purpose alleged were evidenced by any writing, or that they were omitted from the notes by fraud, accident, or mistake.

3. The notes being signed by the defendant in his own name with the addition of "& Co.," and it not appearing in the transcript of the record brought up what the declaration alleged, if anything, as to a partnership or firm, no error is apparent in the judgment sustaining the demurrer to a plea on that subject.

4. In an action upon promissory notes signed by the defendant with the addition "& Co.," where the defendant, instead of pleading the nonjoinder of a copartner, files a sworn plea of no partnership, a recovery may be had against him on a proper declaration if he executed the notes, whether in fact he had a copartner or not. In this case it does not appear that any person was sued except the defendant.

5. An agent to rent premises for the owner may, after the notes for the rent have been taken and a portion of the term expired, become an agent for the tenant to sublet the premises to another tenant for the balance of the term. In such case the control of the premises by the agent while representing the tenant will have no effect on the rent notes.

6. Agency cannot be proved by the declaration of another agent of the same principal made to the witness, unless it appears that the latter agent was authorized by the principal to make the declaration, or that it was made as a part of the res gestae in the performance of some duty appertaining to his agency.

7. There was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Sumter county; W. H. Fish, Judge.

Action by J. F. Oliver against A. Hirsch to recover on promissory notes. There was judgment for plaintiff, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hinton & Cutts, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The merits of this controversy were fully exposed at the trial. The parties introduced evidence pro and con, and all the facts touching consideration or want of consideration for the notes declared upon were brought out. From these it clearly appears that there was a full and sufficient consideration for the notes. This being so, the striking of the plea that the notes were without consideration is not cause for a new trial.

2. The plea which sought to contradict the notes by setting up an understanding that the maker was not to be bound; that the notes were executed for a purpose other than that of binding him to pay money,—a purpose wholly at variance with their plain tenor and import,—contained no suggestion that the understanding and purpose alleged were evidenced by any writing, or that anything was omitted from the notes by fraud, accident, or mistake. It contained no denial of the making and delivery of the notes, but simply sought to run over them and crush them by an alleged contemporaneous understanding or agreement in conflict both with their letter and their legal effect. This plea presented no valid defense to the action, and there was no error in striking it.

3. If there was any error in striking the plea on the subject of partnership, on demurrer to the same, it is not apparent to this court, for the transcript of the record does not show that the declaration alleged anything as to a partnership or firm; and, although the notes sued on were signed by the defendant in his own name, with the addition of "& Co." annexed thereto, we are unable to say whether the plea met any partnership element involved in the declaration or not. If the declaration did not allege that the notes were made by a partnership, or were the contracts of a partnership, a denial of the existence of that partnership would be idle and irrelevant. As the case stands here, there is no partnership element in it.

4. It does not appear that any person was sued except the defendant Hirsch, now the plaintiff in error. His plea of no partnership, if true, shows conclusively that no one else ought to have been sued. If he executed the notes, he ought to pay them, whether in fact he had a copartner or not, as he does not plead the nonjoinder of anybody. Surely the addition of "& Co." to his name in executing the notes would not protect him against being severally liable thereon if there was nobody to join with him as a defendant in the suit.

5. It seems that Horne, the agent who represented the plaintiff in renting the premises and taking the rent notes, became the agent of the defendant, the tenant, to sublet the premises to another tenant, and it is contended that he misbehaved himself in this second agency. Well, suppose he did. His principal in that agency was the defendant, and he must take the consequences. Surely the misbehavior of the defendant's agent cannot be imputed to the plaintiff, although the same person occupied both agencies.

6. Horne, the plaintiff's agent, told the defendant, Hirsch, that the plaintiff's son was her agent also. This was not competent evidence to prove the son's agency, and the court was right in excluding it. Horne's declaration to the defendant was not made pending any transaction in behalf of the plaintiff to which the declaration was pertinent, so as to be a part of the res gestae of the transaction. There was no error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

ESTES v. ODOM.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER — DEFICIENCY IN QUANTITY — ESTOPPEL — DAMAGES.

1. In a conveyance of land not sold by the acre, but by the tract or entire body, the qualifying words "more or less" will cover any deficiency which does not justify a suspicion of willful deception, or mistake equivalent thereto. This is true whether there was willful deception in fact or not. By accepting such a conveyance the vendee waives not only any mistake, but any deception, as to quantity, unless (keeping in view the object of the purchase and all the attendant circumstances) some willful deception or gross mistake would, after ascertaining the true quantity, be suggested to the mind by a mere comparison of that quantity with the quantity named in the descriptive words.

2. The quantity mentioned in the deed being "40 acres, more or less," and the complaint being that the actual quantity was 7 acres less than 40, and the fraud alleged being that the defendant represented that the tract contained 41¼ acres, it was error to charge the jury thus: "The amount of acres stated in the deed must be the amount of acres that you will say was sold, taking the verbal testimony to throw light upon that, but not to alter it, because when a matter is in writing it cannot be substantially changed by verbal testimony." For this error a new trial is granted.

3. In order for the vendee to estop himself by waiver or acquiescence from seeking redress for the fraud by an action for damages, he would have to be fully informed of the facts at the time of such waiver or acquiescence. If at that time he was aware of a deficiency in the quantity of land, but believed it to be much less than it really was, and did not ascertain the true extent of the deficiency till afterwards, he would not be estopped. On the facts in evidence it was not error to decline to charge the jury that "if, before he paid the purchase money, took a conveyance, and entered into possession, he complained of a deficiency, and the vendor offered to return him his notes and cancel the bargain, and he replied that he was satisfied and would raise no question of deficiency, and the vendor thereupon gave him possession and made him a conveyance, the vendee would be estopped from setting up the deficiency in the land."

4. Previous knowledge of the land or of its boundaries would not preclude the vendee from recovering for fraudulent misrepresentation of quantity, if without fault on his part he was actually deceived and defrauded by the misrepresentation, provided the deficiency was more than could be fairly covered in the given instance by the phrase "more or less."

5. It is no bar to an action for damages resulting from fraudulent misrepresentation of quantity that the land which the plaintiff got by the conveyance made to him by the defendant was worth more than the price he paid for it. The measure of damages in such a case is not less than the pro rata part of the purchase money which was paid for the deficiency, with interest thereon.

Error from superior court, Clayton county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by W. D. Odom against W. C. Estes to recover for an alleged deficit in land conveyed to him by defendant. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. L. Watterson and Hall & Hammond, for plaintiff in error. Stewart & Wright, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The Code, § 2642, reads thus: "In a sale of lands, if the purchase is per acre, a deficiency in the number of acres may be apportioned in the price. If the sale is by the tract or entire body, a deficiency in the quantity sold cannot be apportioned. If the quantity is specified as 'more or less,' this qualification will cover any deficiency not so gross as to justify the suspicion of willful deception, or mistake amounting to fraud; in this event, the deficiency is apportionable; the purchaser may demand a rescission of the sale or an apportionment of the price according to relative value." Here the sale was by the tract or entire body, and the quantity was specified in the conveyance as "40 acres, more or less." According to the evidence of the vendee, the vendor represented the quantity to be 41½ acres. Let it be granted that this representation was willfully false, and that the tract contained less than 40 acres; would it necessarily follow that the vendee could recover for the deficiency, however small or inconsiderable that might be? We think not, for, according to the section of the Code just quoted, the qualifying words "more or less" covered any deficiency not so gross as to justify the suspicion of willful deception or mistake amounting to fraud. By accepting such a conveyance, the vendee waived both mistake and deception, unless fraud either by one or the other would, after ascertaining the true quantity, be suggested to the mind by a comparison of that quantity with the quantity named in the descriptive words of the conveyance. If either direct fraud, or mistake so gross as to be equivalent thereto, would be suggested by such a comparison, then a recovery could be had, otherwise it could not, for "any deficiency not so gross as to justify the suspicion of willful deception, or mistake amounting to fraud," is covered by the qualification "more or less." Such a suspicion could not arise or be justified unless some suggestion of fraud or gross mistake would occur to the mind as probable in consequence of the magnitude of the deficiency, in view of the object of the purchase and all the attendant circumstances. Where the vendor qualifies his conveyance with the terms "more or less," the vendee is put upon notice not to rely upon any representation of quantity as being exact. He is put upon notice that the true quantity may, on being ascertained, vary not only from that mentioned in the representation, but from that mentioned in the conveyance, by any difference whatever which is not suggestive of fraud either by deception or by gross mistake. Is it a question of law or a question of fact whether, in the given instance, there is a suspicion of willful deception or of mistake amounting to fraud? In ordinary cases, we think it is a question of fact, to be decided by the jury on all the circumstances of the particular case, including as one of the main considerations the object of the purchase, (if any, in particular,) as understood between the parties at the time of the transaction. Where the quantity was substantially material to the object, the suspicion would arise far more readily than where it was not. For instance, where a purchase of a large tract is made with a view to putting all of the land immediately in cultivation, a deficiency in quantity would count for more than would the same deficiency in a tract of the same size bought as a building site, or as a business stand for a country store. In the one instance, a somewhat small deficiency might well justify the suspicion, and in the other a much larger deficiency might afford no ground for it whatever. In the one instance there might be good reason for believing that the vendee relied upon a false representation, thinking it to be true; in the other, the jury might well believe that he fully realized the object of his purchase in the land as it actually was, and that he placed no reliance upon any representation, not caring whether it was true or false. Unless a suspicion of willful deception, or of mistake equivalent thereto, first arises, without ascertaining the actual fact whether there was or was not such deception or mistake, no final inquiry into the actual fact is in order. Until this preliminary question is decided affirmatively, the additional and ultimate question is immaterial. Though all the evidence bearing on both questions must be submitted at the same time, or in the course of the same trial, the jury should be instructed to deal with the former question first, and not to deal with the latter at all in the event they should determine the former in the negative. We say the preliminary question is for the jury in ordinary cases. In such extraordinary and pronounced cases as would afford no room for difference of opinion, that question could doubtless be decided by the court hypothetically as one of law. The deficiency might be so slight and trivial, on the one hand, or so excessive, on the other, as either to present nothing whatever for trial by the jury beyond ascertaining the extent of the deficiency, or limit their functions to that and to the ultimate question, together with the assessment of damages. We deem the present case, under the facts in evidence, an ordinary, not an extraordinary, one, the deficiency being 7 acres, and the description in the deed being "40 acres, more or less." We cannot say, as matter of law, that the deficiency is so gross as to justify a suspicion of willful deception or of mistake equivalent to fraud, nor can we say, on the other hand, that it is not. For the sake of emphasizing an essential distinction, we repeat that the sufficiency of the words "more or less" to cover a given deficiency, when ascertained, does not depend upon the actual existence or nonexistence of fraud, either in the form of mistake or of willful deception, but solely upon whether the deficiency is such as to justify a suspicion of fraud. When the suspicion is thus justified, then, and then only, is the actual existence of fraud material. The suspicion may be rebutted, for the suspicion without the fraud will not warrant a recovery, nor will the fraud without the preliminary suspicion. The plaintiff must show a deficiency which is uncovered, and by this means make a prima facie case of fraud to the extent of raising a suspicion. The same facts which justify the suspicion may prove the fraud, prima facie. The suspicion, however, must be generated in a certain way. It must arise out of a comparison of quantities, and out of the magnitude of the resulting deficiency,—its magnitude either absolutely, or relatively to the object of the purchase, etc.; whereas, were the question only one of actual fraud, the fact of the fraud might be shown in various ways, none of them involving the magnitude of the deficiency. In raising a suspicion of fraud, what the vendor knew, said, or did in negotiating the sale need not be known. He may have acted in perfect good faith; but this will not be assumed, and therefore will not protect him from the suspicion which we are discussing. Good faith can be shown only to rebut the suspicion after it has arisen, and to negative the actual commission of fraud, notwithstanding the apparently well-founded suspicion thereof.

2. We have examined carefully the charge of the court as brought up in the record. It nowhere submits to the jury the preliminary question of fact above specified, but proceeds upon the theory that, if there was willful deception, the vendor would be answerable at all events for the deficiency. In one of the paragraphs excepted to it says: "The amount of acres stated in the deed must be the amount of acres that you will say was sold, taking the verbal testimony to throw light upon that, but not to alter it, because when a matter is in writing it cannot be substantially changed by verbal testimony." Under the rule of the Code, where the qualifying words "more or less" are used, no number of acres whatever, according to the writing, is sold other than the number contained in the tract, and this number is subject to be ascertained by parol evidence, whatever number may be mentioned in the deed. The instruction just quoted, taken by itself, seems intended to bind both parties by the quantity stated in the deed; but this construction would be inconsistent with other parts of the charge, and is therefore not to be adopted. We cannot be sure of the precise idea which the court meant to express, but we are sure that the jury may have understood the court as meaning that they were to consider 40 acres as the quantity sold; and in view of the rest of the charge we reach the conclusion that the court designed the jury to understand that if the tract contained 7 acres less than 40, and if there was a false and fraudulent representation by the vendor that it contained $41\frac{1}{4}$ acres, they were to allow damages on account of the deficiency of 7 acres. Now, such a result would not be correct, as we have already seen, unless the words "more or less" would not cover the deficiency; and whether they would or not depends on whether that deficiency is so gross as to justify a suspicion of willful deception or of mistake amounting to fraud. We think the charge quoted was erroneous, and that a new trial should be had on account of that error.

3. In declining to charge as requested on the subject of estoppel the court did not err, for the reason suggested in the third head-note.

4. Assuming that the deficiency was more than the indefinite words in the deed would fairly cover, previous knowledge by the vendee of the boundaries of the tract would not hinder a recovery for the fraud, if he was actually deceived by a false representation made willfully by the vendor. Knowledge of boundaries need not involve knowledge of acreage or superficial area, and was not, in itself, notice of what the tract contained.

5. The theory that the vendee must be satisfied if he got in land the worth of his money is altogether wrong. He was entitled to have what he bought and paid for, and if the fraud of the other party deprived him of a part of the same so considerable that the fraud is manifested prima facie, or fairly suggested as probable, by the grossness of the deficiency, the minimum recovery should be the amount paid for the deficiency, with interest thereon from the time of payment. If the true tract, as it proved to be, was, on account of being so small, worth less than it would have been as part of a larger tract which the vendee supposed he was getting and had a right to expect, this difference would be recoverable, no matter how valuable the true tract was. Smith v. Kirkpatrick, 79 Ga. 410, 7 S. E. 258. Judgment reversed.

EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO. v. HARBUCK.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—ACCIDENTS TO PERSONS ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. According to the evidence of those witnesses who must have been best acquainted with the actual facts, the railway company made it appear that its agents exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, and that the killing of plaintiff's husband took place in spite of such observance. The acts of diligence comprehended blowing the whistle, sounding the alarm, applying brakes, and, so soon as it was discovered that the signals given were not having their natural and ordinary effect, making an effort to stop the train. Any and all material conflict with adverse witnesses may be reconciled upon the theory that the plaintiff's witnesses erroneously attributed all the whistling which they heard to the locomotives which happened to be near by upon the track of the Western & Atlantic Railroad. These witnesses could have been mistaken in thinking that the whistling which they heard all came from locomotives on the latter road, but the defendant's witnesses could not possibly have been mistaken in this respect. They knew whether sounds were made by the locomotive of the train of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway on which they were traveling, and consequently, without unnecessarily imputing perjury to them, their testimony on that subject could not be disbelieved. The number of witnesses who coincided substantially in their testimony on this material point would forbid the adoption of any reasonable theory of collusion by which to account for their evidence; and, without either ignorance or collusion on their part, the facts must have been in accordance with their testimony.

2. The verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by Mrs. John L. Harbuck against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, for plaintiff in error. Glenn & Slaton, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. For a long time after the argument this case was held up, considered, and reconsidered. After studying the facts maturely and with the utmost solicitude to reach a right result, the members of the court arrived at the unanimous conclusion that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and that for this reason alone the trial court erred in refusing to grant a new trial. The line of thought which led to this conclusion is indicated in the first headnote. Judgment reversed.

MERCANTILE TRUST CO. v. KISER et al.

GUARANTY—BY CORPORATION—VALIDITY.

Where it is essential to the successful prosecution of its business by an immense sawmill corporation that a short line of railway, penetrating the country from which its supply of timber is to be drawn, should be constructed and operated, and this enterprise is undertaken by a railway corporation which issues bonds for the purpose of raising funds by which to construct the railway, the interest on these bonds, accruing semiannually for a part of the period during which they are running to maturity, may, before they are negotiated, be guaranteed by the sawmill corporation with the express consent and authority of its stockholders and its board of directors; a sufficient consideration for the guaranty being furnished by the advantage to the sawmill corporation which it derives from the construction and operation of a railway bearing this essential and special relation to the great sawmill establishment. More especially is this true where most of the stock in both corporations is owned by the same natural persons, and where the management and operations of both companies are under boards composed chiefly of the same directors, and where it was manifestly contemplated from the beginning that in conducting the business, after the completion of the railway, the sawmill corporation was to dominate the whole, and treat the railway as a mere adjunct to the sawmill business, though the line of the railway extended beyond the timber region, and was used in carrying for the general public as well as for the mill.

Error from superior court, Dodge county; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by the Mercantile Trust Company, trustee, against the Empire Lumber Company and others, to recover interest on certain bonds for which defendant lumber company was sought to be held liable as guarantor. The court held that the lumber company was not liable, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Estes & Estes, for plaintiff in error. De Lacy & Bishop, J. E. Wooten, Smith & Clements, P. L. Mynatt & Son, John L. Hopkins, and Hill, Harris & Birch, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. Most of the stock in both corporations was owned by the same persons, and the management and operations of both companies were under boards composed chiefly of the same directors. Manifestly, it was contemplated from the beginning that, in conducting the business after the completion of the railway, the sawmill corporation was to have the supreme dominion, and the railway was to be treated and used as a mere adjunct to the sawmill business. The line of railway was a short one. It penetrated the country from which the supply of timber for the mill was to be drawn, and it was essential to the successful prosecution of the business contemplated and afterwards done by the great sawmill establishment. That the railway extended beyond the timber region, and was used in carrying for the general public, as well as for the mill, did not prevent it from being, as it really was, a substitute for a great number of carriages and teams which, without the railroad, the mill company would probably have had to maintain and use in order to procure its supply of timber. It is no strain upon the charter of a sawmill corporation to construe it as authorizing the expenditure of money or the creation of debts to procure any means reasonable and appropriate to obtain and keep up a supply of timber needful for carrying on the business and keeping the mill in operation. The guaranty of the semi-annual interest accruing on the railroad bonds for a part of the time those bonds were running to maturity was made with the express consent and authority of the stockholders and directors of the sawmill corporation. No doubt, this consent and authority were given because without the guaranty the money requisite for constructing the railroad could not be obtained, and, unless the railroad was constructed, the stockholders and directors would have to make other arrangements for transporting a supply of timber, which would have been either more expensive or less efficient than would be afforded by the railway. If it was good business, or if there was good reason to think that it would be good business, on the part of the sawmill corporation, to aid in raising means to construct a railway for use as a timber carrier, rather than get its timber carried in some other way, what ground is there for holding that the guaranty of interest on these bonds was ultra vires? We see none. A sufficient consideration for the guaranty was furnished by the advantage to the sawmill corporation which was expected to be derived, and doubtless was derived, from the construction and operation of a railway which, by reason of penetrating the country from which the supply of timber was to be drawn and was drawn, bore an essential and special relation to this particular sawmill establishment. The primary enterprise was the sawmill, and connected with it was the railway as a minor and subsidiary enterprise, without which, as the evidence indicates, the former could not have hoped to flourish and prove successful. That the sawmill interest really dominated and controlled the railway and its operations is manifest from the evidence in the record. The one was the parent; the other, the child. The one was the master; the other, the servant. The court below erred in holding that the guaranty was not obligatory. Judgment reversed.

FILER & STOWELL CO. v. EMPIRE LUMBER CO. et al.

MECHANICS' LIENS—MILL MACHINERY—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

The lien on sawmills and their products, given by section 1985 of the Code to persons furnishing timber, logs, provisions, or any other thing necessary to carry on the work of sawmills, is not available in behalf of a machinist who furnishes or puts up any steam mill or other machinery, or who may repair the same. The furnishing of machinery for a steam sawmill, to improve or enlarge the mill or to keep it efficient, entitles the machinist to a lien under section 1979 of the Code, provided he claims a lien and records the claim within three months after the machinery is furnished. Compliance with this condition is indispensable. Code, § 1980. A failure to claim and record is not excused by the fact that the premises and mill on which the lien would have attached were put into the hands of a receiver by judicial proceedings at the instance of other creditors before the time for recording had expired.

Error from superior court, Dodge county; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by the Filer & Stowell Company against the Empire Lumber Company and others to establish and enforce a mechanic's lien. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff brings error.

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiff in error. Claude Estés, John L. Hopkins & Sons, and Hill, Harris & Birch, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. A part of section 1979 of the Code reads as follows: "All mechanics of every sort, who have taken no personal security therefor, shall, for work done and material furnished in building, repairing or improving any real estate of their employers; all contractors, material men, and persons furnishing material for the improvement of real estate; all contractors for building factories, furnishing material for the same, or furnishing machinery for the same, and all machinists and manufacturers of machinery, including corporations engaged in such business, who may furnish or put up in any county of this state, any steam mill or other machinery, or who may repair the same; and all contractors to build railroads, shall each have a special lien on such real estate, factories and railroads." And section 1985 reads thus: "All persons furnishing sawmills with timber, logs, provisions, or any other thing necessary to carry on the work of sawmills, shall have liens on said mills and their products, which shall, as between themselves, rank according to date, and the date of each shall be from the time when the debt was created, and such liens shall be superior to all liens but liens for taxes, liens for labor, as provided for in sections 1974, 1975 and 1984, and to all general liens of which they have actual notice before their debt was created, to which excepted liens they shall be inferior." The court below held that the lien claimed in this case, the same being in favor of a machinist for furnishing machinery for a steam sawmill, to improve or enlarge the mill and keep it efficient, does not fall within the latter section, but could exist under the former section only. With this opinion we agree. The former section treats the mill as realty; the latter treats it as personalty. Liens arising under the former must be recorded. Such is the express requirement of section 1980. Liens arising under the latter need not be recorded, and may be foreclosed under section 1991 against the mill as personalty. The lien claimed in this case, not having been recorded within the time prescribed, is not good under section 1979. Failure to claim and record it could not be excused by the fact that the premises and mill on which the lien would have attached were put into the hands of a receiver by judicial proceedings before the time for recording had expired. The custody of the property by a receiver would be no impediment to claiming and recording the lien, and is wholly irrelevant as a reason for not doing so. The Code is express that to make good the liens specified in section 1979 they must be created and declared in accordance with certain provisions, one of which is the recording of the claim of lien within thirty days (now three months by the act of 1889) after the completion of the work, or after such material or machinery is furnished. Code, § 1980, as amended by Acts 1889, p. 106. For a construction of the phrase "any other thing necessary to carry on the work of saw-mills," as contained in section 1985, see the case of Balkcom v. Lumber Co., 17 S. E. 1020, (decided this term.) That case was a part of the same general litigation out of which the present arose, and the two cases were considered and decided at the same time. Judgment affirmed.

MAY et al. v. SMITH.

INJURIES TO EMPLOYE—DANGEROUS MACHINERY—DUTY OF MASTER TO WARN SERVANT.

1. The rule that an inexperienced servant who is employed to work about dangerous machinery is entitled to warning of any special danger incident to the work is not confined to the case of young children, but applies as well to a youth 17 years of age, who is inexperienced in dealing with a machine like that by which he is injured, and is unacquainted with the details of its construction and mode of operation. That the machinery is not defective or out of repair, but is in perfect order, will not dispense with warning where the danger is not open and obvious. Whether the master, at the time of engaging the servant or afterwards, ought to have inquired whether he was experienced or not, or should have taken notice, under all the facts, of the probability that he was not, nothing being said on the subject by either party, is a question for the jury.

2. Although the evidence was conflicting, it warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; M. J. Clarke, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Wesley Smith against George S. May & Co. Plaintiff had judgment, and a new trial was denied. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

C. W. Smith and Well & Goodwin, for plaintiffs in error. Westmoreland & Austin and J. E. Warren, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. There was evidence from which the jury could infer that the machine by which the plaintiff below was injured was dangerous to an inexperienced person, and that the danger was not sufficiently obvious to be apparent to such a person without proper explanation and warning. That the plaintiff was not a child, but was 17 years of age, would not deprive him of the right to be warned if, as a question of fact, the employers, or the man representing them, ought, under all the circumstances, to have inquired of him as to his experience, or taken notice of the probability that he was so inexperienced as to render it proper to give him warning. That his age alone did not deprive him of the right of being warned is established by many authorities. Walsh v. Valve Co., 110 Mass. 23; O'Connor v. Adams, 120 Mass. 427; Wheeler v. Manufacturing Co., 135 Mass. 294; Atkins v. Thread Co., 142 Mass. 431, 8 N. E. 241; Paulmier v. Railroad Co., 34 N. J. Law, 151; Parkhurst v. Johnson, 50 Mich. 70, 15 N. W. 107; Strahlendorf v. Rosenthal, 30 Wis. 674; Jones v. Mining Co., 68 Wis. 268, 28 N. W. 207; Railway Co. v. Watts, 64 Tex. 568; Railway Co. v. Callbreath, 66 Tex. 526, 1 S. W. 622; Baxter v. Roberts, 44 Cal. 187; McGowan v. Smelting Co., 9 Fed. 861. And see Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 352; Perry v. Marsh, 25 Ala. 650; Coombs v. Cordage Co., 102 Mass. 572.

2. The evidence was conflicting, but taking it most favorably for the plaintiff, as the jury probably did, it was sufficient to warrant the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

RICHMOND & D. R. CO. v. LEATHERS.

APPEAL — RULINGS ON EVIDENCE — ACTION FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It not affirmatively appearing that the objections made to the execution of the interinterrogatories were presented to the court in due time, or at what time, no error is apparent in refusing to exclude the answers as evidence. Galceran v. Noble, 66 Ga. 367; Roberts v. Crowley, 81 Ga. 429, 7 S. E. 740.

2. Construing the charge of the court fairly, and taking all its terms together, the jury were sufficiently informed that in order to recover the plaintiff would have to prove that he was injured as alleged in his declaration; and there was no assumption by the court that any injury was in fact sustained.

3. The evidence warranted the verdict, both as to the right to recover and amount.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by S. E. Leathers against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company to recover for personal injuries. Plaintiff had judgment, and a new trial was denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jackson, Leftwich & Black and E. Womack, for plaintiff in error. Thos. W. Latham, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. It is not affirmatively stated in the bill of exceptions, in the motion for a new trial, or elsewhere, that the written objections made to the execution of the interrogatories were presented to the court before the trial, or during the trial, or at what time, or what the objections were. It may be that the attention of the court was not called to the written objections at all, or it may have been done too late. See Galceran v. Noble, 66 Ga. 367; Roberts v. Crowley, 81 Ga. 429, 7 S. E. 740. As to the ground in the motion for a new trial which complains that "the court erred in not ruling out interrogatories of plaintiff that were shown by plaintiff's own testimony to have been executed at plaintiff's residence, in presence of plaintiff's family and of each other," it nowhere appears that the court was requested to rule out these interrogatories, and neither the motion nor the bill of exceptions states or recites what the plaintiff's testimony touching their execution was.

2. As the action was based on an alleged personal injury, and nothing else, the jury could not have failed to understand that if he was wholly uninjured he could not recover. Surely it was not necessary for the court to tell them so expressly, in order to prevent the jury from awarding damages to the plaintiff for being injured if he had received no injury whatever. From the charge of the court as given, taking it as a whole and construing it fairly, it would be a most remarkable jury that would not be sufficiently informed by it that the plaintiff would have to prove he was injured as alleged in his declaration in order to recover. There was no assumption by the court that any injury was in fact sustained.

3. Both as to the right and the amount, the evidence warranted the verdict. Judgment affirmed.

RICHMOND & D. R. CO. v. WORLEY.

STRIKING OUT PLEADINGS—INJURIES TO EMPLOYEE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—EVIDENCE OF NEGLIGENCE.

1. According to the practice in this state, the failure of the plaintiff to support some of the allegations in his declaration by evidence is no reason why the allegations should be stricken out on motion of counsel for the defendant.

2. The inexperience and consequent incompetency of a fireman to properly handle and run a locomotive will not subject the railroad company to an action for a personal injury resulting therefrom to another employee who, knowing of the inexperience of the fireman, made no objection to serve with him in passing over a switch and entering a siding for the purpose of connecting the locomotive with cars standing thereon. As the plaintiff admitted in his testimony on the stand that he knew of the fireman's inexperience, this put that ground of the action out of the case, and the court should not have submitted it to the jury as a possible basis of recovery.

3. There was not enough evidence that the locomotive was out of safe order, or that its condition caused or contributed to the injury, to warrant the court in submitting that issue to the jury as a basis of recovery. The case should have turned alone upon the questions whether the fireman was or was not negligent in working the locomotive, whether that negligence occasioned the injury, and whether the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care for his own safety.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by F. W. Worley against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jackson, Leftwich & Black, for plaintiff in error. Glenn & Slaton, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The motion to strike from the declaration the allegations touching incompetency of the agent of the company who was in charge of the locomotive, and allegations touching the bad condition of the locomotive itself, was a novelty in Georgia practice, though such a practice may prevail elsewhere. Had these allegations been the only charges of negligence, a motion for a nonsuit would have been in order; but as other negligence was alleged, and there was evidence touching that for consideration by the jury, there was no cause for a nonsuit, even had the motion been for a nonsuit instead of calling for purging the declaration.

2. According to the testimony of the plaintiff himself, the inexperience of the fireman who had charge of the locomotive was known to him at the time he (the plaintiff) commenced serving with the fireman in passing over a switch and entering a siding for the purpose of connecting the locomotive with cars standing thereon. The incompetency of the fireman to properly handle and run the locomotive is attributed to his inexperience, and this inexperience being known to the plaintiff was certainly a better reason then for declining to serve with him than it would be now for making the company pay damages for an injury to the plaintiff traceable to that inexperience as its cause. If the plaintiff intended to exact of the company more experience at the throttle of the locomotive than he found there on this occasion, why did he not make the exaction then, either positively, if there was opportunity, or, if there was none, negatively, by declining to unite with this inexperienced person in attempting to perform the particular act of service in the performance of which the injury was sustained? If an employe, knowing that his coemploye is a "green hand," nevertheless co-operates with him without objection, what ground has he for complaining that his fellow servant was a green hand? Under such circumstances, the negligence of the company in furnishing such a fellow servant is waived, but the waiver does not extend to any negligence of which the fellow servant himself may be guilty. If he falls in any respect to come up to the measure of diligence which, under the circumstances, he ought to exercise, consent to serve with him would not cut off the right to recover for any injury occasioned by that negligence.

3. We have examined the evidence with great thoroughness and minuteness. It fails to show that the locomotive was not in safe order for the purpose for which it was being used, or that its condition caused or contributed to the plaintiff's injury. Such slight evidence on this subject as the record contains could not possibly uphold a verdict against the company for damages. This being so, it was error to submit to the jury any question whatever on that subject as a basis of recovery. The whole merits of the case, so far as the right to recover is concerned, are involved in three questions: Was the fireman negligent in working the locomotive? Did that negligence occasion the injury? If so, did the plaintiff exercise due care for his own safety? The determination of these questions would be decisive of the real merits of the controversy in respect to the liability of the company. The court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

TRIMBLE v. MIMS.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESS — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS — ACTION ON NOTE — STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

In an action upon a promissory note against the maker by the payee's personal representative, in which action the statute of limitations is sought to be avoided by the plaintiff on the ground that at the time the note was made the defendant resided in this state, and subsequently removed therefrom, the defendant is not an incompetent witness, by reason of the death of the payee, to prove in his own behalf where he was domiciled at that time. His domicile or place of residence was no part of any transaction or communication with the deceased payee of the note. Acts 1889, p. 85.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by Kitty Trimble, administratrix, against J. T. Mims. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Thos. W. Latham, for plaintiff in error. Rigby, Reed & Berry, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. If, when the note sued upon was executed, the maker resided out of this state, the statute of limitations would run in his favor from the maturity of the note, with no suspension on account of his nonresidence within the state; but if he resided here when the note was executed, and afterwards removed, his removal would suspend the statute until his return. This being the state of the law, it was a vital fact in the case as to where his residence was at the date of the note. Was the maker himself—the payee being dead, and the action being brought by his personal representative—a competent witness on this question? He certainly was. The evidence act of 1889 (Acts 1889, p. 85) disqualifies him only as to transactions or communications with a deceased person. No such transaction or communication was involved in the fact of his residence, or in what was testified concerning it. None such was mentioned by the witness, or referred to by him, as having any tendency to fix or determine his residence, or to aid in identifying it. The fact of a man's residence at a particular place at a given time is one of such an open and public nature as to render it likely that the means of replying to any testimony he may give on the subject will generally be accessible to the opposite party to the suit, whether the party to the contract sued upon be living or dead. At all events, the testimony now in question is not embraced in the letter of the act of 1889, and that itself is made, by the express terms of the act, a conclusive reason in favor of the competency of the witness. As a distinction is sometimes made between "residence" and "domicile," it may be proper to add that there is no reason to think any such distinction was in sight in the present case in the mind of the witness, the counsel, or the court. We think it clear that "domicile" was used in the sense of "residence," and not otherwise. Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—SAL—ACTION FOR PRICE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. An objection that a document offered in evidence was not admissible, because the execution of the same was not proved as required by law, being overruled, the presumption is that the execution was duly proved, unless the contrary affirmatively appears, either by an authentic statement that there was no evidence of execution, or by setting out such evidence on that subject as was adduced to the presiding judge. Mere preliminary evidence on such a question is not for insertion in the brief of evidence requisite to support a motion for a new trial. Consequently, its absence from the brief does not warrant the conclusion that the overruled objection should have been sustained.

2. It being manifest from the facts of the case, considered altogether, that there was a genuine bill of lading which had been surrendered up to the carrier, and that the pressure of the litigation was not upon its existence or contents, but upon the legal consequences of indorsing and turning the same over to a third person, it is no cause for a new trial that the court may have erroneously admitted secondary evidence of the contents of that document, without the omission to discover and produce the original having been legally and fully accounted for.

3. When a contract for the sale of goods has been made through a broker, the goods consigned by the seller to the purchaser, and the bill of lading sent by mail directly to the latter, the broker, under his general powers as such, has no authority to rescind the contract of sale, receive from the purchaser the bill of lading indorsed by him, and thus obtain possession of the goods from the carrier, or cause their delivery to a stranger to whom he transfers the bill of lading. The purchaser, in an action by the seller against him for the price, cannot avoid payment by reason of these facts, and no local custom or usage recognizing and upholding such dealings between purchaser and broker will affect the seller unless the custom or usage be at least known to him, so that his assent thereto could reasonably be inferred.

4. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by the Kauffman Milling Company against C. H. Kelly & Bro. to recover the price of a shipment of flour from plaintiff to defendants. Plaintiff had judgment, and a new trial was denied. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Bigby, Reed & Berry and Hutcheson & Key, for plaintiffs in error. Glenn & Slaton, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The bill of lading offered and received in evidence was a duplicate, and so purported to be on its face. The motion for a new trial complains that its execution was not proved as required by law. We cannot tell whether it was or not, for it is not stated that there was no evidence tending to prove it, nor is any evidence on the subject set out. Its absence from the brief of evidence is of no significance, because the office of the brief is only to show such evidence as was submitted to the jury, and the jury have no concern with preliminary evidence adduced to the court as a basis for introducing a document to be read as evidence in the case. Here there is no authentic statement that there was no evidence of execution, and any evidence which there may have been is not brought up. There is nothing to guide us, therefore, but the presumption of law that the court, before admitting the duplicate bill of lading, became satisfied by proper means that it was a genuine document, duly executed.

2. From the duplicate and the other facts in evidence it is manifest that there was a genuine, original bill of lading covering the consignment involved in this case, and that this original, indorsed by the consignees, Kelly & Bro., was turned over to Boozer, the broker, and by him to Morris, Ewing & Co., to whom he sold the car load of flour, and that they surrendered it to the railway company upon receiving the flour. The pressure of the litigation was not upon the existence or contents of the bill of lading, but upon the legal consequences of indorsing it and turning it over to the broker, thereby enabling him to dispose of the consignment and appropriate the proceeds to his own use, to the prejudice of the Kauffman Milling Company, the consignor, the plaintiff in this action. Grant, therefore, that it was error for the court to admit secondary evidence of the contents of the document without the omission to discover and produce the original having been fully and legally accounted for, this is no cause for a new trial. The evidence—as well that in behalf of the defendants as that in behalf of the plaintiff—could have no proper subject-matter without the assumption or concession that there was in fact a shipment of the flour, and a genuine bill of lading therefor, with contents such as appear in the duplicate bill introduced in evidence. It would be child's play, rather than serious judicial work, to send the case back for another trial in order that this original bill might either be produced, or its nonproduction more satisfactorily accounted for.

3. The contract of sale from the milling company to Kelly & Bro. was negotiated through Boozer, a broker in Atlanta. The flour was consigned from a point in the state of Illinois to Kelly & Bro. at Atlanta, Ga., and the railroad receipt or bill of lading was sent by mail by the former to the latter. This action is brought for the price, and the defense is that Kelly & Bro. did not receive the flour, but that the broker took charge of it and sold it. To this defense it is replied that the broker had no authority so to do, and could not have assumed and exercised such authority to the injury of the milling company without the co-operation of Kelly & Bro., who indorsed the bill of lading which had been sent to them, and turned it over to the broker. We think the broker, being a mere middleman to negotiate the sale, and having no express authority to do more, could not rescind the contract, or receive the flour, and bind the milling company by his conduct. It was sought to enlarge his authority under the general law by local custom or usage prevailing in Atlanta, under which brokers were recognized as representing the persons who had employed them to sell in afterwards canceling the sales and taking charge of the goods. But the evidence fails to show any knowledge of this local custom or usage by the milling company, or any dealing by it with reference thereto. There is no ground for inferring its assent to such a custom.

4. The evidence was sufficient, and there was no error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

FORTHCOMING BOND—ACTION ON.

This case is controlled by Aycock v. Austin, 87 Ga. 566, 13 S. E. 582.

Error from superior court, Newton county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Action on a bond by one Anderson, sheriff, for the use of Heard, White & Thompson, against Green Banks and others. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Capers Dickson, for plaintiff in error. E. F. Edwards, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The action was upon a forthcoming bond taken in a claim case, the property levied upon and claimed being cotton, and the claim having been afterwards withdrawn. The evidence shows that the surety on the claim bond got possession of the cotton when the bond was given, and that after the withdrawal of the claim he admitted that the cotton could not be produced, because he had shipped and disposed of it. For this reason the sheriff did not readvertise it for sale, but brought this action on the forthcoming bond to recover its value, and the value was proved. The ground on which the court granted a nonsuit was that the cotton was not subject to the execution which had been levied upon it. This question was not in the case. It was the very question which was raised by the claim, and the trial of it was waived on the part of the claimant, both for himself and his surety, by withdrawing the claim, and not afterwards renewing it. If it be said that he had no opportunity of renewing because the property was not readvertised for sale, the answer is that it did not have to be readvertised, for it was disposed of either by the claimant or his surety so that they could not produce it. Advertising it would be a useless ceremony, and needlessly expensive, if the proposed sale would be impossible in consequence of the property having been put out of reach and beyond the control of the makers of the bond. Had it been desired to interpose a second claim, the property should have been kept under their control until they had so done. It is not allowable for a claimant to defeat a sale by interposing a claim, and then appropriate the property to his own use, or suffer it to be appropriated by his surety on the claim bond, and then contest, not in the claim case,—the very case appointed by law for the purpose,—but in a suit on the bond, the right of the plaintiff in execution to sell the property. To allow this would be to overlook and disregard the object of the claim laws; that object being to facilitate the trial of the rights of property seized under execution by a sort of intervention on the part of strangers to the execution, instead of leaving them to assert their rights in some separate and independent action. If claims are used merely to get or retain possession of property, and not for the trial of rights to it, they cease to be substitutes for other actions, and only give ground or occasion for some other action, which is the very thing the claim laws are designed to prevent. It would be a perversion of these laws not to hold the claimant and his surety estopped by dismissing the claim, the present action being for a breach of a bond to produce the property, and the question of breach not in any way involving the title, but only the forthcoming of the property at the time and place of sale. Inability to produce it when clearly established is regarded by our law as equivalent to a failure to produce it. This has been ruled several times, and the case of Aycock v. Austin, 87 Ga. 566, 13 S. E. 582, really rules the present case on the main question which we have discussed. Judgment reversed.

PULLMAN'S PALACE-CAR CO. v. MARTIN.

SLEEPING-CAR COMPANY—LOSS OF PASSENGER'S EFFECTS—PLEADINGS.

Whatever diligence a sleeping-car company may owe a passenger in guarding and protecting her while she is asleep in the berth assigned to her, with her money and personal jewelry in her satchel, she having the satchel beside her in the berth, between herself and the wall of the car, if the company so negligently and carelessly guard and protect her while so sleeping that through its negligence the money and jewelry are stolen from her, and thereby wholly lost, she has a cause of action. Although the declaration in the present case is defective in not setting forth any particular act or omission constituting negligence, yet as there was no special demurrer on that ground, and as the declaration is good in substance, there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the declaration upon which the court adjudicated.

Error from city court of Savannah; A. H. MacDonell, Judge.

Action by Elise C. Martin against Pullman's Palace-Car Company to recover for property stolen from plaintiff while occupying a berth in defendant's sleeping car. A demurrer to the declaration was overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jackson & Jackson and Pope Barrow, for plaintiff in error. Harden, West & McLaws, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The declaration is defective in not setting forth any particular act or omission constituting negligence in the defendant company; but there was no demurrer on that ground, and consequently no error in overruling the demurrers upon which the court adjudicated. The points taken in the demurrer were as follows: (1) "The declaration is not sufficient in law." This is a mere general demurrer. (2) "It appears upon the face of the declaration that the plaintiff, by her own carelessness, so far contributed to the injury that but for her carelessness it would not have been sustained." We see nothing in the declaration on which to rest the ground of the demurrer. The plaintiff seems to have been quite careful, and there is no disclosure or intimation to the contrary. (3) "Defendant is held to answer as a carrier in the declaration, and no breach of the contract of carriage is alleged, nor did defendant sustain to plaintiff the relation of carrier." The declaration alleges that the plaintiff was a passenger for hire, paid by her to the defendant, on the sleeping car "America" of the said defendant, from Chattanooga to Macon, by which contract of hiring the defendant undertook to use reasonable and proper diligence in guarding and protecting her from loss by theft while she slept during the usual hours of sleep in the berth assigned to her, by the defendant, on the car. The defendant is not mentioned or described as a carrier, and there is no contract of carriage alleged. The fair import of the allegations is that there was a contract for sleeping-car accommodations, and for care and diligence by the company while the plaintiff occupied the berth assigned to her. Calling herself a passenger was only conforming to the general use of language applicable to one traveling by railway in a sleeping car. We are only replying to this ground of demurrer, and not deciding whether a sleeping-car company is a carrier, and liable as such, or not. (4) "Defendant is not liable in law as an innkeeper is liable, and there is no allegation showing any want of ordinary care on the part of defendant towards plaintiff." It is not essential to a recovery that the defendant should be held liable as an innkeeper is liable, and there is an allegation that the defendant was negligent, and by its negligence caused the plaintiff's loss. There could be no negligence without the absence of that degree of care, whatever it was, which it was the duty of the defendant to exercise; and the declaration alleges an undertaking by the defendant substantially as recited above, and that it so negligently and carelessly guarded and protected the plaintiff that through its negligence her money and jewelry were stolen from her, and thereby wholly lost. We hold that the declaration is good in substance, the test of this being whether the defendant could admit all that is alleged, and escape liability. To what measure of diligence the company must conform will be for determination at the trial; but if, as the declaration alleges, it undertook for hire to use reasonable and proper diligence, and yet was negligent, and that negligence occasioned the loss, we see not why there is any want of a substantial cause of action. The negligence alleged should be understood, we think, as the opposite of that degree of diligence which the company was bound to exercise, for nothing but a failure in that degree would constitute negligence at all, since whoever comes up to the degree of diligence required of him stands acquitted of any negligence whatever relatively to the matter in issue. The court committed no error in overruling the demurrer. Judgment affirmed.

CERTIORARI—WHO MAY BRING—ACTION TO ABATE OBSTRUCTION TO PRIVATE WAY—BY WHOM MAINTAINABLE—PLEADINGS.

1. Where the right to a certiorari is given by statute to either party, each may have the writ in his own favor in the same cause, and the pendency of the first writ sued out is no ground for dismissing the second.

2. Where the claim of right to a private way is founded upon an uninterrupted use of the way for more than seven years by the owners of a certain plantation, their agents, servants, and tenants, the right is not in the agents or servants themselves, but in the owners, who alone are the persons injured by an unlawful obstruction of the way, as against agents and servants, in violation of the right. While their agent, by virtue of section 2207 of the Code, may commence and carry on a proceeding in their names to remove such obstruction, under section 738 of the Code, he cannot institute and carry on a proceeding for that purpose in his own name, either individually or as agent.

3. When, in a petition to remove an obstruction, from a private way, the petitioner alleges that he is the duly-authorized agent of the owners of a certain plantation, naming it; that he has been in the habit of using the private way, describing it; and that the said owners, their agents, servants, and tenants, had been in constant and uninterrupted use of the way for more than seven years before the erection of the obstruction complained of,—the petition is properly construed as being brought by the petitioner, not in his individual right, for he sets out none, but as agent for the owners and in their behalf. This being so, the petition was fatally defective, the petitioner showing no right to maintain the proceeding; and it was error in the ordinary not to dismiss the petition on demurrer.

4. The superior court erred in not sustaining the certiorari brought by the defendant in the proceeding before the ordinary, and, as that proceeding was fatally defective ab initio, this reversal operates to reverse the judgment of the superior court in so far as it sustained the certiorari brought by the plaintiff in said proceeding.

Error from superior court, Chatham county; R. Falligant, Judge.

Action was brought before the ordinary by Arthur B. Elliott, agent, against T. M. Cunningham and others, to remove an obstruction to a private way. To review the judgment of the ordinary both parties brought certiorari in the superior court. The latter court dismissed the writ brought by defendants, and sustained that brought by plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

T. M. Cunningham, Jr., for plaintiffs in error. Edward S. Elliott, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. Under section 4052 of the Code either party may have a writ of certiorari. One may complain that he got too little; the other that the prevailing party was entitled to nothing, or to less than he did get. There seems to be no reason why complaint by the one should prevent the other from complaining also, or why, if both apply in time, the slower one should fail because the faster had been more expeditious than himself. In this case the pendency of the first writ sued out was no ground for dismissing the second. In Shope v. Flite, (Ga.) 16 S. E. Rep. 990, the prevailing party got all he claimed, and nevertheless sought to review by certiorari an error which worked no injury to him on the trial, and which remained open to correction upon the appeal taken by the opposite party. In that case there was no necessity for a certiorari, and therefore it could not be brought.

2. The right to a private way was founded in this proceeding upon an uninterrupted use of the way for more than seven years by the owners of the plantation known as "Prairie Plantation," their agents, servants, and tenants. The claim is evidently of a right of way appendant to the plantation, and not one in gross as to all, any, or each of the persons referred to as persons or individuals. A right of way appendant to certain premises is in the owners of the premises. They are the persons injured by an unlawful obstruction of the way, as against their agents and servants, in violation of the right. Their agent, by virtue of section 2207 of the Code, may commence and carry on a proceeding in their names to remove such obstruction under section 738 of the Code, but he cannot institute and carry on a proceeding for that purpose in his own name, either individually or as agent; not individually, because he has no right; and not as agent, because, as a general rule, (and this case is not within any exception,) the rights of principals must be enforced in their own names, as well where an agent conducts a proceeding in their behalf as where they conduct it in person.

3. The petition in this case is properly construed as being brought by Mr. Elliott, the petitioner, not in his individual right, for he sets out none, but as agent for the owners of the plantation, and in their behalf. He had no right to maintain the proceeding as it was brought, and the ordinary erred in not dismissing the petition on demurrer.

4. For the error indicated, the superior court ought to have sustained the certiorari brought by the Cunninghams, the defendants in the proceeding before the ordinary. That proceeding was fatally defective ab initio, and, as it was the basis of the whole litigation, this reversal here operates to reverse the judgment of the superior court in so far as it sustained the certiorari brought by Elliott, agent, the plaintiff in the proceeding before the ordinary. Judgment reversed.

AKERS v. KIRK et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 24, 1893.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—SCOPE OF AGENCY—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. It was competent for the plaintiff to testify why it was that in the first instance he charged the account sued upon to the defendant's husband.

2. An agency to borrow money for the purpose of clearing off liens from defendant's property does not comprehend an agency to confer with the holder or claimant of one of the liens, and make to him declarations touching the agency, the payment of the debt, the agent's hopes or arrangements as to borrowing money, or the purpose for which it was wanted, no application for any loan being made to such holder or claimant.

3. A conversation between the parties shortly before the trial, in which the defendant made certain admissions, was not rendered inadmissible as evidence by being brought about by the plaintiff through a proposition of settlement, it not appearing that the defendant's admissions were made with any view to a compromise, nor that any terms of settlement were mentioned or discussed.

4. There being evidence tending to show that the defendant's father had authority from her to borrow money for the discharge of the debt sued for in this action, his declarations to persons to whom he applied for loans, as to the purpose for which the money was wanted, were admissible in evidence, the purpose so declared being within the scope and object of the authority, so far as the debt now in controversy is concerned.

5. There being no contest as to the ownership of the premises, it was immaterial who furnished the money to pay for them.

6. Recovery may be had upon evidence that the party sought to be charged was the concealed principal of a person who acted in his own name without disclosing his agency, though this fact be not alleged in the pleadings. If the objection was a good one to the evidence, it should have been presented and insisted upon when the evidence was offered, so that the declaration could be amended and made specific as to the mode in which the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was created.

7. Where the verdict undoubtedly represents the natural equity and sound justice of the case, and there is enough legal evidence to support it, the admission of some illegal evidence in behalf of the prevailing party will not render a new trial indispensable. Both the trial court and the reviewing court being satisfied, the verdict must stand.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; M. J. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Thomas Kirk & Co. against Ella Akers. There was a verdict for plaintiffs, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Kirk & Co. sued Mrs. Akers upon an account, and also to foreclose a lien as contractors and material men for work done on and material furnished for the repairing and building of a certain house belonging to Mrs. Akers. The petition alleged that the lien was filed within 30 days after the work was completed and the material furnished; and that the suit was brought within less than 12 months from the time the work was done and material furnished, and also within 12 months from the time the debt became due. The account attached to the declaration ran from July 23d to November 10th, but the year was not stated. The lien was recorded December 28, 1889. Defendant pleaded "not indebted;" that she made no contract with plaintiffs; that they did not file their lien within the time allowed by law and alleged in the declaration; and that they took personal security for their debt. Plaintiffs obtained a verdict, and defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, to which she excepts. Her motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc.; also that the court refused to nonsuit plaintiffs on motion of defendant; that no case was made out against her, but against her husband, G. W. Akers, for which she was not shown to be responsible, which refusal to nonsuit was error. Error in allowing plaintiff, over defendant's objection, to testify: "We charged the account to G. W. Akers, because we supposed he owned the house, and the house was good for it." Defendant objected, because the lot was not responsible for the improvements, unless the owner procured the improvements, or subsequently ratified them. Because the court permitted plaintiff to testify: "I have had a conversation with her (Mrs. Akers) father since the work was done, in reference to Mrs. Akers paying the debt." Defendant objected on grounds of irrelevancy, and that her father could not bind her. Also because the court permitted plaintiff to testify: "Her father, as near as I can remember, came into my store a month or two after the lien was filed, and he stated to me that he hoped to settle this account in a very short time. He was making arrangements, I think, with Mrs.

Healy to borrow money; and he hoped it would be all satisfactory, and in a very short time he would pay the account." Defendant objected because the court permitted plaintiff to testify: "He [T. J. Shepherd, defendant's father] wanted it [the money he was trying to borrow] to pay us for the work done on the house." Defendant objected on the ground that the testimony was irrelevant, and, further, that the promise, if any, on Mrs. Akers' part to pay G. W. Akers' debt should be in writing. Because on cross-examination of plaintiff he testified: "This morning Mrs. Akers and her father were sitting together, and he went out, and I went in and took a seat by her, and said 'could not this in some way be settled,—this case be settled,—and then this other conversation occurred,' meaning her admission testified to previously by plaintiffs, to wit, 'Mrs. Akers said that her father was trying to borrow the money to pay the debt off.'" When plaintiff so testified, defendant moved to exclude the conversation already testified to by plaintiff, and set out above, on the ground that whatever occurred or was admitted in said conversation could not be received against defendant on this trial as it (the conversation) was looking to a compromise. Because the court admitted the recorded lien. Defendant objected on the grounds that the lien offered was recorded about 60 days after the last item sued on, and the petition set up that the lien claimed was recorded within 30 days of the last item, and that the allegata and probata did not agree; that the substantial part of the material sued for, to wit, the bills of August 13th and July 23d, was furnished over 90 days prior to the record of the lien offered; and that no connection was shown between the items of August 13th and July 23d, and the remaining material or items. Because the court permitted a witness, J. A. Scott, to testify: "I think he [T. J. Shepherd] wanted to pay certain debts with it. He wanted to borrow it for his daughter." Defendant objected on the grounds that there was nothing binding on Mrs. Akers in this testimony and that it was irrelevant. Because the court permitted Scott to testify: "Mr. Shepherd stated that he wanted to remove the liens that were on the property; that was what he wanted with the money." Defendant objected on the grounds that no connection was shown with Mrs. Akers, and that it was irrelevant. Because the court refused to permit defendant to show who furnished the consideration for the lot sought to be subjected to the lien of plaintiffs. As plaintiffs set up that Mrs. Akers and Mr. Akers were concealing an agency, this evidence was proper. Because the court permitted plaintiffs, in rebuttal, to prove by a number of witnesses the length of time Mrs. Akers was around the improvements, and the extent to which she exercised supervision. The error alleged was that plaintiffs had gone into all this kind of evidence in making out their case, and it was not legally or properly in rebuttal. Because petitioner alleged a contract and debt with Mrs. Akers, but the evidence only tended to establish a concealed principal, which was not alleged. Because the allegations of the petition and the evidence introduced thereunder do not agree.

So far as material, the evidence for plaintiff was: The materials mentioned in the account went into the house, which belonged to Mrs. Akers. At the time plaintiffs were making the improvements they thought the house belonged to Akers. Akers came to them, and got them to do the work, and they charged the account to him, because they supposed he owned the house, and the house was good for it. They completed the job, and have never been paid for it. Since the work was done, plaintiff Kirk had a conversation with Mrs. Akers' father, Shepherd, in reference to Mrs. Akers paying the debt. This was a month or so after the lien was filed. Her father came into the store, and stated that he hoped to settle the account in a very short time. He was making arrangements, Kirk thought, with Mrs. Healy to borrow money, and hoped it would be all satisfactory, and in a very short time he would pay the account. Kirk did not think he stated whom he was trying to borrow the money for, only that he wanted to pay off the debt. Did not think he mentioned his daughter's name. He said he wanted it to pay plaintiffs for the work done on the house. Kirk had a conversation with Mrs. Akers in reference to that conversation with her father, and she said that her father was trying to borrow the money for her to pay off what she owed plaintiffs. When the goods were sold, Akers belonged to a firm which stood well, and plaintiffs were perfectly willing to sell goods to Akers, and never asked Mrs. Akers whether he owned the lot or not, nor inquired of any person in whom was the title to the lot, supposing, of course, that the house would be good for the improvements. They gave the credit to Akers and the lot and house combined, supposing he owned the house, and that the house was good for it. Did not see Mrs. Akers at all in the transaction. There are one or two articles in the account charged to Mrs. Akers,—part of a gas fixture, one or two of the small articles she might have purchased. The goods were not sold on the credit of Mrs. Akers, and she did not enter into the computation at all. Plaintiffs afterwards claimed the money from her, because they found out she owned the lot and house. The last item of the account went on the house. The morning of the trial Mrs. Akers and her father were sitting together, and he went out, and Kirk took a seat by her, and said in some way this case can be settled, and then the conversation with her occurred. Kirk thought if they could arrange it without going to a trial he preferred to do so,—meant it should not go to trial if she could pay up, and not have a trial. He did not know, of course, whether she would or not. Had no idea of compromise at all. She told him that her father had been trying to borrow the money to pay this debt, but she did not know why he did not succeed. There was no written contract to furnish the material, nor was there a contract with anybody, except a verbal one of Akers. Mr. Akers came and made the trade to get a stove from plaintiffs, and Mrs. Akers paid for it the following June. Akers left Georgia some time in December, 1889, or January, 1890. Kirk thought he saw Mrs. Akers down at the house, and that she might have been down in the store, but was not certain that she was in the store. Scott testified that Shepherd wanted to borrow some money on the property from Healy for Shepherd's daughter to pay certain debts with it, saying he wanted to remove the liens that were on the property; and Shepherd put into Scott's hands deeds to the lot in question for examination. Shepherd also tried to borrow of Wellhouse money on the property, to pay off the balance due on it, and left a deed at Wellhouse's. Shepherd stated to Wellhouse that he wanted to borrow the money for his daughter. The daughter herself never applied to Wellhouse for a loan. There was evidence also that Mrs. Akers was at the house during part of the time that the work was being done; saw it done, and directed some changes to be made.

For the defendant there was testimony that she was absent from Atlanta during the time the improvements were being made, and when she returned it was all complete, and she directed no changes. She did not agree with anybody to make the improvements, and knew nothing about them. She did not make anybody her agents to have the improvements made. Her husband was not her agent, and she never had any conversation with him in which he said he was going to act as her agent, or anything of that kind. She had no notice of any purchases to be made, knew nothing about building houses, did not employ any workmen to assist in the work, and bought no material. First saw Kirk the morning of the trial, and did not remember ever purchasing anything from him. Did not buy the stove, but did pay for it; but never gave any promise to pay for any other part of the debt. In the conversation with Kirk the morning of the trial he asked her if there was any way the matter could be settled. She told him she did not know, as she knew nothing of it in any way, having been absent from the city. She could not tell anything about it. She told him she believed she had heard something of it, but did not know anything about it, and could not tell him anything more. She did not say anything about her father. His name was not mentioned. Her father was never appointed by her as her agent in any capacity, and she had no knowledge of any transactions he may have had. She has one or two gentlemen in Atlanta who attend to the rents of the place. Her father looks after the business sometimes. Work had just begun on the house before she went away. She did not know they were going to rebuild the house and enlarge it. She had not talked it over with her husband. Some time afterwards,—a good while,—she heard him speak of it, but did not know for certain it was going to be done. Did not know they were going to improve the house. Knew they had commenced it before she left, but did not know it was going to be done. Did not talk to her husband in reference to what was going to be done to the house. Asked no questions as to what was going to be done. Has had her deed to the land in her hands a long time,—longer than six months. Does not remember when she gave it to her father, nor how long it was after the suit was brought. Her father attended to some of that business of borrowing money for her. He was in Atlanta, looking after her business for her. "In this matter, sometimes,—I suppose so— As I was not here, I don't know anything about it. I don't remember whether I turned over my deed to my father, and told him to do the best he could with it, or not." Defendant is using the property since the improvements have been put upon it, and her husband has nothing to do with it, having left Georgia some time ago. "I don't know what I gave father the deed for. I guess he— Nothing." "Don't know whether I let him have it to come to Atlanta and negotiate a loan to pay off this indebtedness on my property or not. Father sorter oversees my property sometimes. Since my husband left, some of the time father has been in charge of my affairs, and I suppose he is here now looking after this suit." "There has been several thousand dollars of improvements put upon the house, and I have not paid one dollar for it." Shepherd testified that Akers, in a letter, told him he (Akers) owed some parties for material furnished and labor done in repairing or remodeling the house, and would like to have Shepherd assist Mrs. Akers in trying to get some money to pay off the indebtedness, suggesting that he thought Shepherd could get some money from Healy, Wellhouse, or others; that he thought, with Shepherd's assistance, he could borrow the money. Shepherd came to Atlanta for that purpose, and saw several parties with a view of getting the money, but was informed that the claims against the property amounted to so much that "we" abandoned the idea. Mrs. Akers did not do anything. Witness talked with her, advised with her. She did not want to incur the property with a mortgage, and no agreement was ever reached from her to mortgage, that witness ever knew of. They were considering the propriety of the thing when witness went to try to get the money to relieve the house of a debt which he believed Akers owed. Witness did not recognize that Mrs. Akers owed anything. The debts were against Akers. Mrs. Akers never constituted witness as her agent to negotiate. They advised together in reference to borrowing this money, and witness attempted to borrow it,—was attempting to borrow it upon her property; that is what they were considering. The object was to take the liens off the property. Witness does not know what facts constitute an agency. Mrs. Akers wanted the parties paid for the work done on the building, but is not herself able to do it. She owns the property, with a 27-room house upon it, etc.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The headnotes, together with the official report of the facts, will render the rulings made in this case sufficiently intelligible. There can be no doubt that the verdict of the jury represents the natural equity and sound justice of the case. The legal ground on which the verdict rests is that Mrs. Akers was the concealed principal of her husband; and that, although the credit was originally given to the latter by Kirk & Co., this was done in ignorance of the agency and of the true ownership of the property. There was enough legal evidence that such was the real truth of the case to uphold the verdict. That some illegal evidence was admitted does not render a new trial indispensable. To every lover of justice the verdict already found is more satisfactory than would be one of an opposite nature. It is impossible not to feel that, as Mrs. Akers, not her husband, obtained the benefit, she or her property ought to answer for it, rather than Kirk & Co. should lose their money. Where all the consideration of a debt reaches a wife as an accession to her separate estate, and she retains and enjoys it, only slight evidence of the husband's agency in contracting the debt is required to charge her. We have examined many adjudications upon somewhat similar cases, but it is needless to cite them; for, while some of them would make for us, they are balanced by others of an opposite tendency. We prefer to rest the case on principle and its own facts. Both the trial court and the reviewing court are content with the verdict. This being so, we decline to order a new trial for slight errors immaterial to the result on the actual merits of the controversy. Judgment affirmed.

CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—RIGHTS CONVEYED—TRESPASS—DAMAGES.

1. Where one owning in fee a tract east of and extending up to the lands of an adjacent proprietor on the west, conveyed in fee a part of his tract, describing in the deed the boundary of the parcel conveyed as running to and then with a certain road on the east side of the adjacent proprietor's lands, (meaning thereby that the road was, or was to be, on and along the west margin of the tract,) and there was in fact no such road, and never had been, the vendee took the fee in so much of the contemplated road as, according to the deed, bounds the parcel conveyed, and the vendor retained nothing but the right to construct, maintain, and use a road at the place designated. A like right would exist in the vendee also, the right being mutual in both parties, and not exclusive in either. Under a similar state of facts similar consequences resulted from a subsequent conveyance by the same vendor of another parcel of his original tract north of and adjoining the parcel formerly conveyed, the deed last made describing the boundary as commencing at a stone corner in the edge of "the road," and running thence around three sides of the parcel, then back to the so-called "road," and thence with said road to the starting point.

2. In the present case the vendor was not the owner of the stone quarried, after the conveyances were made, from the contemplated site of the so-called "road," and had no right to recover the value of the stone, or to recover for any damage done to the freehold. His interest being confined to a mere right of way, with rights incidental thereto, he could recover only for damage, if any, done to his easement, or some of its incidents.

3. Where a private way is used by a trespasser without impeding or interfering with the owner's free and full use of it during the same period, the ordinary measure of damages is the injury done to the way or to the land by the wrongful use, including any increase occasioned thereby in the cost of repairs, the way not being a turnpike or other road kept for tolls or let for profit.

Error from superior court, De Kalb county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by W. H. Arnold against George W. Johnson & Co. for an injunction and other relief. Plaintiff had a verdict, and a new trial was denied. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

Arnold sued Johnson & Co., alleging: He is the owner of a strip of land, part of land lot 168 in the sixteenth district of De Kalb county, the strip being 20 feet wide, bounded on the west by lands of the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company, south by a public road, east by lands of Georgia A. and Sarah V. Kinney, north by lands of petitioner. Johnson & Co., since July 24, 1890, have been quarrying and getting paving blocks on this land without his consent, and after he had notified them to stop, and are appropriating the stone to their own use, and wholly destroying the land or rock for the use of a road; and are driving over and using his lands in hauling stone and other material over and across his land, over his protest.

He asked for damages and for injunction. Defendants claimed under deeds from plaintiff to Georgia and S. V. Kinney and from Georgia A. Kinney to Almand & George. There was a verdict for plaintiff for $200, and, defendants' motion for new trial being overruled, they except. The motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc. Also because the verdict was contrary to the following charge: "If Arnold deeded to the Kinneys land to a road, and in fact there was no road there, then the Kinneys' title was good to the land of the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company, and Arnold would not be entitled to recover." Also because the verdict was contrary to the charge of the court on the measure of damages, movants claiming that the evidence was clear that movants acted under a claim of right; having leased from Almand & George and the Kinneys the land in dispute, and claiming that the evidence clearly showed that the value of the stone taken from the ground claimed by Arnold was only about $31 when taken out. Also because the court charged: "Now, in reference to the road, it is not necessary that every road should be a public road; it is not necessary that every road should be a private way, as it is understood in the law. A man may have a road over his land, and, if there was a road there, and the boundaries in the deed to Mrs. Kinney were to that road, it would go to that road, and go no further; it would not go even to the middle of the road, because it is neither a public road nor a private way established by the law." This was alleged to be error, because there was no evidence that the road was there, the deeds introduced showing no certain boundaries of any road, and all the evidence showing no road or semblance of the same; and because the charge did not state the law correctly. There were two deeds made by plaintiff to Georgia and Sarah V. Kinney. One of them, dated November 13, 1883, conveyed 10 acres, part of land lot 168, bounded as follows: Commencing at stone corner in edge of road dividing lands of Georgia Railroad Company and Sarah V. and Georgia Kinney; thence east alongside of the land of said Kinneys to Arnold's fence; thence north with said fence to a certain stone corner on Arnold's line; thence west along Arnold's line to said road as above mentioned; thence with said road to starting point. The second was dated April 30, 1883, and conveyed 25 acres of land lot 168, with the following boundaries: Beginning at a stone corner on Arnold's land in the edge of a certain road on west side of J. T. Brand's land; thence west to a certain road on east side of lands of Georgia Railroad; thence south with said road to public road from Lithonia to Conyers; thence east with said road to road on west side of J. T. Brand's land; thence south to starting point. The strip of land in dispute was between the land claimed by plaintiff to be the land he deeded to the Kinneys and the land of the Georgia Railroad. The deed of Georgia Ann Kinney to Almand & George, under which deed defendants claim their rights, conveyed to the land of the Georgia Railroad. Also because the court charged that if defendants acted in good faith the measure of damages would be whatever the blocks were worth at that time, less the expense of the labor of turning the rock into blocks. This was alleged to be error, because the amount so found would include the profit of the contractor and value of superintendence and skill, and was confusing to the jury, and in opposition to the further charge of the court when stating that the royalty value was the true measure of damages; and because the charge did not state the law correctly. Because the court charged that, if the use of roads was a commodity, plaintiff would be entitled to recover whatever the use of the road that lay over his land was worth to defendants. This was alleged to be error, because in a suit for damages to land the true measure of damages is not what it is worth to the party using, but how much the use by defendants damages plaintiff; and there was no evidence going to show bad faith in use, and there was evidence showing permission by plaintiff; and because the charge incorrectly states the law. Because the court charged that the jury could find the value of the blocks at the time of conversion, the evidence being that defendants, in quarrying the rough stone, acted under a claim of right, and that at the time of conversion the stone was worth only about $31. It was alleged that the charge stated the law incorrectly. Because the court refused to charge, upon the written request of defendants: "The measure of damages in this case is the actual injury which the value of plaintiff's land has suffered by reason of the entry upon the land and actions thereon." Also the court refused to charge, upon the written request of defendants, that possession under color of title of land for seven years, peaceable, open, and uninterrupted, gives title. Also because the court refused to charge, upon the written request of defendant: "Where land is conveyed as bounded by a road, the grantee takes title to the middle of the road, if there is no express provision to the contrary in the deed." Another ground of the motion was because plaintiff was permitted to testify, over defendants' objection, that he thought when he was selling the land he was selling it to Kinney, and as to an understanding between him and Kinney as to strip reserved. The objection was on the ground that Kinney was not a party to the deed; that it was not shown that Mrs. or Miss Kinney knew anything about this understanding; that the deed was the best evidence as to the intention of the parties to it, and as to what was conveyed by it; and that Almand & George, who owned a half undivided interest in this land, could not be bound by an understanding with Mr. Kinney. Also because the court allowed Arnold to testify as to actions of himself and Kinney at the time of the sale of the land as to putting up stakes 20 feet from the line of the Georgia Railroad. The objection was that this was an effort to go outside of the deed made and drawn by Arnold to show title to this strip; that the deed was the best evidence; and that what was done in the absence of Mrs. and Miss Kinney, between Arnold and Kinney, could not bind them, nor Almand & George, who held under Mrs. Kinney. As to the last two grounds the brief of evidence discloses that Arnold was permitted to testify: "When I sold to the Kinneys I thought I was selling to Mr. Kinney. When the deeds were to be made out I found that they were to be made to his wife and minor daughter. I wrote both the deeds. It was understood between Kinney and myself that this twenty-foot strip was to be reserved by me for road purposes. We put up a stake at each end of the land, showing where it extended. These stakes were put twenty feet east of Georgia Railroad land, at the end next to Conyers road. The line between my land and Georgia Railroad land was original land line. This land sold to Kinneys was intended to go to a point twenty feet from Georgia Railroad line. Several years after I sold land to Kinneys,—I think in December, 1886,—I found that a fence had been put up along the Georgia Railroad line. I went to Mrs. Kinney, and told her that if she would have this fence moved off she could have the rails. She claimed that she had bought the land from me. I got her the deeds to her, and she agreed to have the fence moved. I think this was after stock law went into effect," etc. Also, because the court permitted Arnold to testify as to the amount of the Belgian blocks the quantity of stone claimed to have been taken by defendants would have made, and the value of said Belgian blocks. This testimony was objected to on the ground that if Arnold was entitled to recover in this suit he would only recover the actual value of the stone, the royalty value, and not what it was worth as Belgian blocks, nor for anything else. But what was stone worth? How much was land damaged by taking stone from quarry? Further, because the court admitted in evidence two written notices, over objection that the evidence showed that work had been done before the date of either of the said notices; and because the notices were otherwise irrelevant to the issue, and tended to improperly influence the minds of the jury. One of these notices was dated July 25, 1890, directed to defendants, and signed by plaintiff, and stated that defendants were then quarrying stone on plaintiff's land, 20 feet of land east of Georgia Railroad, etc., the title to which plaintiff held, and defendants were notified to desist from further use and trespass on the land, and from further use or trespass on the stone on the land, without first making agreement with plaintiff about the use of the property. The other notice was dated July 24, 1890, signed by plaintiff, and directed to defendants, and stated that the rock upon which defendants were working was plaintiff's rock, bought and paid for by him, and the deed had never passed out of him; that he therefore asked them not to work upon his rock; that, if this request was complied with, they would show their regard for him and his property, otherwise he would search for his legal remedy. Arnold testified: "I went to Johnson & Co. when they were working on the rock at the corner of this strip. They had the holes drilled in the rock, but they had not moved any of the rock off at that time, and none of it was made into blocks. I told them the strip of land was mine, and they told me they had rented it from Almand & George and Kinney, and that Almand & George were good and were behind them. I gave them notice, and served a written notice on them to quit." Johnson, one of the defendants, testified as to the notices: "When Arnold gave notice, I was sick in bed. I afterwards saw two notices. Mr. Arnold gave me no notice to quit. I was sick at home at the time. It was an advantage to us to go down hill, as we might better work the quarry we had leased from the Georgia Railroad. This land line is an original land line, and I say this to show that we were over this strip when Arnold gave us notice." Coffee, another of defendants, testified: "When Arnold brought me notice I told him we had leased from Almand & George and Kinney, that they were responsible, and for him to see them. At the time we had crossed the strip claimed by him as road." Another witness testified corroborating Coffee as to having crossed the strip and gotten to the Georgia Railroad land before Arnold gave notice. There was other testimony to the same effect.

Candler & Lee, for plaintiffs in error. Geo. W. Gleaton, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The main question involved in this case is one of much interest and some difficulty. It is novel in the jurisprudence of this state, and we rule it by principle and sound legal analogy, and not upon any direct authority. Various decisions, both English and American, bearing upon it in some degree, have been examined. They are not uniform, but point in different directions. Upon principle, and as best subserving public policy, we prefer the trend and tendency of those cases which treat a tract of land having upon its margin a road, either public or private, and either actual or only contemplated, as embracing the fee in the road itself when the tract is conveyed and is described in the deed as bounded by the road, the maker of the deed being at the time of its execution owner of the fee in the road, and the deed purporting to convey the fee in the tract thus bounded. Perhaps the strongest reason in favor of this construction of such conveyances is that there ought to be some general and settled rule applicable alike to all conveyances which bound the premises by a marginal road, and the best general rule in behalf of public policy, and the one most likely to conform to the real intention of the parties in most instances, is that which we have just indicated. It is favorable to the general public interest that the fee in all roads should be vested either exclusively in the owner of the adjacent land on one side of the road, or in him as to one-half of the road, and as to the other half in the proprietor of the land on the opposite side of the road. This is much better than that the fee in long and narrow strips or gores of land scattered all over the country and occupied or intended to be occupied with roads, should belong to persons other than the adjacent owners. In the main, the fee in such property under such detached ownership would be and forever continue unproductive and valueless. True it is that the fee in a road or in one-half of the breadth of land occupied by a road is generally not of much value to an adjacent proprietor, but it goes to enlarge his holding, and probably enhances somewhat the value of his estate, when a detached ownership would usually leave it of no value whatever. At all events, this much may be asserted confidently: that, as the fee in roads has to reside somewhere, it is more desirable that it should be in the owners of the adjacent lands than elsewhere; and, detached ownership being less desirable, or not desirable at all, any actual intention to establish it in a particular instance, or in the great mass of instances, is less likely to exist than is an opposite intention. When, therefore, the owner of a whole fee in a tract conveys the tract, bounding it by a road, he, not owning the land on the opposite side of the road, and not expressly declaring in the conveyance whether he retains the fee in the road or not, may very well be understood as intending to convey the whole tract with the exception of the road as a road merely; that is, as a way public or private, as the case may be. According to the better authorities, the bounding of a tract by the edge or margin of a road will pass the fee to the middle line of the road when the vendor owns the fee on both sides. Upon the like reason, if he owns the fee on one side only, and the whole road is upon the margin of his tract, the proprietor on the opposite side not having any interest in its ownership, a conveyance of the tract as bounded by the margin of the road should, and we think would, pass the fee in the whole road; and, as we have already stated, we think it makes no difference in this respect whether the road spoken of in the deed is already in existence as a way in actual use, or is unopened, and only a road in contemplation. To bound land by a road in describing a tract is to say either that a road is already at the location indicated, or that there may be one there hereafter at the pleasure of the vendor or of the vendee, either or both. When a road is mentioned as a boundary, it should generally be understood that the boundary intended is a road as a road or way, and not as embracing the physical substance of the soil in and under the road all the way down to the center of the earth. In other words, a road as a boundary is the road as an easement, together with such land, or interest in land, as is necessary to full enjoyment of the easement, but no more. To such enjoyment the mere surface of the earth is always essential, and frequently the right to establish and maintain a new artificial surface by excavating in some places and embanking in others. To discuss the present case in detail, and pass under review all its facts, seems needless. What we have already said, read in the light of the official report and of the first headnote, will suffice in respect to the matter of that note.

2. As a necessary consequence of the construction which we have placed upon the two deeds made by Arnold, it results that he was not the owner of the stone quarried from the site of the contemplated road, and that he could recover for no damage done to the freehold as mere land, but only for such as may have been done to his easement or some of its proper and necessary adjuncts as an easement for present or future enjoyment. For instance, it would be some injury to his property in the easement to render it more expensive to open the road, now or hereafter, than it was when he conveyed, if this was occasioned by mining and removing the stone.

3. The action was in part for the wrongful and unauthorized use of a private way elsewhere situated, which belonged to Arnold. What the court charged in relation to the measure of damages for this trespass was not correct. We have indicated our own views on this point in the third headnote. The verdict was not what it should have been, and the court erred in denying a new trial. Judgment reversed.

DAVIS v. WAYNE COUNTY COURT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 25, 1893.)

TAXATION — POWERS OF COUNTY COURT — NOTICE OF TO CONTRACTOR FOR COUNTY WORK.

1. Section 8, art. 10, of the constitution, prohibits the contraction of any indebtedness by a county court which cannot be paid out of the funds on hand or the levy for the current fiscal year, without complying with the other requirements of this section.

2. A county court cannot bind the levies of future years under sections 25, 26, c. 194, Acts 1872-73, to pay for improvements made on roads and bridges, without first submitting all questions in relation thereto to a vote of the people, as required by section 8, art. 10, of the constitution.

3. A contractor or laborer dealing with the county court is charged with notice of the constitutional limitation of its powers, and if he performs labor or does work for it under an unauthorized contract of payment out of the levies of future years, and not out of the funds on hand or the levy for the current fiscal year, he cannot recover for the same in an action of assumpsit, or compel the county court by mandamus to lay a levy for payment thereof, even though the county court has issued certificates, orders, or evidences of debt therefor.

4. An assignee of such indebtedness has no greater rights to enforce payment thereof than his assignor.

Error to circuit court, Wayne county; Thomas H. Harvey, Judge.

Action by R. D. Davis against the county court of Wayne county for mandamus. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Campbell & Holt, for plaintiff in error.
Vinson, McDonald & Thompson, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. This is a proceeding by mandamus, instituted by R. D. Davis, assignee and holder of certain interest-bearing orders issued by the county court of Wayne county during the years 1887, 1888, and 1889, in the circuit court of said county, to compel said county court to provide by levy for the payment thereof, now aggregating, as shown by the judgment, $6,119.87. The county court appeared to the mandamus nisi, and filed its answer, in which it relied—First, on the statute of limitations as to the original cause of action or consideration on which the orders were founded; second, that said orders were in lieu of certain certificates of indebtedness issued by said court under chapter 194, §§ 25, 26, Acts 1872-73, during the years 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885, without first having submitted all questions relating to such indebtedness to a vote of the people, in violation of section 8, art. 10, of the constitution, and were therefore void, as they were but the renewal of an indebtedness originally contracted without authority of law. Plaintiff demurred to this answer, and the court rendered judgment for him on the demurrer, and awarded a peremptory writ of mandamus. From this judgment defendant obtained a writ of error, and now here relies on the same two matters of defense set out in its answer. If the debt, when originally contracted, was lawful, the statute of limitations will not bar it, for the reason that it is a good consideration for a new promise in writing. Code, § 8, c. 104; 2 Tuck. Comm. 152. The question, then, is whether the debt in its inception was unconstitutional and void, and, if so, had the county the authority to ratify the same by issuing new orders and providing a levy for the payment thereof? Sections 25, 26, c. 194, Acts 1872-73, are as follows, to wit:

"(25) When a bridge is necessary within a county or across the boundary thereof, and it is not practicable for the surveyor of the road precinct to have it built or repaired with the means at his disposal, the county court of the county may contract for same, or any part thereof, on such terms as may be agreed upon, and take bond and security from any contractor for the faithful performance of his contract, and pay for the work, in whole or in part, out of the county treasury or by issuing bonds or other evidence of debt, for the same, as may be agreed upon. * * *

(26) In like manner they may contract and pay for making, improving or keeping in order, the whole or any part of any county roads within the county." The several certificates of indebtedness issued thereunder by the county court were in form as follows, to wit: "State of West Virginia, county of Wayne. Wayne O. H., Nov. 14, 1883. Due James Prichard, or order, without offset, the sum of one thousand and seventy-eight dollars and twenty-five cents, payable out of the road fund of Union district number 2, levy for the year 1885, with interest from date, payable at the Catlettsburg National Bank, Catlettsburg, Ky., semi-annually. This evidence of debt is issued under and in the pursuance of an order of the Wayne county court passed at the levy term, July 7th, 1880, under the 25th and 26th sections of the road law of West Virginia, (Acts of 1872-73.) Present: Ten justices and the president of the court. James McQuinn, Pres. P. H. Napier, Clerk. By Chapman Fry, D. C." The orders issued in renewal of the certificates, and on which these proceedings are founded, are in form as follows, to-wit: Part of No. 833: "Wayne Co., W. Va., April 4, 1889. The sheriff will pay to James Prichard or order the sum of eight hundred and eighty-three dollars and 92 cents, allowed by special order entered on the 2nd day of July, 1889, after deducting therefrom the amount of all state, county, and other taxes and levies in his hands for collection against the said James Prichard, 2nd dist. road levy of 1888, with interest from date, payable semiannually at Oatlettsburg National Bank, Catlettsburg, Ky. $883.92. Chapman Adkins, President. Chapman Fry, Clerk." Indorsed as follows: "$883.92. No. 8,954. Chapman Adkins, Pt. Sheriff of Wayne Co., April 4th, 1889, $118.65. Interest paid on the within claim this 2nd day of July, 1889. James Prichard." "Presented June 1st for payment. I never had any part of the levy named in my hands; that being collected before my term of office. Sanders Spurlock, S. W. C." "Value received, I assign the within to R. D. Davis, June 22, 1891. James Prichard."

In the case of List v. City of Wheeling, 7 W. Va. 501, Judge Haymond, in construing section 8, art. 10, of the constitution, holds that "it was not intended to and does not in any wise interfere with or prevent the levying, collecting, and expenditure of taxes annually by authority of law by the proper legal authorities of the counties, * * * and to do and cause to be done whatever is necessary for that purpose, including the making and causing to be made contracts touching the disbursement of the taxes levied and collected annually and the like, and all this without a vote being taken." This construction has been since approved in the cases of Brannon v. County Court, 33 W. Va. 789, 11 S. E. 34, and Spilman v. City of Parkersburg, 35 W. Va. 605, 14 S. E. 279. In the latter case it was held that the "term 'indebtedness' includes every kind of indebtedness, no matter in what manner created, or voluntarily brought about." The constitution plainly forbids the contraction of any debt for any purpose "unless all questions connected with the same shall have been first submitted to a vote of the people, and have received three-fifths of all the votes cast for and against the same;" and it must be presumed that the legislature had this provision of the constitution in mind when it passed the law before quoted, and expected the county court, before creating any indebtedness under it, to comply with the constitutional requirements. The county court may expend the current revenues and accrued funds, and make contracts looking to that end, as that which the court may have the means of paying, either in the treasury or by the current fiscal levy, is not the contraction of debt within the meaning of the constitution, but is merely the appropriation and application of the annual income of the county to the legitimate purposes for which it was accumulated and levied. But where the county authorities attempt to or do bind, without a proper vote of the people, the levies of future years in any manner or for any purpose whatsoever, either by contract, express or implied, their action in so doing is a usurpation of power and an infringement of the constitution, and such contract is null and void, and is not a good consideration for any future order on the funds of any future year, and all orders issued on such consideration alone are invalid. Neither can any action be maintained for the work and labor performed by virtue of such illegal contract, as the law avoids the express, and will not, therefore, raise an implied, assumpsit. It is true the person furnishing the labor and material may have been misled by the county court and the legislative enactment, but this is no reason why a constitutional requirement should be disregarded. It is the supreme law of the state, and binding on all alike, and can neither be legislated away nor contracted away by the county court and individuals. Every citizen, high or low, learned or unlearned, is bound to take notice of and abide by all its provisions, and he cannot enjoy the protection, privileges, and immunities it affords, and then be heard to plead ignorance of its inhibitions. They who deal with the county authorities are charged with notice that such authorities are limited in their expenditures to the annual income, derived from their power to levy taxes annually, and must make their contracts accordingly. To hold otherwise would place it in the power of such authorities to evade the constitutional limitation, and bankrupt every county in the state. City of Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190, 5 Sup. Ct. 820. It is the first duty, and highest obligation thereunder, of every legal tribunal and citizen to preserve the constitution inviolate. For this court not to do so because of a claim meritorious but for its provisions would be only to strike down the instrument that secures its own existence, and dig a pit for its own destruction. The assignee of a non-negotiable illegal claim can stand on no higher ground than the assignor, and he is entitled to no more consideration, even though the assignment be for value. A void contract cannot be made valid by transfer or assignment. For the foregoing reasons it becomes our imperative duty to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, quash the writ of mandamus, and dismiss the petition, at the plaintiff's costs.

STATE v. BOWEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 18, 1893.)

CREDITOR'S BILL—RETURN OF EXECUTION—PRIORITY OF LIENS—RIGHTS OF PLAINTIFF.

1. Where a bill is filed by the state of West Virginia to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by its judgment debtor, and to subject land in the hands of the fraudulent grantee to the payment of its judgment, it is not necessary that an execution should have issued on said judgment, and that a return of nulla bona should be had, before such bill can be sustained. Neither is it necessary to convene the creditors of such judgment debtor, or to allege and show that the rents, issues, and profits of the land sought to be subjected will not pay the debt in five years.

2. In such a suit it is unnecessary to ascertain the liens existing upon the land before making a distribution of the proceeds of a sale of land made therein, and the party filing the bill and setting aside the conveyance is entitled to be first satisfied out of such proceeds, unless there are prior liens.

3. In such a suit the state stands upon the same footing with any other creditor, as to enforcing its lien in equity against the land of a fraudulent grantee.

Appeal from circuit court, Kanawha county; F. A. Guthrie, Judge.

Bill by the state of West Virginia against Alderson Bowen and others to set aside a conveyance of land, as fraudulent. From a decree sustaining a demurrer to the bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Okey Johnson, for the State. Flournoy, Price & Couch, for appellees.

ENGLISH, P. On the first Monday in September, 1891, the state of West Virginia filed its bill in the circuit court of Kanawha county against Alderson Bowen, B. J. Pritchard, and W. B. Spurlock, in which it alleged that on the 11th day of December, 1890, said state, as plaintiff in an action at law brought in the circuit court of said county against William E. Wilkinson, late sheriff of Wayne county, and Alderson Bowen and others, sureties on the official bond of said W. E. Wilkinson, sheriff, etc., for the default of said sheriff, recovered a judgment for $18,747.65, with interest and costs, a copy of which judgment was exhibited with said bill. That an execution on said judgment issued to the sheriff of Wayne county, which was by said sheriff levied on all the real and personal property found by him in the name of the defendants in said judgment, and that said sheriff, under said execution, on the 28th day of September, 1891, sold all of said property, and it did not bring half the amount of said judgment. That Hugh Bowen, the father of the defendant Alderson Bowen, died seised of a valuable tract of land in and near the county seat of Wayne county, containing about 147½ acres. That he left three sons, Hugh Bowen, Alderson Bowen, and Abraham Bowen. That Hugh Bowen sold his interest to Rebecca Trogden. That from ——— to 1873 suit was brought by Rebecca Trogden and William Trogden, her husband, in the county court of Wayne county, in equity, for partition, and the said property was partitioned among those having a right thereto. Copies of the decree for said partition, the report of the commissioners who made the same, and the decree confirming said partition, all of which have been recorded in the records of the office of the clerk of the county court of Wayne county, were filed as a part of said bill. That it would appear from said report of the commissioner that the part set off to Alderson Bowen, the defendant, was 48 acres and 121 poles, which was laid off to him by metes and bounds, and thereafter the same was confirmed, and he held the legal title thereto, without any deed being made to him. That after the default of said W. E. Wilkinson, sheriff, which occurred in 1883 and 1884, there was a fixed liability on said Alderson Bowen to the plaintiff in the full amount of the indebtedness at that time, which, with its interest, amounted to the judgment aforesaid on the 11th day of December, 1890. That on the 11th day of October, 1890, the said Alderson Bowen and wife conveyed to the defendants B. J. Pritchard and W. B. Spurlock about eight acres of the said tract of land, lying at and in Fairview, the county seat of Wayne county, (a copy of which was filed as part of said bill.) The consideration in said deed is $1,075. The plaintiff charged that said $1,075 was not paid to said Alderson Bowen. That at the time of said conveyance the said Alderson Bowen knew that there was liability on him to the state of West Virginia, this plaintiff, for more than he was worth, and that his purpose and intent were, when he made said conveyance, to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiff in the collection of its claims against him; that several years before the time of said conveyance, he had been served with notice of a motion for a judgment against him in the circuit court of Kanawha county, which motion was at the time of said conveyance, and still is, pending and undetermined. All the papers in said motion case were asked to be taken and read as a part of said bill. That at the time of said conveyance the defendants B. J. Pritchard and W. B. Spurlock well knew the liability of said Alderson Bowen to the plaintiff, and well knew that he had been served with the notice as aforesaid. And plaintiff further charged that if the whole consideration named in said deed, $1,075, as therein set out to be paid, was paid, it was greatly inadequate; that said property was then, and is now, worth more than four times the consideration named in the said deed. And plaintiff charged that the object, intent, and purpose of the said Bowen in making said conveyance were to prevent the said property from being sold to pay the said claim he owed the state, to hinder, delay, and defraud the state in collecting its said claim against him; that the said B. J. Pritchard and W. B. Spurlock had knowledge of such intent and purpose, and bought the said property at less than one-fourth of its value, to aid and assist the said Bowen in his said fraudulent purpose. It was again charged by the plaintiff that no consideration was paid, but that it was agreed that they (the grantees) would pay the low price of $1,075 if they were permitted to hold the property. That said suit was brought to September rules, and plaintiff recorded a lis pendens in the office of the clerk of the county court of Wayne county. And said lis pendens, with the evidence of its being recorded, was filed as part of said bill. And the plaintiff prayed that said deed from Alderson Bowen to B. J. Pritchard and W. B. Spurlock might be declared fraudulent as to plaintiff's said claim and judgment against the defendant Alderson Bowen, and the said eight acres of land be subjected to the payment of said claim and judgment, and for general relief.

To this bill the defendants Pritchard and Spurlock demurred (1) because said bill was insufficient in law; (2) because the facts alleged in the bill were not sufficient to invoke the aid of a court of equity, and because plaintiff's remedy, if any it had, was complete at law; (3) because necessary parties were not brought before the court, and the relief prayed for could not, in any event, be granted until they were made parties to said suit; (4) because it appears on the face of the bill that at the institution of the suit no execution or fieri facias on plaintiff's judgment had been returned to the office of the court from which it was issued, showing by the return thereon that no property could be found, from which such execution could be made, it appearing from the bill that said judgment was rendered within two years from the institution of said suit. And said demurrer, having been considered by the court, was sustained, and the plaintiff's bill was dismissed, and from this decree the plaintiff obtained this appeal. The question we are to consider and determine is whether or not the circuit court committed any error in sustaining said demurrer.

Now, while it is true that the state has an additional mode of enforcing its judgments and claims against the real estate of its debtor, provided by statute, which is not conferred upon the private individual, to wit, by levying upon and selling the real estate of such debtor, when there is no question as to the ownership of such real estate, and the title is unobscured by any shadow of fraud, yet when fraud does intervene, and it becomes necessary to invoke the aid of a court of equity to clear away the apparent clouds upon the title, and subject the real estate of such debtor to the payment of its demand, is there anything in the statute which prevents the state, like any other creditor, from having the benefit of section 2, c. 133, of the Code, which provides that a creditor, before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim, may institute a suit to avoid a gift, conveyance, or transfer of, or charge upon, the estate of his debtor, which he might after obtaining such judgment or decree, and he may in such suit have all the relief in respect to said estate which he would be entitled to after obtaining a judgment or decree for the claim which he may be entitled to recover? The state in this case is "a creditor," and that would seem all that would be requisite to entitle it to the benefit of said section. In this case, however, the state appears to have obtained a judgment against the appellees Alderson Bowen and others before it instituted this suit in equity. Can we say that this fact placed the state in any different attitude with reference to the alleged fraudulent conveyance than it would have been in if it was merely the owner of the claim by reason of the default of Sheriff Wilkinson? Section 2, c. 133, was intended to confer upon a creditor who had not obtained a judgment the same right as to instituting a suit to avoid a gift, conveyance, etc., which he might after obtaining such judgment or decree. Therefore, the state, as a creditor, occupied no worse position as to maintaining a suit to avoid a gift, conveyance, etc., but precisely the same, after obtaining such judgment, as it did before; that is as any other creditor. Now, while it is true that section 7, c. 139, of the Code, provides the manner in which a judgment lien may be enforced against the real estate of a debtor, and provides for the distribution of the proceeds of the sale among the lienholders, this section is intended to apply when the title of the real estate sought to be subjected is in the debtor; when it is plain sailing, and no obstruction intervenes. When, however, the creditor is compelled to resort to the provisions of chapter 74 to remove the effects of a fraudulent conveyance, and to use a search light to discover the legal title, new and different rights are accorded to the successful plaintiff. It is not necessary that he should convene the creditors, and make distribution among them, as provided in section 7, c. 139. The property, if subjected, is subjected as the property of the fraudulent grantee, and the conveyance is only held void as to the plaintiff's claim; it being considered valid and binding as between the parties. In a suit of this character the plaintiff calls upon no creditor to join him and assist in the prosecution of the suit. In unearthing the fraud, and subjecting the real estate to the payment of his claim, he strikes out alone and unaided, and is not compelled to call in any one to share in the proceeds, when captured. It is not required to be either alleged or ascertained that the rents, issues, and profits of the land will not pay the debts in five years, before there can be a sale of such land. The fact that such suit may be maintained by a creditor under section 2, c. 133, of the Code, before obtaining a judgment, shows conclusively that a judgment on which an execution has been issued with a return of nulla bona is not required, as a condition precedent to such proceeding, to set aside a fraudulent conveyance as to the creditor. When the plaintiff is successful in a suit of this character, he only uncovers enough of the property fraudulently conveyed to satisfy his demand, and to the portion of the land so discovered and subjected the law gives him the priority of lien. See Claffin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434. But no such right accrues to a creditor who files his bill under section 7, c. 139, to enforce his judgment against his debtor's land.

In the case of Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 210, Snyder, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, draws the distinction between the proceeding to subject land under these utterly different statutes. He says: "It is further contended for the appellants that the court should have referred the cause to a commissioner to ascertain the liens and priorities against the land, and to ascertain whether or not the rents and profits would pay the debts in five years. These contentions are evidently founded upon a misapprehension of the object of this suit. It is not simply to enforce a judgment lien against real estate. Its real purpose is to set aside, as to the plaintiff's debt, a fraudulent conveyance, and subject land in the hands of the fraudulent grantee to the payment of such debt. The deed, though ever so fraudulent as to the creditors of the grantor or the husband who paid the purchase money, is nevertheless valid and binding between the parties to the fraud;" citing Murdock v. Welles, 9 W. Va. 552; Duncan v. Custard, 24 W. Va. 730. " * * * The land should be regarded and sold as hers, and not as the property of her husband. In cases of this character, it is not proper to convene the husband's creditors, nor to rent the land." In the case of Sweeny v. Sugar Refining Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. 431, this court held that "general creditors, who, by bill, answers, or petition, assail a deed of their debtors conveying land as fraudulent, and succeed, have a lien on such land for their respective debts from the filing of such bill, answer, or petition." See, also, Clark v. Figgins, 31 W. Va. 156, 5 S. E. 643.

Not only the object of the suit under these respective chapters of the Code, but the mode of procedure and the results, are so radically different that one cannot be said to repeal the other by implication, or to take its place in affording a remedy. In note 4, pp. 154, 155, of Potter's Dwarries on Statutes, it is said: "The American authorities are of the same effect. A statute can be repealed only by an express provision of a subsequent law, or by necessary implication. To repeal a statute by implication, there must be such a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new law and the old that they cannot stand together, or be consistently reconciled;" citing McCool v. Smith, 1 Black, 459; Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. 342; Com. v. Easton Bank, 10 Pa. St. 448; Harford v. U. S., 8 Cranch, 109; Brown v. County Com'rs, 21 Pa. St. 37. And in McCool v. Smith, 1 Black, 470, Justice Swayne said: "A repeal by implication is not favored. The leaning of the court is against the doctrine, if it be possible to reconcile the two acts of the legislature together; and, where a late statute is absolutely repugnant to a former one only in part, it repeals the former only so far as the repugnancy extends, and leaves all the remainder in force. Van Rensselaer v. Snyder, 9 Barb. 808," etc. We, however, find no difficulty in reconciling these statutes. It is where a bill is filed by a judgment creditor to subject the debtor's land that the proceeding is to be had under section 7, c. 139; but when the object of the suit is to subject to sale land in the hands of a fraudulent grantee, to the payment of a debt or judgment against the fraudulent grantor, then section 2, c. 133, of the Code, applies, and also the provisions of chapter 74 of the Code, whether the plaintiff be the state or a private individual. It is true that in this case the state had obtained a judgment, and an execution had been issued, against W.

E. Wilkinson and others, including the defendant Alderson Bowen, for $18,747.65; and it appears on the face of the bill that said execution was levied on all of the real and personal property found by the sheriff in the name of the defendants, and that it was sold on the 28th day of September, 1891, and did not bring half the amount of said judgment. It is also true that there can be but one satisfaction of the same judgment. But the bill shows that, after selling the property found, a large sum of money—over $9,000—yet remained unpaid; and then the bill contains the usual, and all of the necessary, allegations with reference to the fraudulent conveyance of the land in the bill mentioned by the defendants Alderson Bowen and wife to the defendants B. J. Pritchard and W. B. Spurlock. The judgment appears to have been rendered against the defendants on the 11th day of December, 1890, and the deed was made on the 11th of October in the same year; so that the deed must have been made after the process was served.

As to the third point of the demurrer, to wit, the want of necessary parties, the defendants do not suggest who are necessary parties; but counsel for the appellees, in their brief, in support of said point, contend that the sheriff and the other 17 sureties on his bond should have been made parties to the suit. The bill, however, shows that over $9,000 of the judgment remains unpaid, and is seeking to subject this tract of land in the hands of Pritchard and Spurlock as fraudulent grantees of Alderson Bowen. Said Bowen, Spurlock, and Pritchard are all made parties; and if the entire judgment is made out of this land the other judgment debtors could not complain, as it would be in their favor, and not against them. But this question has been settled in this state in the case of Howard v. Stephenson, 33 W. Va. 116, 10 S. E. 66. In that case, Howard, special receiver, had a judgment against Stephenson & Rothschild; and, in a suit in chancery to subject the land of Stephenson to the payment thereof, it was held that it was unnecessary to make Rothschild a defendant, as the plaintiff sought no redress against him or his property. No redress is sought in this case against the sheriff, Wilkinson, or his other sureties against whom the judgment was obtained. If it is said that the defendant Bowen could complain of making this judgment off of his land, the answer is that he is before the court, and so are Spurlock and Pritchard, and under the ruling in Howard v. Stephenson no other parties were necessary. And, so far as we can perceive, the plaintiff, in formulating its bill, having made all the requisite allegations, our conclusion is the court committed an error in sustaining said demurrer; and for these reasons the decree complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with costs.

CLATOR v. OTTO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 11, 1893.)

PAROL EVIDENCE—LANDLORD AND TENANT—TERMINATION OF LEASE.

1. In order to exclude evidence of oral agreement on the ground that the parties later entered into a written contract, the oral agreement must relate to the same agreement embodied in the written contract.

2. Where a lease provides that for nonpayment of rent the lease shall be forfeited and surrendered on 10 days' notice, and the lessor demands rent in arrear, and the lessee does not demand notice and pay, but agrees to end the term and surrender his lease, though there was no other notice, the tenancy is thereby ended, and the lessor becomes entitled to possession.

Error to circuit court, Ohio county.

W. W. Arnett and Denis O'Keeffe, for plaintiff in error. B. B. Dovener, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Clator brought an action before a justice of Ohio county for unlawful detention of certain premises in the city of Wheeling against Otto. The case was appealed to the circuit court, and, Clator recovering judgment there, Otto has brought the case here. By one deed of lease Clator leased Otto a certain house for three years, and by another, made later, he leased Otto an adjoining house for two years.

Otto's first assignment of error is that the court refused to exclude from the jury testimony of conversation between Clator and Otto tending to show a surrender of the leases by Otto, and this is based on the idea that what is called a written assignment was made between them shortly after this conversation, and that their negotiation resulted in that, and the prior oral agreement merged in it, and the writing speaks the entire contract. This writing and the agreement to surrender were separate matters. Otto owed Clator a large amount of rent in arrear, and, unable to pay, he assigned to a trustee, not the leases, but liquors, furniture, and other personalty, with power to continue the saloon and restaurant business until the trustee could sell this property; and this assignment is confined to that, and does not touch the leases. The surrender of the leases was another thing. He agreed to give them up because he was unable thereafter, as he had been before unable, to pay rent. He assigned the property to pay past rent,—wholly different matters, different contracts. Therefore this assignment could not exclude the oral agreement to surrender. I think the evidence shows not only an agreement to surrender, but an actual surrender of possession under it. Clearly, Otto agreed to surrender, and he allowed Clator and the trustee to go into the houses and take possession, giving Clator the keys; and he recognized Clator as in possession. When parties applied to rent or buy the premises, he referred them to Clator, and told them Clator had control; and when asked by them when they could get possession if they rented of Clator, he said, "At once," or, "Any time." He changed his mind afterwards, but it was an afterthought. The jury found a verdict consistent with the claim of surrender, and very properly so. There was much evidence tending to show delivery of possession in execution of the agreement to surrender, and we could not go behind the verdict as to that. Moreover, the leases contained a clause of forfeiture for nonpayment of rent and for surrender on notice, and, though there was no notice, yet Clator demanded rent, and told Otto he would have to shut up the place by a distress, or he (Otto) would have to make an assignment; and he agreed to surrender the leases, and assign property to pay back rent; and I incline to think this a waiver of notice, and that, even without delivery of possession, Clator could, under the forfeiture provision, recover, outside the surrender, as he acknowledged rent in arrear, and on demand virtually recognized a forfeiture, and agreed to give up his term.

Another assignment of error is that the court refused to strike out the plaintiff's evidence. Here it is claimed that Otto had paid rent to January 1, 1886, and the suit was brought December 30th. This contention is based on the fact that the attorney drawing the trust made a pencil statement of rent due, and included rent to January 1st, and this was paid out of the sale of the property. But that was by consent put into the statement because the trustee would still have to occupy the premises to carry on the business, and it was estimated distinctly by Otto and Clator as a part and parcel of the expenses attending the execution of the trust. When the surrender was made, that ended the tenancy and all claim to further rent. Greider's Appeal, 5 Pa. St. 422; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 518. There was no renewal of the leases. The inclusion of rent to 1st January would not operate as such. If, indeed, too much rent was charged, it would not nullify the effect of the surrender in terminating the tenancy. In fact, the inclusion of this rent was not under the tenancy, but part of the expenses under said trust.

The third assignment of error is that there was no evidence to show the surrender of part of the leased premises. Clearly, the surrender related to both leases, both houses. Possession of both—the entire leased premises—was delivered. The evidence very fairly shows this. The jury so considered it, and so found. The plaintiff recovered before the justice and the circuit court. The clear justice of the case on the evidence is with him, and we affirm the judgment.

POLING et ux. v. PARSONS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 4, 1893.)

REDEMPTION FROM TAX SALE.

1. A person seeking to redeem land sold for taxes should make a legal tender of the proper amount of actual, lawful money; but that will be excused if the purchaser place his refusal, not upon the nontender of actual money, or because the amount is not the proper amount, but on the distinct ground that the party offering to redeem has no authority or right to do so.

2. Statutes allowing redemption of lands sold for taxes must be liberally construed in favor of persons entitled to redeem.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Tucker county; William T. Ice, Judge.

Action by Nathaniel Poling and Mary A. Poling against Ward Parsons. Plaintiffs had a decree, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellant.

BRANNON, J. Appeal from Tucker county circuit court, by Ward Parsons, from a decree annulling a tax deed to Parsons for land of Mary A. Poling. The question of fact in the case is whether a tender or offer to redeem was made. The evidence is substantially confined to the husband of Mrs. Poling, on the one side, and Parsons on the other; and as it is flatly contradictory, and involves their credibility, though the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs, we may decide the case upon the principle stated fully by Judge Snyder in Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639,—that where the depositions are conflicting, and different minds might reach different conclusions upon them, the appellate court will decline to reverse the chancellor, even though the appellate court might have come to a different conclusion, had it acted in the first instance. It is a safe rule, and has been many times followed in this court. Doonan v. Glynn, 28 W. Va. 715; Prichard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. 461; Frederick v. Frederick, 31 W. Va. 566, 8 S. E. 295; Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 160, 10 S. E. 375; Bartlett v. Cleavenger, 35 W. Va. 719, 14 S. E. 273. Also, Tennant v. Headlee, 31 W. Va. 591, 8 S. E. 544; Yates v. West Grafton, 33 W. Va. 510, 11 S. E. 8; Reed v. Nixon, 36 W. Va. 683, 15 S. E. 416; Reynolds v. Gawthrop, 37 W. Va. 13, 16 S. E. 364,—enforce the rule. Shall this court say that one rather than the other of these two witnesses, both subject to the bias of interest, spoke the truth? Before overruling the circuit court in such a case, we should have strong and fixed conviction that it erred. Without such strong and decided conviction, it would be unsafe to do so.

The decree below found that a proper legal offer and tender to redeem had been made. Poling swears that, as agent for his wife, he went to Parsons to redeem the land, took the money out of his pocketbook,—out of his pocket,—and said he wanted to settle the taxes, and did not want any trouble about it, and Parsons said he was not the one to redeem, and that he (Parsons) did not want anything to do with him, (Poling,) and rode away; that he did not show Parsons the money, as he would not let him do so, but rode off; and that he expected Parsons to give the amount necessary to redeem. Suppose this true, as the court must have held. I shall not say that it was a perfect legal tender, because the money was not itself shown, nor the proper or any fixed amount tendered, but enough was done to have the same effect. This court, in Koon v. Snodgrass, 18 W. Va. 320, in a tax-sale case, said that "the proper mode of making a legal tender is to actually produce and proffer the exact sum due; but this may be dispensed with by the party to whom the money is to be paid, when he refuses to receive the money, not on the ground that the money is not produced, nor on the ground that the amount produced was not the exact amount, but on some collateral and entirely distinct ground." It will not do, therefore, to say in this case that the very money itself was not produced to Parsons' sight, or that the proper amount was not produced, as he declined to receive it,—denied Poling's right to act in the redemption of his wife's land, when he was her agent, and himself had initiate curtesy in the land,—and rode away, and cut short every further act which the law could require at Poling's hand.

In Danser v. Johnsons, 25 W. Va. 380, a creditor entitled to redeem went to the agent of the purchaser, and offered to pay the amount necessary to redeem the land, and had the money, and handed a receipt to the agent to sign; and he refused, saying he did not know that the creditor had right to redeem. That case, like this, depended on two witnesses,—one saying he produced; the other, that he did not produce or offer, the money,—and this court seems not to have considered that material, and held the offer to pay the money sufficient, because the party denied the right to redeem, and that this justified payment to the clerk. In Townshend v. Shaffer, 30 W. Va. 176, 8 S. E. 536, a check for the money to redeem was sent to the purchaser by mail, and he returned it with a note, saying: "I cannot accept this, and release the land. Will see you soon." The court held the receipt of the check was equivalent to a tender, and operated as a redemption.

After this meeting between Poling and Parsons, Poling deposited with the clerk of the county court a proper sum to redeem the land. Poling states that on another occasion, in front of the courthouse, he offered to pay the money to redeem. Thus it appears that the plaintiff had a sincere intention, and made diligent effort, to redeem,—to do what the law required,—and nothing but the exaction from her of the most rigid and technical legal tender can deprive her of her land,—perhaps her only home,—29 acres, worth $200, for the small sum of $3.15.

The cases cited above evince a liberal disposition in the courts to effectuate a well-meant effort or offer to redeem, and excuse a dry, strict, legal tender, but they are conformable to the law relating to tender. This liberality is not mere arbitrary license, but follows the highest authority. The United States supreme court, in Dubois v. Hepburn, 10 Pet. 1, laid down the law to be that the law authorizing redemption of land sold for taxes ought to receive a liberal and benign construction in favor of those whose estates will be otherwise divested; that the purchaser suffers no loss, having knowingly bought an estate liable to be defeated by redemption; and that it would seem not necessary for the purposes of justice, or to effectuate the object of the law, that the right to redeem should be narrowed down by strict construction. It has been not untruly said that the sale of land for taxes is the instance in which free government verges most nearly on tyranny, and that the law for redemption, the last chance of the citizen to save his property from forfeiture, should be applied liberally, as a remedial statute. It was held in Danser v. Johnsons, 25 W. Va. 385, that redemption statutes ought to be construed liberally in favor of persons entitled to redeem. Cooley, Tax'n, 363.

Two children heard the conversation between Poling and Parsons, and say they saw no money or pocketbook, but knew they talked about land. They are able to give no details, and their evidence is without effect. The testimony of Poling as to his offer to pay receives corroboration in the fact that on the same day of the offer, or next day, he deposited the money to redeem with the clerk. He would not be likely to do so, unless Parsons had refused to allow redemption. The fact tends to show that he prepared the money for redemption, and sought Parsons for that purpose, and made the offer to do so. We cannot see our way safely to reverse the decree, and it is affirmed.

GREER v. WILSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 25, 1893.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—SUMMONING JURY— WAIVER OF IRREGULARITIES.

1. When either party demands a jury, it is error for the justice, without consent of parties, to issue a venire facias for such jury before the summons to commence the suit has been served and returned, and the time fixed for the appearance of defendant has arrived.

2. But where the defendant appears and has the case continued, and the jury thus summoned is adjourned to the time thus set for trial, he will be held to have waived such irregularity in the writ of venire facias, it appearing that he was not injured thereby.

Error to circuit court, Roane county; V. S. Armstrong, Judge.

Action by J. M. Greer against Wilson & McMillan. From an order denying a writ of certiorari to review a judgment in a justice's court, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

R. F. Fleming and Armstrong & Boggess, for plaintiffs in error. J. G. Schilling, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. This is an appeal from a final order of the judge of the circuit court of Roane county, refusing to allow and award defendants, Wilson & McMillan, a writ of certiorari to the judgment of plaintiff, J. M. Greer, obtained against them before a justice. Two grounds of error are assigned: (1) No jury for the trial before the justice was demanded at the time prescribed by law, but the venire was illegally issued on the application of the plaintiff before the return day of the summons, and that defendants' motion, afterwards made, to quash the venire facias, should have been sustained by the justice. (2) Because the verdict of the jury was contrary to the evidence, unjust, and unwarranted, and defendants' motion for a new trial should have been granted.

The evidence on the trial before the justice is certified, and presents no ground for reversal for the second cause of error assigned. In the case of Hickman v. Railroad Co., 30 W. Va. 296, 303, 4 S. E. 654 and 7 S. E. 455, sections 68 and 72 are construed as if they were read together, as follows: Section 68: "When a defendant does not appear the plaintiff cannot recover without proving his case. The justice if the process has been served on the defendant shall in such case proceed to hear the allegations and evidence of plaintiff and render judgment as the right shall appear." But (section 72) "either party to a civil action before a justice when the value in controversy or the damages claimed exceed twenty dollars, or the possession of real estate is in controversy, shall be entitled under the regulations herein prescribed to a trial by six jurors, if demanded." What are "the regulations herein prescribed?" Section 73: "The demand must be made before the justice has commenced an investigation of the merits of the case by the examination of any witness or the hearing of other evidence." Section 74: "The party demanding the jury must deposit with the justice six dollars to pay the fees of such jury," etc.; but (section 68) "on the day the summons is returnable the defendant on making oath may demand of right a continuance of the cause for seven days," and, (section 75,) "when a jury is to be called, the trial shall be postponed until the time fixed for the return of the jury, which if neither party show good cause for a later day shall be on the same day or within the next two days." If this order in reading the sections of chapter 50 which relate to the question in hand is correct, then it is clear as a necessary inference that the plaintiff had no right to demand, or the justice to issue, a venire for a jury before the return day of the summons. Why should a defendant who intends, perhaps, to confess judgment for plaintiff's claim of $24, at the return day have an additional item of $6 saddled upon him at the discretion of the plaintiff, and he have a right to exercise such discretion, before there can possibly be any need of or use for a jury? But it may be said that plaintiff has no knowledge of such intention on the part of defendant, and that he wants to have a jury ready and waiting for the case to be called. But he did know that defendant, if he would make oath that he had a just defense, could demand a continuance of the case for seven days as matter of right, and that it is not right to force him into trial on pain of having extra jury charges to pay, no matter how unprepared he may then be to put in properly a statement of his credits or set-offs; so that if he takes the seven days the law allows him to take to hunt up, and make out, and put in proper order for filing, such statement, he has to do so under this additional penalty of unnecessary costs which the plaintiff has seen fit to impose ex parte, and in advance of any need for it. But the objection to awarding a venire for a jury at the time of or immediately after the issuing of a summons, when there is as yet not only no matter in difference for them to try, but when it is not known that the summons can be or will be served at all, stands upon the still higher ground of public policy. There should be no such temptation to the plaintiff to select his own jury before the defendant even knows that a suit has been commenced. These considerations show very clearly that the statute should be given its plain, common-sense meaning, that a jury of six to try the case should not be ordered to be summoned until the summons in the suit has been served and returned, and the time fixed for trial has arrived. But none of these things has any application to this case, for the reason that only three of the six who were thus summoned ex parte in advance attended, for the record shows that three others helped to make up the jury who tried the case, and that without challenge or objection to them individually; nor is any unfitness or misconduct on the part of this jury alleged or shown. The defendant did not make his motion to quash the venire when the case was first called for trial, but appeared and had it continued for seven days. The jurors summoned were then present in obedience to the summons, and that was the proper time for his motion; and, having passed it by, he was properly held to have waived it. There is no error in the record, and the order of the circuit judge refusing the writ of certiorari is affirmed.

UNITED STATES BAKING CO. v. BACHMAN et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 4, 1893.)ATTACHMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON.

1. The proceeding by way of attachment being a statutory remedy, and in derogation of the common law, the statute must be pursued strictly in framing the affidavit upon which the attachment is based.

2. In proceeding against a corporation by way of attachment on the ground that it has failed to comply with the requirements of section 37, c. 54, of the Code, in reference to the appointment of a person by power of attorney to accept service of process, etc., the affidavit must show that the requirements of said section have not been complied with, before an order of attachment can issue by reason of such failure to appoint such person.

3. In a proceeding under section 152 of chapter 50 of the Code to try the right of property, where the property levied on under the attachment has been sold and delivered by the party against whom the attachment issues to a third party, and the plaintiff in the attachment has no claim to the property other than that created by such levy, and such order of attachment appears to have been issued upon an irregular or insufficient affidavit, the order of attachment should be quashed, and the property restored to the possession of said third party.

4. A defective affidavit for an order of attachment cannot be supplemented by subsequent affidavit or proofs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Ohio county.

Action by the United States Baking Company against Peter Bachman & Sons and the Wheeling Bakery Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and Bachman & Sons bring error. Affirmed.

White & Allen, for plaintiffs in error.
Erskine & Allison, for defendant in error.

ENGLISH, P. This was a petition filed by the United States Baking Company under section 152, c. 50, of the Code, to try the right of certain property levied on under an attachment sued out by P. Bachman & Sons against M. Merkel and the Wheeling Bakery Company before W. H. Caldwell, justice of the peace for Madison district, Ohio county. The United States Baking Company, in its petition, alleges that it was when said attachment was issued, and has been ever since, the owner of the property levied on by virtue of said attachment; while P. Bachman & Sons, on the other hand, claim that they are entitled to said property by virtue of the lien created by the levy of said attachment. The Wheeling Bakery Company moved to quash the attachment, which motion the justice overruled, and the justice, after hearing the evidence, ordered that the officer who levied said attachment do deliver the same to the United States Baking Company, and from this judgment P. Bachman & Sons appealed to the circuit court of Ohio county, which court affirmed the judgment of the justice, and ordered that the property be delivered to the United States Baking Company. The defendants P. Bachman & Sons moved the court to set aside the order and judgment, and to grant them a new trial, which motions were overruled. Said P. Bachman & Sons excepted, and obtained this writ of error.

The first error assigned and relied upon by the plaintiffs in error is to the action of the court in refusing to dismiss said petition of interpleader and the proceedings thereunder. In considering the questions raised by this assignment of error, let us first inquire into the validity of the attachment proceedings under which said P. Bachman & Sons claim a lien upon the property in controversy, as their only claim to the property is by virtue of said attachment. Was the affidavit upon which the attachment was predicated sufficient to authorize an attachment? Section 193, c. 50, of the Code, under which this attachment was issued, provides that, "if the plaintiff at the commencement of his action or at any time during its pendency and before judgment show to the justice by his own affidavit or the affidavit or affidavits of one or more credible persons among other things that the defendant is a foreign corporation or a nonresident of the state, such justice having jurisdiction of the action, might, subject to the provisions contained in the following section, issue an order of attachment," etc; and section 37, c. 54, of the Code provides that "every such corporation [the one against which this attachment was sued out being organized under said chapter] shall within one hundred days after organizing by power of attorney duly executed appoint some person residing in the county in this state wherein it has the office mentioned in the next preceding section, to accept service on behalf of said corporation, or any process or notice, the said power of attorney shall be filed and recorded in the office of the clerk of the county court of the county in which the attorney resides and the admission to record of such power of attorney shall be deemed evidence of a compliance with the requirements of this section. And whether such agent accept the agency or not the service of process upon such person so appointed shall be legal and binding on the corporation. Any such corporation failing to comply with such requirements shall during the continuance of such failure forfeit not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars for every six months that such failure continues; and its property real and personal shall be liable to attachment in like manner as the property of nonresident defendants." Now, the effort was made in suing out this attachment to show that the plaintiff was entitled to an order of attachment against the Wheeling Bakery Company as a corporation, under said last-named section. Did the affidavit filed by the plaintiff in this case show to the justice that said Wheeling Bakery Company or its property, real or personal, were liable to attachment in like manner as the property of a nonresident defendant? The affidavit upon which said attachment is predicated does not show when said Wheeling Bakery Company was organized, and by the statute it was allowed 100 days after its organization to appoint an agent or attorney under said section before it would be liable to an attachment thereunder; and, for anything that appears in said affidavit, at the time the same was made the property of said company may not have been liable to an attachment for the reason that 100 days had not then elapsed since its organization. The proceeding by way of attachment is a statutory remedy in derogation of the common law, and in order to create a lien the provisions of the statute must be pursued strictly; and in order to authorize an order of attachment it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show by the affidavit presented that the defendant corporation had not within 100 days after its organization, by power of attorney duly executed, appointed some person residing in the county wherein it has its principal office to accept service on behalf of said corporation of any process or notice, and that the failure to appoint such person continues if the said 100 days has elapsed before the property, real and personal, would be liable to attachment in like manner as the property of nonresident defendants; and, while it is true that a failure to appoint such person by power of attorney, as required by said section, would render the property of such corporation liable to an attachment as the property of a nonresident defendant, the affidavit would not be in accordance with the requirements of said section 37 of chapter 54 if it merely stated that the defendant was a nonresident. Neither can it be regarded as sufficient when it simply states that the Wheeling Bakery Company has failed to appoint and have, according to law, in the state of West Virginia, a person to accept service on its behalf, and on whom service might be had of process or notice against it according to law, for the reason that it does not appear by the affidavit when the defendant company was organized, and it does not appear that more than 100 days had elapsed since its organization; and, unless this is made to appear by the affidavit, it may be true that such person had not been appointed, as required by law, to accept service, etc.; and yet the property of said company would not be liable to attachment, because the failure to make such appointment would not appear to be of such duration as to make such property liable to attachment. In the case of Mantz v. Hendley, 2 Hen. & M. 308, the court held that an attachment irregularly issued ought to be quashed ex officio by the court to which it is returned, though bail be not given, nor any plea filed by the defendant; and in like manner the court ought to quash it on errors in arrest of judgment after pleadings and a verdict for the plaintiff. See, also, Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. 409, (fourth point of syllabus,) where this court held that, "the remedy by attachment being authorized alone by statute, and being in derogation of the common law, and being, moreover, summary in its effects, and liable to be used oppressively, such statute will be strictly construed. The preliminary affidavit required by the statute must contain each element thereby prescribed." The affidavit under consideration contains none of the allegations required by section 193 of chapter 50 of the Code as to fraud or nonresidence, and, as it does not comply with section 37 of chapter 54 of the Code, which is requisite to show that the property of the baking company was liable to attachment under that section, we must regard it as insufficient to authorize an attachment. The affidavit must be sufficient in itself and on its face to authorize the order of attachment; it cannot be supplemented by additional proofs or affidavits. See Cosner's Adm'r v. Smith, 36 W. Va. 788, 15 S. E. 977. The only claim asserted by said P. Bachman & Sons to the property in question being by reason of the levy of said order of attachment, and that being, as we think, irregular, and unauthorized by law, constitutes no lien upon said property; and, as there is no controversy between the Wheeling Bakery Company and the United States Bakery Company as to the ownership of the property, the latter being in possession, and the proof showing that it had belonged to the latter since the 10th day of September, 1890, we think the court committed no error in ordering said property delivered to said United States Baking Company, and the judgment complained of must be affirmed, with costs and damages.

BUCKEY v. BUCKEY et al., (three cases.)
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 11, 1893.)

DEED—CAPACITY OF GRANTOR—EVIDENCE.

1. The presumption of law is that the grantor in a deed was sane and competent to execute it at the time of its execution.

2. Old age is not of itself sufficient evidence of incapacity to make a deed.

3. The evidence of an officer taking the acknowledgment to a deed, or of a person present at its execution, is entitled to peculiar weight in considering the grantor's capacity.

4. The time of the execution of the deed is the material or critical point of time to be considered upon the inquiry as to the grantor's capacity.

5. A grantor in a deed may be extremely old, his understanding, memory, and mind enfeebled and weakened by age, and his action occasionally strange and eccentric, and he may not be able to transact many affairs of life, yet if age has not rendered him imbecile, so that he does not know the nature and effect of the deed, this does not invalidate the deed. If he be capable, at the time, to know the nature, character, and effect of the particular act, that is sufficient to sustain it.

Appeal from circuit court, Randolph county; William T. Ice, Judge.

Action by John J. Buckey against Charles N. Buckey, and two actions by the same plaintiff against Alpheus Buckey, to set aside three conveyances of land. The three cases were tried together, and plaintiff had decree annulling two of the conveyances. Charles N. Buckey appeals. Reversed in part.

L. D. Strader, Leland Kittle, and John Brannon, for appellant. Dayton & Dayton, W. L. Kee, and A. M. Poundstone, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. John J. Buckey brought three suits in equity in Randolph circuit court,—one against Charles N. Buckey, to annul a deed made by George Buckey to Charles N. Buckey, and two against Alpheus, to annul two deeds made by George Buckey to Alpheus Buckey,—and, by a decree made in the three causes heard together, the deed to Charles N. Buckey and one of the two made to Alpheus Buckey were annulled. Charles N. Buckey appeals. John J. Buckey, in brief of counsel, alleges error in the failure of the decree to cancel the other deed to Alpheus Buckey, and asks that in that respect the decree be reversed.

The ground of attack upon these deeds is incapacity in George Buckey, from old age, to make them. He died in 1888, aged 92 years. On September 10, 1883, when 87 years old, he made a deed to Charles N. Buckey, conveying about 20 acres of land, on which stood a mill, Charles N. Buckey being a grandchild, only son of Emmet Buckey. On September 15, 1880, George Buckey made to his son Alpheus a deed conveying to him a parcel of land embracing his residence and tanyard. On October 30, 1883, George Buckey conveyed to this same son, Alpheus, a parcel of seven acres of land and one-half of two lots in the town of Beverly. These are the deeds assailed in said suits. As it would answer no purpose of utility for future cases, in a legal point of view, I shall not detail the many pages of evidence bearing on the mere question of fact of the mental capacity of George Buckey. George Buckey followed, during a long life, the business of a tanner. He was in business, industrious, prudent, and successful. He was moral and religious, bore a good character, and, so far as I see, of regular, plain, temperate habits. He was a man of decided intelligence, and acquired a considerable property in real estate, though he was not wealthy. When he made these deeds he had living four sons and four daughters and a grandson, the son of his dead son. The evidence cannot be said to conflict as to specific facts, but, in opinion as to George Buckey's mental capacity to transact business or make these deeds, the numerous witnesses on the two sides widely differ. I can hardly say which on that subject might be said to have the preponderance. Perhaps in number there may be more on the side of his incapacity; but there are nearly as many on the other side, and when we look at the character of the evidence, the opportunity and means of observation, the business experience and capacity of the witnesses, and their ability to judge as to the party's competency, I am impressed that the evidence to sustain competency is preponderating in force and weight. This is in my mind so, and would be most decidedly so, were it not for the evidence of Dr. George W. Yokum, a long-time neighbor, family physician, and intimate acquaintance of George Buckey, who is settled in opinion that he was incapable of making the deeds, because of "senile dementia intensified." But there is the son of Dr. George W. Yokum, Dr. Humboldt Yokum, a graduate of Jefferson Medical College, who from his childhood had known George Buckey, raised a close neighbor, seeing and conversing with him very often, and in July, 1882, made a settlement of his father's accounts with Buckey, and took Buckey's note for the balance, and who expresses an opinion to the contrary. He is younger and less experienced than his father, it is true, but he seems intelligent and prudent in statement. I mention these witnesses because they are physicians, the only medical witnesses. The list of witnesses upholding George Buckey's mental capacity include the clerks of the two courts, a former sheriff, two notaries, (one an attorney,) and another attorney, all close neighbors and intimate acquaintances, whose business brought them in contact with all sorts of men, and rendered their opinions of special weight, and who had had, through years, business with Buckey. A minister of the gospel, who was frequently at his house about the dates of the deeds, and had business, social, and religious conversation and intercourse with him, is also emphatic in favor of his competency. I have already said that there is very considerable opinion evidence to the contrary. It is shown that in June, 1878, George Buckey's wife died, and it had a very depressing effect upon his mind. He said to his son-in-law, "I am in trouble; I don't know what to do." This is urged as a strong reason to impeach the old man's competency. I regard it as not irrelevant, but by no means of decisive or telling import. The loss in old age of the partner of a long life would naturally cast dark and lowering clouds over the old man's short remnant of life, and render him oftentimes, when brooding over the change, vacant and oblivious to those things of the active, business world engaging the younger, but shut out at times from him. But this would be the case with any of us. It is to be expected. He did and said eccentric things. When his wife had been laid in her coffin for burial, he would have them to lay her on her side, and, a daughter having had the corpse changed back to its former position, he came into the room, and did not seem to notice it. He stated that he was in Washington and saw Guiteau and President Garfield, when the latter was dead, and that Guiteau was a bad-looking man. He was not at Washington at all. This lamentable occurrence, the murder of President Garfield, possessed the mind of every person, month after month, during the illness of the president and the trial of his assassin. Is it strange that it engrossed this aged man's thoughts? It is an observed fact, entirely consistent with sufficiency of intellect to execute a valid deed, that the old frequently mistake fancy for reality, thinking they remember things never really in the memory as facts, but wholly the creation of imagination. On one occasion, standing on the new bridge over Valley river, he asked where the bridge was, and was told he was on it already, and that the old bridge had been burnt, when he remarked that he might find it lower down the river, and went in search of it, soon returning, seeming to have recalled his recollection. He would sometimes be found sweeping out the old stable, saying he was going to stable horses in it, though it was disused and roofless, and supplanted by a new one near by. He remembered the old, familiar bridge and stable so fixed upon his memory through years long gone. They inhered in his memory yet, and overcame his recollection of the new. It is common—quite usual—for the aged to remember the impressions and things of their long ago, and forget, for the time, until they are specially recalled to their minds, recent occurrences. Sometimes, though not often, this aged man would be found wandering listlessly, somewhat vacantly, about his field near the town, and through the streets of the town of Beverly. There is nothing of much significance in this. He had for years labored in this field and walked the village streets among his neighbors, and he was still following his old walks and habits. When thus walking on one occasion, when his family wished him to come in, he became petulant, seeming to resent, as old people sometimes do, any hint that he was not himself as in days gone by. On another occasion he was found cutting weeds on the opposite side of the street from his house, seeming not to know it, and, when his attention was called to it, he at once returned across the street. He sometimes bade a colored woman living in his house good-bye, saying he was going to Frederick City, and then go to the tanyard and return. Sometimes he would tell her, when it was raining, to take the doors from the outhouses; that they would get wet. At times he would talk incoherently, especially in later years, after these deeds were made, and in an instance or two failed to recognize an old acquaintance, but his sight was bad, and this is common in age. When he was told who the person was, he seemed to sharply recall him, saying, "Why, is this Arch Chenoweth?" I have given succinctly the chief part, if not all, of the peculiar conduct of George Buckey, summoned in aid of the effort to overthrow his capacity. Strange conduct we may say it is. Eccentricity, or rather the idiosyncrasies of this particular person, they are, indicating, we may admit, failing powers under the hand of years of one who had walked so far down the other side of the hill of life; but with all this there is evidence to show continued good sense, intelligent conversation and discrimination, while the conduct above spoken of is occasional, only.

The strange actions just mentioned do not go far enough; they do not drown the excellent intelligence and common sense, the industry and careful earning and management of property, which characterized his long life. They do not deprive this sensible, worthy man of the right to bestow his property as he wished. Here we must remember certain legal principles. Amid all this evidence, pro and contra, they come in with the force of a casting vote, and sustain the validity of these deeds. If we look anywhere we shall find it laid down as law, particularly in Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 584, and Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 661, 8 S. E. 483, that "old age is not in itself sufficient evidence of incapacity to make a deed;" and that the presumption of law is always in favor of the sanity, at the time the deed was executed, of a person whose deed is brought in question; the burden of proof is on him who asserts insanity, unless a previous condition of insanity has been established. Jarrett v. Jarrett, supra; Anderson v. Cranmer, 11 W. Va. 562, 584; Hiett v. Shull, 36 W. Va. 563, 15 S. E. 146. "This presumption is universal, and is not defeated by common report or reputation, or the imputation of friends or relatives, or the old age or feebleness of the subject, or, in short, by any cause except controlling evidence produced." Busw. Insan. § 159. The principle is sound in itself, and settled as a rule, that, in the absence of fraud, imposition, or undue influence, mere weakness or feebleness of understanding is not sufficient to overthrow the party's deed. Alman v. Stout, 42 Pa. St. 114; Cain v. Warford, 33 Md. 23; Miller v. Craig, 36 Ill. 109; Maddox v. Simmons, 31 Ga. 512, 528; 2 Lomax, Dig. 298; Chancellor Kent, in Van Alst v. Hunter, 5 Johns. Ch. 160. Here I will say that no evidence shows, or tends to show, any fraud, undue influence, or even importunity, on the part of these grantees. Though alleged in the bills, there is not the slightest proof, and no contention of that kind is in the brief of counsel. The mental weakness must go further than it does in this case. The mysterious action of the person whose act was involved in Mercer v. Kelso, 4 Grat. 106, went beyond that in this case. "No degree of physical or mental imbecility which does not deprive the party of legal competency to act is, of itself, sufficient to avoid his contract." Farnham v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 212. It must go so far as to disable him from knowing and understanding the nature and effect of his act. 2 Minor, Inst. 572; Blish. Cont. § 962. His mind may be weak and debilitated as compared with what it once was, the memory of things enfeebled, the understanding weak, the character and demeanor eccentric, and he may not have capacity to transact all the ordinary business of life; still, if he understands the nature of the act he does, recollects the property he is disposing of, and the person to whom he grants it, and how he desires to dispose of it, his act is valid. Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 251; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 662, 8 S. E. 493.

The case shows that, most of all things, George Buckey would remember his property. This is both likely and appears in the case. As showing that he knew his property and the objects of his bounty and the nature of his acts, these deeds do not reflect the scheme of Alpheus and Charles N. Buckey, but the sedate, deliberate, and long-entertained design of George Buckey himself. Time and again, for 25 years before these deeds, he said he intended to give his home property to Alpheus, and the mill property to Emmet Buckey. These declarations are admissible on the question of competency, (Dinges v. Branson, 14 W. Va. 100-118,) and tend to show capacity, (Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 87.) If crazy, he wonderfully retained, and finally executed to the letter, his long-contemplated purpose. He said he intended to keep Alpheus with him as long as he lived; that Alpheus was kind and good to him. Alpheus remained with him till his death, while all the other children went off to do for themselves. He stated that Alpheus had lived with and cared for him all his life. He advanced his other children, or most of them, considerable amounts, and he left, outside these conveyances, a farm and other real estate of considerable value. As further showing strongly that he knew what he was doing, witness his caution as to the mill property. Many years before he placed Emmet in possession of it, and he carried on milling business there, and George Buckey always declared he intended the mill for him. About one year before the deed was made, the old man spoke to Mr. Jones about drawing the deed, but told him he wanted to run lines between this mill tract and one adjoining, and engaged to meet, and met, Jones on the ground, had the surveying done preparatory to the deed, and directed what land was to go into it. He at first said he intended to make the deed to Emmet; but Emmet became embarrassed financially, and with some reluctance, in a deliberate conversation with Jones, at last determined to make the deed to Emmet's only son, Charles N., saying he had been a good boy, and had been of great service to him. When the deed was read he declared it correct. He had Mr. Willson write one of the deeds he made to Alpheus, and a deed conveying two lots to a daughter, Mrs. Currence. He asked Willson if he had the calls, and, he replying that he had not, he told who had conveyed the property, so that he could from the conveyance get the calls. Willson suggested that he change his plan as to what lots he would convey to Mrs. Currence and what to Alpheus, but he refused to depart from his plan, giving good reason for it. And observe the prudence, favoring his own safety, evinced by the deeds themselves. The deed to Charles N. Buckey and that to Alpheus for the tanyard and home reserve a life estate and full control to George Buckey for his life; and in the other deed to Alpheus he made a charge of $250 in favor of another son, Marteny, who he said had not received much. Another consideration is of great weight in favor of George Buckey's capacity. The two notaries who took his acknowledgments state that he was competent to make the deeds. There is no showing by any one present at their execution that at that time he was not competent. It has been often laid down that the very time of the factum of a deed is the critical point of time for inquiry as to the capacity of the party making it. "The evidence of witnesses present at the execution of a deed is entitled to peculiar weight." Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 584; Anderson v. Cranmer, Id. 562; Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 251; Beverley v. Walden, 20 Grat. 147, 158. In Beckwith v. Butler, 1 Wash. (Va.) 236, it was held that the evidence of the subscribing witness as to competency to make a deed was "chiefly to be regarded," and President Pendleton spoke approvingly of a case in the Virginia court of appeals, where it overcame all other testimony before and after execution of the will. No taint or savor of incapacity is imputed to George Buckey save on account of old age. It has become quite common for interested relatives to assail the disposition made by aged persons of their property. He gave to Alpheus Buckey and Emmet's son, and perhaps Mrs. Currence, because he had not advanced them, and because they had remained near him and with him many years after they had become adult, while others had gone far away. They had done much to rock the cradle of reposing age. He said so on many occasions, especially as to Alpheus. Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 87, warns us "that great caution, indeed, should be used, lest the existence of extreme old age should lead the medical witness to presume consequent imbecility." Chancellor Kent said, in Van Alst v. Hunter, 5 Johns. Ch. 159: "It is one of the painful consequences of extreme old age that it ceases to excite interest, and is apt to be left solitary and neglected. The control which the law still gives to a man over the disposal of his property is one of the most efficient means which he has in protracted life to command the attentions due to his infirmities. The will of such an aged man ought to be regarded with great tenderness, when it appears not to have been procured by fraudulent arts, but contains those very dispositions which the circumstances of his situation and the course of natural affection dictated." Our conclusion is to reverse so much of the decrees as annuls the deed to Charles N. Buckey, and dismiss the bills filed to annul it, and to refuse to reverse, but, on the contrary, to affirm, that portion of the decree in the first case dismissing the bill filed by John J. Buckey to annul the deed to Alpheus Buckey, dated September 15, 1880.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code, § 159, subd. 9, providing a limitation of three years for an action for relief on the ground of mistake, and that the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of the mistake by the party aggrieved, plaintiff need not allege in his complaint that the discovery of the mistake was within three years next before the commencement of the action, nor file a replication, alleging such fact, to a plea setting up the statute of limitations.

Appeal from superior court, Lincoln county; Armfield, Judge.

Action by E. W. Stubbs against W. H. Motz and others. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

D. W. Robinson, for appellant.

CLARK, J. This action was begun 20th March, 1885, to correct errors alleged to have been made by mutual mistake of the parties in a settlement had between them 27th October, 1881. The defendants pleaded the statute of limitations. The plaintiff did not, in his complaint nor by replication, aver that the discovery of the mistake was within three years next before the commencement of the action. The court thereupon excluded evidence offered to prove such fact, and held upon the face of the pleadings that the action was barred, and instructed the jury to find the issue in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff excepted, and this is the sole question presented by the appeal.

The Code (section 155, subd. 9) provides a limitation of three years for "an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake," the cause of action not to be "deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting such fraud or mistake." The limitation prescribed is not three years from the mistake, but from its discovery. When the date of the accruing of the cause of action appears in the complaint, and the statute of limitation is pleaded, the court can, of course, pass judgment, unless matter in avoidance is pleaded as a new premise, or the like. It is only in such cases that a replication is now required, (Code, § 248; Moore v. Garner, 101 N. C. 374, 377, 7 S. E. 732,) though under the former practice a replication was required whenever the statute of limitations was pleaded, (Wood, Lim. 16.) The plea here, that the "plaintiff's cause of action did not accrue within three years next before the commencement of the action," devolved upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that it did. Moore v. Garner, supra. As the date of the discovery of the mistake does not appear in the complaint, the plaintiff should have been allowed to prove, if he could, that it was within three years before this action was begun. We note that the defendants' plea is not strictly accurate, as they plead that the cause of action "arose" more than three years before suit brought. Under the liberal system of pleading now in force, they have the benefit of meaning that it did not "accrue" within three years. Code, § 260. New trial.

STATE v. EDWARDS.

CRIMINAL LAW—UNLAWFUL RETAIL OF LIQUORS—JURISDICTION.

Under Code, § 1076, making the unlawful retailing of spirituous liquors a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment or both, the criminal court has jurisdiction of such offense, as Acts 1893, c. 294, § 35, making it a misdemeanor to practice any trade taxable by law without having paid the tax, and providing that such misdemeanor shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment, and by a penalty of $50, to be recovered by the sheriff of the county wherein the offense is committed, before a justice of such county, does not repeal section 1076, nor interfere with its enforcement.

Appeal from criminal court, Buncombe county; Carter, Judge.

A. R. Edwards was convicted of unlawfully retailing spirituous liquors, and appeals. Affirmed.

The Attorney General, for the State.

BURWELL, J. The bill of indictment on which the defendant was tried contained two counts,—one for unlawfully retailing spirituous liquors; and one for unlawfully selling them in quantities less than a gallon, to wit, by the quart. The jury found a general verdict of guilty. Of the misdemeanor charged in the first count the court in which the trial took place clearly had jurisdiction. The offense there specified was the violation of Code, § 1076,¹ and not of section 35 of chapter 294 of the Acts of 1893 (Revenue Act).² The latter act does not at all repeal or suspend the operation of the former, or in any way interfere with the enforcement of its provisions. State v. Newcomb, 107 N. C. 900, 12 S. E. 53. This count being good, it is presumed that the conviction was upon it, (State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736, 11 S. E. 168,) and that the evidence supported that conviction; there being no exception on that score. Hence it becomes unimportant to consider the second count. But that also was good, as it would be sustained, unless there was evidence that showed that the offense against the state revenue act therein charged was committed within twelve months before the finding of the bill. Code, § 892, Acts 1889, c. 504; State v. Dalton, 101 N. C. 680, 8 S. E. 154. What has been said disposes of the defendant's motion to "dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction," and also of his motion to quash the bill for the same cause. The judgment of the court is in strict accordance with the provisions of the act therein referred to. No error.

STATE v. REAVIS et al.

CRIMINAL ASSAULT—INTENT.

Where defendants—one with a pistol in his hand, one with a drawn sword, and one with a pistol in his pocket—went to the door of prosecutor's house, where he was sitting, with the admitted purpose of compelling him to leave his home and accompany them, and ordered him to go with them, they were guilty of an assault, though they were prevented from actually doing violence to his person by the interference of others.

Appeal from superior court, Iredell county; Winston, Judge.

Sant Reavis and others were convicted of assault, and appeal. Affirmed.

The defendants and one Houston Brown were indicted for an assault with a deadly weapon on one Way. There was evidence introduced on the part of the state tending to prove the guilt of all of the defendants, except Brown, and as to him a nol. pros. was entered. The defendant Reavis, testifying in his own behalf, and in behalf of the other defendants, said that they had a warrant for the Carson boys, and went in the night to Way's dwelling to get him to go, and show them where the Carson boys were; had met Way that day, and told him they were looking for them. He said he had not seen them in two weeks. That night the witness and the other defendants, Reynolds and Hays, and one Miller, went in the yard of Way,—went in one step of the door,—called to him, and told him he had told them a lie that day, when he said he had not seen the Carson boys in two weeks, and that he must "come and show them to us;" that they had come for him as a witness. He admitted that they stayed near the door three or four minutes; that he had out his pistol, in his right hand; that defendant Hays was two or three steps from him, with a drawn sword in his hand; that Miller was there with a pistol in his pocket; that there were about a dozen men of their crowd near by in the road; that Way was sitting down near the door, it being open, when the defendants went in the yard, and to the door; that when they notified Way to go with them, etc., he got up, and slapped his hand on his breast, and told them to shoot; that his wife "acted like a wild woman," and ran out into the yard, and "screamed at the top of her voice." Way and his wife ordered them to leave. They remained near the door 3 or 4 minutes, and in the yard 15 minutes. They had searched the house that day. The noise and confusion that night were very great. The neighbors came in. He admitted that the defendants (except Brown) and Miller went to the house to make Way go as a witness, if he resisted them, and was not willing to go. They had a warrant for the Carsons, but they had neither a warrant nor a subpoena for Way, and had no warrant when they searched his house. They were not officers of the law. The other defendants, Reynolds and Hays, testified, in substance, to the same facts. His honor told the jury that these three defendants were guilty, "upon their own showing." The jury rendered a verdict of guilty against them, and they appealed from the judgment pronounced.

The Attorney General, for the State.

BURWELL, J. We consider what his honor told the jury as equivalent to saying to them that, if they believed what the defendants themselves testified was true, each of them having given the same account of the affair, they should return a verdict of guilty against them. Hence, if, putting the construction most favorable to them upon what they testified to, we find that they were guilty of an assault upon the prosecutor, Way, they are not entitled to a new trial. An assault is defined by Judge Gaston, in State v. Davis, 1 Ired. 125, to be "an intentional attempt, by violence, to do an injury to the person of another." It is elsewhere said to be "an attempt, unlawfully, to apply any—the least—actual force to the person of another, directly or indirectly.” 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 779. In the case cited above, the learned judge says that “it is difficult, in practice, to draw the precise line which separates violence menaced from violence begun to be executed, for until the execution is begun there can be no assault.” And he adds: “We think, however, that where an unequivocal purpose of violence is accompanied by any act, which, if not stopped or diverted, will be followed by personal injury, the execution of the purpose is then begun,—the battery is attempted.” Now, in the case before us, each of the defendants stated that they went to the house of the prosecutor to make or force him to leave his home, and accompany them. They had no authority to do this. They purposed, by force or fear, to compel him to go where they wished. Their intention was, they admit, to do this great violence to his person,—to thus falsely imprison him; and false imprisonment generally includes an assault and battery, and always at least a technical assault. State v. Lunsford, 81 N. C. 528. We have proof, then, of intended violence to the person of the prosecutor, not from threatening words or gestures, but by their own admission. The intention is unequivocal. Was this unequivocal purpose of violence accompanied by any act which, if it had not been stopped or diverted, would have been followed by personal injury? If so, according to the high authority cited above, the execution of the purpose is begun, and there was an assault. We think it very clear, from their own statements, that the unlawful and most outrageous acts of the defendants would have been followed immediately by personal injury to the prosecutor,—in which we of course include the enforced subjection of his body, through fear or force, to the command of the defendants,—if their purpose had not been thwarted. The three defendants, accompanied by another,—one with a pistol in his right hand, one with a drawn sword, and one with a pistol in his pocket,—went to the door of the prosecutor’s house, where he was sitting. All that is needed to make such an approach to a man an assault—that is the beginning of the execution of violence to his person—is to prove that there was a present purpose to commit such violence. That purpose may be proved by the words or gestures of the armed and advancing party, or if the approach or attack is made in such a manner as to put a reasonable man in fear, and it does put him in fear, that will establish the purpose to commit violence, of the execution of which the act is the beginning. Here, we have no need of the direct attempt or offer to shoot or strike, to prove the purpose to commit violence. They admit it, and themselves testify to the commission of acts, in the immediate presence of the prosecutor, which could have no other object than the consummation of that purpose. By their own testimony, they established the fact that they passed “the line that separates violence menaced from violence begun to be executed,” and therefore that they were guilty of an assault. No error.

¹ Code, § 1076, makes the unlawful retailing of spirituous liquors a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment or both.

² Acts 1893, c. 294, § 35, provides that every person who shall practice any trade or profession, or use any franchise taxed by the laws of North Carolina without having paid the tax and obtained a license as required in this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by fine not exceeding $50, or imprisoned not exceeding 30 days, and shall also forfeit and pay a penalty of $50, which penalty the sheriff of the county in which it has occurred shall cause to be recovered, before any justice of the peace of the county, for the benefit of the school fund of the county.

STATE ex rel. RAILROAD COMMISSION v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO.

RAILROAD COMMISSIONERS — TELEGRAPH RATES—INTERSTATE COMMERCE — PARTIES—AMENDMENT ON APPEAL.

1. The board of railroad commissioners, authorized by Laws 1891, c. 320, § 26, to make just rates for telegraph companies, after disposing of a complaint against a telegraph company by an individual, having the defendant company before it, proceeded to make rates for it. Held that, though the commission should have amended the proceeding so as to substitute as complainant the state ex rel. the commission, still, no reference having been made to the irregularity, the amendment would be made on appeal.

2. There having been evidence to warrant findings on questions which it was agreed the court should pass on in place of a jury, they will not be reviewed.

3. The board of railroad commissioners, under its authority to make rates for “the transmission of messages by any telegraph line or lines doing business in the state,” has the incidental power of ascertaining what particular corporation owns or is in control of a line.

4. Regulation of telegraph rates between points in the state is not an interference with interstate commerce, though the line passes out of the state between the points, it all being owned and operated by one corporation.

5. The authority given by Laws 1891, c. 320, to the board of railroad commissioners, relative to telegraph companies, being only to regulate rates, it cannot direct offices of a telegraph company to be opened for commercial business. Mayo v. Telegraph Co., 16 S. E. 1006, 112 N. C. 343, followed.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; G. H. Brown, Judge.

Proceeding by the state, on the relation of the railroad commission, against the Western Union Telegraph Company, to regulate rates. From the order of the board of railroad commissioners, the telegraph company appeals. Modified.

Strong & Strong and Robt. Styles, for appellant. Robert O. Burton, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The board of railroad commissioners is “authorized and required to make or cause to be made just and reasonable rates of charges for the transmission of messages by any telegraph line or lines doing business in the state.” Laws 1891, c. 320, § 26. It may cause notice to be served upon corporations or persons charged with a violation of the rules prescribed by it in pursuance of the above authority, and upon a hearing may ascertain and direct ample and full recompense to be made by the company, corporation, or person offending, which recompense may be enforced by civil action as prescribed in section 10 of said act. Mayo v. Telegraph Co., 112 N. C. 343, 16 S. E. 1006. It is a court of record, with "the powers and jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction" as to all subjects embraced in said act, by virtue of Laws 1891, c. 498. Atlantic Exp. Co. v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 111 N. C. 463, 16 S. E. 393; Const. N. C. art. 4, § 2.

The defendant, being served with process, appeared before this court to answer the complaint or petition of Eugene Albea, called plaintiff herein, and filed its answer. Thereupon, a trial was had, and, it appearing that the said Albea had tendered no commercial message to any of the offices of the defendant, it was adjudged that he had no cause of complaint, and the proceeding was practically dismissed as to him. The commission, however, having the defendant before it, proceeded, under its general powers, to make rates of charges for the transmission of business by the defendant from and to points in North Carolina, which rate of charges is the same as that applicable to all the offices of the defendant within the limits of the state. The commission, after having disposed of the complaint of Albea, should have amended the proceeding so as to substitute as complainant the state of North Carolina ex rel. the railroad commission; but, as it has been fully heard without reference to this irregularity, we have ordered that the amendment be now made, and the proceeding be entitled accordingly. Code, § 273; Reynolds v. Smathers, 87 N. C. 24.

The order of the board which is the subject of review is as follows: "That the telegraph offices at Edenton and Elizabeth City, and at other points on the Norfolk & Southern Railroad in North Carolina, are offices of defendant, and that said offices shall transmit commercial messages at rates prescribed by the commission to any point in North Carolina." This order is based upon certain findings of fact, some of which are excepted to; but inasmuch as it was agreed that his honor might pass upon these questions in the place of a jury, and as there was evidence sufficient to warrant such findings as, under the view we have taken are material to be considered, they cannot be reviewed in this court. Battle v. Mayo, 102 N. C. 413, 9 S. E. 384; Fertilizer Co. v. Reams, 105 N. C. 283, 11 S. E. 467.

It appears, in the language of his honor, "that the defendant owns, controls, and operates a line of telegraph from Edenton, N. C., passing through Elizabeth City, N. C., Hertford, Moyock, N. C., and other places along the track of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad to Berkley and Norfolk, Va.; * * * that the company receives and transmits over this line (commercial) messages at the towns and villages of Hertford, Moyock, and other places along said line to any place in North Carolina where it has an office, at the uniform rate of twenty-five cents per message of ten words, except at Edenton and Elizabeth City," at which two last-named offices the defendant receives no commercial business; the said offices being devoted exclusively to the business of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company, in respect to the running of its trains, etc. It is very clear to us that, under the authority given it to make rates for "the transmission of messages by any telegraph line or lines doing business in the state," the commission—subject, of course, to the right of appeal—has the incidental power of ascertaining what particular corporation is at least in the control or operation of the same. This would seem indispensably necessary to a proper exercise of its authority to fix rates, as well as to know against whom to proceed, under section 10 of the act, in the event of a violation of such regulation. The exception, therefore, in this respect, must be overruled.

A more serious question, however, is presented by the ruling of the court upon the third conclusion of the commission, which is as follows: "That telegraphic messages transmitted by defendant over its said line from Elizabeth City or Edenton, or other points in North Carolina, to points in said state, do not constitute commerce between states, although traversing another state in the route, and are subject to the rate prescribed by the commission." It appears from the findings of fact that the shortest and only route over the wire of the defendant, by which messages can be transmitted to many points in this state, necessarily "traverses, in part, the state of Virginia, and thence back into North Carolina;" and it is insisted that such messages so transmitted are interstate commerce, and therefore not subject to the tariff regulation of the commission. It is not denied that the offices of the defendant along the line of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company, except those at Edenton and Elizabeth City, receive commercial messages for transmission, in the manner described, to various points in North Carolina; and it is plain that such business does not relate to the intercourse of the citizens of this state with those of some other state. It is purely an intercourse between the citizens of North Carolina, through the means afforded by a corporation having extensive facilities of communication within the limits of the said state; and the uniform rates fixed by the commission for the business which the said corporation accepts, or is under legal obligation to accept, in no wise affect or interfere with any business which the defendant undertakes for the citizens of Virginia, either between themselves, or with the citizens of other states. Neither are we able to see how the mere fixing of rates between different points in this state can in any way conflict with any regulation which the state of Virginia may have the power to impose in respect to its domestic business. It must be manifest, therefore, that this business is without a single feature of interstate commerce, unless it can be found in the fact that, in the transmission of a message, it must traverse a part of the defendant's own line in the state of Virginia. We have been referred to several cases in which it has been held, in respect to the continuous carriage of freight by a railroad company under such circumstances, that a state commission had no power to prescribe rates, and also that a state had no right to levy a tax upon the gross receipts, even as to that part derived from the transportation within its territory. State v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 40 Minn. 267, 41 N. W. 1047; Sternberger v. Railroad Co., 29 S. C. 510, 7 S. E. 836; North Carolina Cotton Exchange v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Railroad, 2 Inter St. Com. Com. R. 386.

Without attempting to discuss these cases, and to distinguish them in some particulars from ours, it is sufficient to say that, if they are not distinctly overruled, their principle is certainly in conflict with the reasoning of the opinion of the supreme court of the United States (Fuller, C. J.) in Lehigh Val. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 12 Sup. Ct. 506. The state of Pennsylvania levied a tax on the gross receipts of all railroad companies, derived from the transportation by continuous carriage from points in Pennsylvania to other points in the same state; that is to say, passing out of Pennsylvania into other states, and back again into Pennsylvania, in the course of transportation. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Company has no road of its own from Mauch Chunk, Pa., to Philadelphia, but in transporting its coal, and general freight traffic, it uses its own line from Mauch Chunk to Phillipsburg, N. J., from which point it is, under an arrangement for a continuous passage with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, transported by the latter road, via Trenton, to Philadelphia. It was insisted that the state could not tax that part of the gross receipts derived from so much of the transportation as was wholly within the state of Pennsylvania, because the freight, during its entire transportation, was impressed with the character of interstate commerce. The court sustained the tax, and, although it may be said that the decision relates only to that part of the receipts which arose from the transportation within the state, yet it must be apparent, from a perusal of the opinion, that this conclusion was reached on the ground that such continuous transportation was not interstate commerce. Indeed, the entire course of the reasoning of the court is in support of this very principle, and is clearly applicable to the question involved in this appeal. The language of the court is plain and emphatic, and we do not feel at liberty to ignore it, and especially when it is applied to telegraphic communication, under the peculiar circumstances of this case. The court, in speaking of the grant of power to regulate commerce between the states, remarked: "But, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall, the words of the grant do not embrace that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a state, or between different parts of the same state, and which does not extend to nor affect other states. 'Commerce,' observed the chief justice, 'undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse.'" The court further proceeded to say: "The point of departure and the point of arrival were alike in Pennsylvania. The intercourse was between those points, and not between any other points. Is such intercourse, consisting of continuous transportation between two points in the same state, made interstate, because, in its accomplishment, some portion of another state may be traversed? Is the transmission of freight or messages between two places in the same state made interstate business by the deviation of the railroad or telegraph line onto the soil of another state?" Again, in another part of the opinion it is said: "It is simply whether, in the carriage of freight and passengers between two points in the same state, the mere passage over the soil of another state renders that business foreign which is domestic. We do not think such a view can be reasonably entertained, and are of the opinion that this taxation is not open to constitutional objection by reason of the particular way in which Philadelphia was reached from Mauch Chunk." The court uses the words 'continuous passage,' from which it is to be inferred that if, after the freight passed beyond Pennsylvania, it was transferred to another transportation agency in New Jersey, and by this other agency carried to Philadelphia, it would be interstate commerce; and the same, if consigned to a point in New Jersey, and then reshipped to Philadelphia. It is in evidence that the defendant owns and operates a continuous wire, or system of wires, from the offices mentioned to other points in North Carolina, and therefore it is not compelled to transfer its business to any other agency outside of North Carolina, in order that it may reach its destination in this state. In this respect, our case is stronger than the one from Pennsylvania, as the road from Phillipsburg to Philadelphia was owned and operated by another corporation, and not by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company. We refrain from entering into an extended discussion of the subject, and are content to follow the reasoning of the supreme court of the United States, whose authority upon such questions is conclusive. We will observe, however, that we think the principle laid down by that court is peculiarly adaptable to cases like the present, in which there is such an exceptional facility for the evasion of state authority to fix the rate of charges. This may be done in an instant, and without expense, by so adjusting the wires that messages must go through a part of the territory of another state. We think the exception should be overruled.

The remaining exception which it is necessary to consider relates to that part of the order which substantially commands the defendant to open its offices at Edenton and Elizabeth City for the transmission of commercial messages. It is urged, but not very seriously pressed, that the order only means that the company shall transmit such messages at the prescribed rates whenever it undertakes to do that character of business at those points. The order of the court is not, in our opinion, susceptible of such a construction; but whatever doubt there may be must surely vanish when it is considered in connection with the finding of the commission upon which it is based, and which the court, in its judgment, approves and adopts. This finding is that the operators in said offices "are the agents and operators of the defendant, and that it is their duty to transmit commercial messages, when tendered to them, to points in North Carolina, at the rate prescribed by the commission." It is impossible, without violating all rules of interpretation, as well as destroying the plain import of language, to adopt the view contended for; and it is therefore necessary to determine whether the commission act conferred upon the commission the authority to direct that the said offices should be opened for commercial business. That it has no such authority is settled by this court in Mayo v. Telegraph Co., supra, (decided since the trial of this proceeding,) in which it is declared that "there is nothing to show the intent of the statute to give to the commission power to prescribe other rules and regulations for telegraph lines than those directed in section 26 with regard to their charges for the transmission of messages, as neither of the other sections could be made to apply to telegraph, even if the same had been specifically named." Under this decision, so much of the order as is open to the objection referred to must be set aside, but in all other respects it is affirmed. Let it not be understood that we are deciding that a corporation like the defendant, exercising its franchise, the right of eminent domain, and other unusual privileges, under a grant from the state for the benefit of the public, can give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, or corporation. This question may be presented when commercial messages have been tendered and declined at the said offices, but we think it would be going outside of the record to pass upon it now; and especially should we refrain from doing so when the intelligent counsel who appeared for the defendant very properly concluded that the court would not anticipate a point of such importance, and therefore did not deem it necessary to discuss it. The order of the court is modified and affirmed.

CARRIERS — CONTRACT OF AFFREIGHTMENT — EXPRESSION OF INTENT — UNILATERAL MISTAKE — EFFECT.

Where, in reply to inquiry of its local agent about freight rates, defendant railroad company's general agent quotes a rate of 83½ cents per hundred, which by some error is received by the local agent as 69½ cents, and is so quoted to plaintiffs, who accept such rate, without knowledge of the mistake, there is a valid and binding contract between plaintiffs and defendant, under which the latter is bound to ship plaintiffs' freight at the rate quoted them by the local agent. Clark, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Wayne county; George H. Brown, Judge.

Action by A. Borden and others against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company for breach of a contract of affreightment. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Busbee & Busbee, for appellant. Allen & Dortch and Aycock & Daniels, for appellees.

* BURWELL, J. It is conceded that the local agent of the defendant at Goldsborough made a written offer to ship for the plaintiff 500 bales of cotton to Liverpool in November, 1891, and that the said agent was authorized to make such a proposal on the part of the defendant, and that plaintiff at once accepted this offer, his acceptance being also in writing. Furthermore, it seems to be conceded that the said agent plainly and unequivocally expressed what he understood to be the price to be charged by the defendant company for the transportation of the cotton, and there was no misunderstanding between the plaintiffs and the agent as to any of the terms of the alleged contract. Now, it is evident that if the agent is considered, not as the mere mouthpiece of the defendant corporation, through whom the intention of its higher officers in this matter was to be simply communicated to the plaintiff, but as its authorized contracting agent,—its alter ego in this affair,—there was no error or mistake at all, much less one that would prevent the written proposal and its written acceptance from constituting a valid contract, by the plain terms of which each party would be bound. In this view of the matter, there was no variance between the intention of the defendant and the expression of that intention. The contracting agent expressed in unequivocal language exactly what he intended to express. The plaintiff accepted the offer thus made to him. The defendant cannot escape liability on this contract by asserting that its agent would not have so conducted himself if he had known at that time what he was afterwards informed of; and it might well be insisted on the part of the plaintiff that, in the absence of notice to the contrary, he had a right to assume that that agent had power to act for his principal in this matter, and that defendant should not be allowed to dispute that authority.

Passing by that question, and assuming for the sake of argument that the local agent at Goldsborough was the mere mouthpiece or spokesman of the defendant in this matter, and that plaintiff knew this fact, then we have here a variance between the intention of the proposer (the defendant) and the expression of that intention. There was an error in the expression of the defendant's intention, but that error was unknown to the plaintiff. He had no good reason to suspect that the writing submitted to him did not correctly express the intention of the defendant. He did not "snap up" an offer which he knew or suspected was erroneously expressed. He merely accepted a plainly-expressed proposition. In the view of the matter we are now taking, the question, then, is, if in the expression of the intention of one of the parties to an alleged contract there is error, and that error is unknown to and unsuspected by the other party, is that which was so expressed by the one party and agreed to by the other a valid and binding contract, which the party not in error may enforce? The law is well settled, says Mr. Lawson in his work on Contracts, (section 206,) that a man is bound by an agreement to which he has expressed his assent in unequivocal terms, uninfluenced by falsehood, violence, or oppression; and it judges of an agreement between two persons exclusively from those expressions of their intention which are communicated between them. And Wharton, in his work on the same subject, (section 196,) quotes from Tamplin v. James, 15 Ch. Div. 215, this general rule, as he denominates it: "Where there has been no misrepresentation, and where there is no ambiguity in the terms of the contract, the defendant cannot be allowed to evade the performance of it by the simple statement that he has made a mistake." "But," he adds, "where a proposal evidently contains a mistake, an acceptor, by snapping at it, will not be permitted to take advantage of the mistake." In section 202a he announces the rule thus: "A unilateral mistake of expression of one party cannot be set up by him as a ground for rescinding a contract, or for resisting its enforcement, when his language was accepted by the other party in its natural sense. But when the blunder made by the proposer is obvious, an acceptor will not be allowed, by catching it up, to take an unfair advantage." An essential bilateral error as to the nature of a contract avoids it if based upon such error, but a unilateral error will not have that effect. Bish. Cont. §§ 701, 702. "It would open the door to fraud if such a defense was to be allowed. It is said that it is hard to hold a man to a bargain entered into under a mistake, but we must consider the hardship on the other side." Tamplin v. James, supra. We must consider also that "one of the remarkable tendencies of the English common law upon all subjects of a general nature is to aim at practical good, rather than theoretical perfection; and to seek less to administer justice in all possible cases than to furnish rules which shall secure it in the common course of human business." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 111. We think, therefore, that all evidence in regard to plaintiff's purchase of the cotton was irrelevant. He had a valid contract for its shipment at 69½ cents. His rights thereunder could not be affected by a notice that the defendant's agent had been misinformed, as we have seen. Hence we need not consider the exception taken by the defendant to the admission or exclusion of evidence relating to that part of the controversy. Under the law as we hold it to be, it being admitted that the plaintiff had been required to pay more than the contract price for the shipment of his cotton, he was entitled, as his honor held, to recover the difference between the sum so paid and the contract price. Affirmed.

CLARK, J. (dissenting.) The evidence is not controverted that the local agent at Goldsborough did not have authority to quote rates of freight from that point to Liverpool, (passing, as the freight must, over so many lines besides that for which he was agent;) that the general agent at Richmond, in reply to an inquiry from the local agent, quoted a rate of 89½ cents, and that by some error in transmission by telegraph this was received at Goldsborough as 69½ cents, and so quoted to the plaintiffs. The mistake having been made by an agent or an employe of the railroad company, it is bound, but only to the extent that the plaintiffs had been misled and damaged by having acted upon it before the mistake was corrected, which was done promptly as soon as the general agent had notice of the mistake which had been made in the transmission of the message. If by reason of the supposed reduction of the rate from 89½ cents to 69½ cents the plaintiffs had, before correction of the mistake, sold cotton in Liverpool at less than the market price,—which is very improbable,—or had bought cotton somewhat above the market rate in Goldsborough,—which is possible,—to whatever extent they had been thus damaged by relying upon the correctness of the dispatch they are entitled to compensation. There was no offer on the part of the railroad company, through its general agent, who alone was authorized to speak for it, to carry at 69½ cents. The local agent did not even hold himself out as having authority. He merely reported the query of defendant to the general agent, and communicated his reply to the plaintiffs. There was no offer by the defendant by accepting which a contract was made between the parties. There was simply an erroneous message delivered to the plaintiffs by an agency used by the defendant. The plaintiffs' right to recover is not based upon a breach of contract on the part of defendant, for it made none at 89½ cents, nor offered to make it. The right to recover is based upon the mistake made by the agent in delivering a message which the plaintiffs had a right to rely upon till corrected; and to the extent that they were so misled and damaged by reliance upon the supposed message they are entitled to recover, but no further. This damage was not necessarily, and not even probably, the difference between 89½ cents and 69½ cents, but only the lower price at which the plaintiffs sold or the higher price at which they bought by reason of supposing they had gotten 20 cents per 100 pounds off of the usual rate of freight; and this, not on the 500 bales, but on only so much thereof as they had bought or sold before the correction of the error was made known to them. This is the measure of plaintiffs' loss, and not the value of the good bargain they thought they had made. There was no contract at 69½ cents. The mind of the defendant never entered into such. There was a mistake of the agent used in transmitting the message, and the loss caused thereby should be borne, not by the party who in good faith relied on it, but by the party who employed such agency. The principal is only bound by the acts of its agents within the scope of their agency. The scope of Drake's agency at Richmond was to contract for rates. He made no offer at 89½ cents. He made no mistake. He has done nothing that fixes any contractual liability upon the defendant. Yet he is the only one who could have done so. The scope of the agency of the telegraph operator at Chase City, who, it seems, made the mistake, was not to make contracts, but to transmit messages. The defendant is only bound by his acts within the scope of its agency. Whatever damage the plaintiffs sustained by the mistake in relaying the message, the principal, the defendant company, is liable for; but not for a breach of a contract, since that agent could not make a contract if he had offered to do so, and certainly could not by making a mistake. In relaying the message he inadvertently took or erroneously transmitted six dots (.), the telegraphic marks for 6, instead of a dash and four dots (-), the sign for 8. This mistake of a dash for two dots was, so to speak, a lapsus pennae on his part. It was no mistake on the part of the contracting agent. The learning about unilateral mistakes has, therefore, no bearing, for there was no mistake on either side to the contract. The two sides simply never agreed. The defendant offered 89½ cents, the plaintiff thought he was accepting 69½ cents. Take a homely example: A landowner has an overseer, who is authorized to employ hands. The overseer sends a message by one of his employees to some one that he will give him employment for a year at $10 per month. By reason of carelessness, drunkenness, or stupidity the messenger says the overseer will give $30 per month. Could it be contended that the landowner must pay for a year three times the usual price for an ordinary farm hand? Not at all. He is bound by the act of his overseer, who is authorized to hire hands, in the absence of collusion and the like. But as to the messenger, the principal is bound by his mistake only to the extent of the damages actually suffered by the other party by relying upon the message before it is corrected. In the present case it does not appear whether the telegraph line was operated by the defendant's agents and employees or by an independent company. Nor does it make any difference to the plaintiffs, as the telegraph agency acted for the defendant, who is liable for damages caused by its mistake. If the telegraph line was operated by a telegraph company, the defendant could recover of it what damages it had to pay the plaintiffs by reason of its mistake in transmission. But that does not affect this question, which is as to the measure of damages the defendant must pay by reason of the mistake. The court should have instructed the jury, as prayed by the defendant, "that there was never a contract, or coming together of the minds of plaintiffs and defendant to ship cotton at 69½ cents per 100 pounds to Liverpool; but that, as the error was that of defendant's agent, the defendant was obliged to indemnify the plaintiffs against actual loss," and that "the defendant was not obliged to pay plaintiffs any profit plaintiffs would have made on the reduced price for freight on cotton."

STATE v. ROLLINS.

MURDER—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—CHARACTER OF DECEASED—WHEN MAY BE SHOWN—RESCUE OF PRISONER—EXCESSIVE FORCE IN RESISTING—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a murder trial, in which defendant pleaded self-defense, a witness for defendant, near whose house the homicide occurred, testified that on the night of the homicide she heard men quarreling, and a man threatening to cut another's throat. She cried "Murder," and two or three men came to her. Held, that evidence that she told the men a man's throat was being cut at her door was properly excluded.

2. A witness for defendant testified that on the night of the homicide he ran towards the place, hearing shots in that direction. He saw defendant and some more men in front of a house, and saw defendant take hold of one of them. Witness kept going towards defendant, and saw the blaze of a pistol, and he had then reached the place where defendant was standing. Held error to exclude evidence of what defendant said to witness at the time, such evidence being a part of the res gestae.

3. Evidence that one who testified as an eyewitness to the homicide was "very drunk" at the time of the homicide is competent, as going to his credibility.

4. Though defendant set up the plea of self-defense, it was not competent for him to show that deceased was a man of violent character, where he did not know the character of deceased for violence.

5. Where a person is lawfully under the arrest of a police officer, and another attempts to rescue him, the officer, in resisting such arrest, is justified in the use of excessive force, if he acts in good faith and without malice.

6. Where the rescue of a prisoner lawfully in the custody of an officer is attempted, and the officer, in resisting the attempt, uses such force as causes the death of the person attempting the rescue, there is no presumption of law that the officer acted without malice and in good faith, and the burden is on him to show matter either of excuse or in mitigation.

7. Where a person submits to arrest, and a rescue is attempted, the officer has not authority to resist such rescue, and to use such force as is necessary to prevent the rescue, if the original arrest was unlawful.

8. Where a prisoner is lawfully in the custody of an officer, and a rescue is attempted, the officer may arrest the person attempting the rescue, and may use such force as is necessary.

9. Where the killing is admitted to have been done by defendant, an instruction that if the facts of the homicide are in doubt "and the jury are unable to say how the deceased came to his death, and under what circumstances, the jury will render a verdict of 'Not guilty,'" is inapplicable to the facts.

10. In such case, it was proper to refuse to charge that "if there is a reasonable hypothesis, supported by the evidence, which is consistent with the prisoner's innocence, then it is the duty of the jury to acquit," in that all matters of excuse or mitigation devolve on defendant, where the killing is proved.

11. Though the court cannot single out witnesses, and charge the jury that they must make a designated finding if they believe such witnesses, it may properly charge that if the jury believe a certain state of facts, as deposed by certain witnesses, then a certain law is applicable to such facts, the attention of the jury being thereby directed, not to the credibility of the witnesses, but to the facts.

12. The court charged that an officer may arrest without warrant for a breach of the peace committed in his presence, but that he must, unless a known officer, notify the person that he is an officer, and if he fail to do so, especially on demand, the arrest is illegal, and may be lawfully resisted by the person arrested, or third persons, and that the person making the arrest, slaying any one of those resisting it, would be guilty of murder, unless excessive force was used by those resisting, and then he would be guilty of manslaughter. Held a correct proposition of law, and not objectionable as expressing an opinion that defendant was or was not a known officer.

13. The court charged that where the arrest is made legally, by a lawful officer, he may use the amount of force necessary to prevent an escape or rescue, and no more, and if he use excessive force, and death results, he is guilty of manslaughter, but if excessive force is used, and he intentionally slays the person resisting arrest, or the person attempting the rescue, he is guilty of murder. Held, that the omission to further charge that what would be excessive force in an individual, in an ordinary encounter, might not be so in an officer resisting the escape or rescue of a prisoner, was not error, when such further instruction was not asked.

Appeal from superior court, Durham county; H. R. Bryan, Judge.

Wayland P. Rollins was convicted of the felonious slaying of Sandy Jones, and appeals. Reversed.

Defendant was a policeman of the town of Durham, assigned to special duty in a locality called "Smoky Hollow," just beyond the corporate limits of the town; the locality being inhabited, for the most part, by lewd women. On the evening of the homicide, he was drunk, and called, in company with Dick Happer, at a house of ill fame kept by Nan White. While in Nan White's room, deceased and his brothers, John and Charles, stopped at the house. As to the circumstances connected with, and leading up to, the homicide, John Jones testified for the state that he went upon the porch, and knocked at the door, and was told by the woman that he could not come in. He knocked again, and defendant came up the steps, and took him by the arm, advising him that he was under arrest. Witness asked him to show his authority, and defendant did not do so. Happer took witness by one arm, and defendant took him by the other, and deceased came up, and told them to turn witness loose, saying that he would take charge of him. This defendant refused to do, and, on being asked by witness to show his authority, pulled out his pistol, and shot deceased. Before defendant shot, deceased took witness by his left arm, and tried to get him out of defendant's hands. Witness and deceased then ran off in different directions, and deceased died an hour after. Dr. A. Cheatham was called, and testified that deceased died from a pistol wound in the stomach. After introducing witnesses to testify to the good character of John Jones, the state rested.

Dick Happer testified in behalf of defendant that, on the night of the homicide, he and defendant visited Nan White's house. Defendant went into her room; and witness, into another room. Witness heard some one kicking at the door about 15 minutes after. Witness heard a voice say, "It takes a damn good man to carry me up town." Then he heard defendant say, "Well, you will have to go." Witness went out, and found deceased and his two brothers and defendant on the porch. One of them asked defendant to show his authority, and defendant said "Here is my authority," and showed his badge. At defendant's request, witness took John Jones' hand, and they started up town, deceased and Charles Jones following them. Witness heard some one running up behind them, and, looking back, saw deceased and Charles right behind them. Deceased grabbed defendant on the shoulder, and said: "You damn son of a bitch! You shan't carry my brother off." Charles also seized defendant, and a struggle ensued. One of them said, "Cut his damn throat." Defendant fell, and deceased struck him, witness at the same time having his arms around deceased's waist. Charles had defendant by the throat, and said, "Out the damn son of a bitch's throat." Then a pistol was fired twice, and deceased said, "The damn son of a bitch has shot me twice." Defendant called out "Help," or "I'll give up," and witness ran for a policeman, and told him that defendant had tried to arrest some men in Smoky Hollow; that they had jumped on him, and the policeman had better go there quick. Mrs. Brandon's house was the closest house to the shooting.

Nan White testified that, while Rollins was in her room, some men came on her front porch, and kicked the bottom of her door. She stepped into the hall, and told them that she was sick, and that there was no one to see them, and asked them to go away. The kicking continued, and she requested defendant to go out and take them away. The kicking at the bottom of the door was so severe that one of the panels was broken loose.

Mrs. Mary Brandon testified, in substance: "I live on East Main street, near where Reams avenue runs into it. I live on left-hand side of street. No fence around my house. None in front. A wire fence at the side. The night of the homicide, I was at my house, and heard some men coming from towards the railroad. They were coming towards town. There was cursing going on among them. Just as they got to the fence at my house, the cursing was loudest. I heard a man say, 'I'll cut his throat.' Then a pistol fired, and then, right straight, another. Some one said: 'I will cut his G—d d—n throat. I'll cut his head off.' I opened front door, and shut it. Went to back door, and hollowed 'Murder' four or five times. Two or three came to my back door. Jasper Phipps was the only one I knew." Defendant asked witness, "What did you say to those that came to your door?" The state objected, and the answer was ruled out. The defendant excepted. Defendant stated the purpose of the question to be to show that she said to those that came up that they were killing a man at her door; that they were cutting a man's throat at her door, —and insisted that it was competent as a part of the res gestae, and that it tended to corroborate witness in what she now says. Witness had not been attacked.

Jim Potts, a witness for defendant, testified as follows: "I was in Smoky Hollow the night of the homicide, at Lilly Bennett's, about three hundred and fifty yards from Mrs. Brandon's,—back of Nan White's. Heard two pistol shots. Sounded as if shot in a box or house. Heard some one, in a woman's voice, hollow 'Murder.' I saw Mrs. Brandon in her door, hollowing 'Murder.' She continued till I got there. I ran around to the front door. Saw defendant and Jasper Phipps, and some more men in front. I went on after them. Pretty soon, Rollins overtook one, and caught hold of him. Phipps was in front of Rollins, a little bit.

By that time, had gotten out of my sight. I kept going towards Rollins. Saw the blaze of a pistol. By that time, I had gotten up to Rollins." Defendant then asked, "What did Rollins say to you as you ran up, between third and fourth shots?" State objected. Defendant stated that he expected to prove that defendant said, "Catch hold of this man. He has tried to kill me," and insisted on its competency as a part of the res gestae. The answer was excluded, and defendant excepted. "I don't know who fired those last two shots. I could see the blaze, but it was too dark for me to see who shot. Rollins did not. I caught hold of the man that Rollins had. It was Charles Jones. Phipps was standing near, with John Jones." The defendant asked, "What was John Jones' condition?" The state objected. The defendant stated that he expected to prove that he was very drunk, to contradict John Jones, to impeach his credit as a witness, and as a circumstance corroborating defendant's contention of self-defense. The answer was excluded, and defendant excepted.

J. W. Bradford testified, in substance, that he was chief of police of Winston; that he knew the deceased, Sandy Jones, and knew his general character. The defendant offered to prove by this witness that the deceased, Sandy Jones, was a man of most violent and dangerous character. The state objected. The defendant insisted on its competency, there having been introduced evidence going to establish self-defense, and, further, as a circumstance going to show whether the said deceased introduced the knife into the difficulty, the evidence on this point having been circumstantial. The evidence was excluded on the ground that it was not shown that the defendant knew deceased, or his character, and that the evidence of the homicide is not circumstantial, and defendant excepted.

The following instructions were requested by defendant, and their refusal duly excepted to. "If the jury shall believe that the said John D. Jones was under lawful arrest, and in the custody of the defendant, and that the deceased, Sandy Jones, and Charles Jones, either or both of them, attempted to rescue the said John D. Jones from such custody, then the defendant, in resisting such attempt, would be protected in the use of such force that a jury would ordinarily consider excessive, if the defendant was acting in good faith, and was free from malice. If the jury believes that the said John D. Jones was under lawful arrest, in the custody of the defendant, and that the deceased, Sandy Jones, or Charles Jones, both or either of them, attempted to rescue said John D. Jones from such custody, then the law presumes that in resisting such rescue the defendant acted in good faith, and free from the influence of malice. If the jury shall believe that John D. Jones submitted to arrest by the defendant, and submitted to remain in the custody of the defendant, and after the defendant and the said John D. Jones walked together for the distance of twenty or thirty yards, and if the jury believe that the deceased, Sandy Jones, or Charles Jones, or both or either of them, attempted then to rescue the said John D. Jones from such custody, the defendant had the power and authority to resist such rescue, even though the original arrest of John D. Jones was unlawful, and to use such force as was necessary to prevent such rescue and escape. If the jury shall believe that after John D. Jones was arrested by the defendant, if the same was lawful, the deceased, Sandy Jones, or Charles Jones, both or either of them, assaulted the defendant, then the defendant had the power to arrest said Sandy Jones or Charles Jones, or both of them, for such assault, and to use such force as was necessary to make such arrest." The following charges were given at the request of the state, and excepted to by defendant: "(1) That, the killing having been admitted or proven to have been done with a deadly weapon, it devolves upon the prisoner to show to the jury facts or circumstances to mitigate or excuse the crime, and, if the testimony does not satisfy them of the mitigating facts and circumstances, then it is their duty to convict of murder." To this the defendant excepted and assigns as error that the instruction not only ignores, but contradicts, the principle that an officer, in resisting a rescue, is presumed not to use excessive force, nor to have been actuated by malice; the evidence having established he was a police officer, within his jurisdiction and territory. "(2) That if the jury shall find that John Jones was doing no more than knocking at the door of Nan White's house, and asking for admission, as testified to by the said John Jones, W. B. McCulloch, and Charles Jones, then the court charges that the said John Jones was committing no offense, and his arrest was illegal, and that he had the right to resist the arrest, and the deceased had the right to aid him in so doing, and that right existed as long as the arrest continued, and they had the right to use the necessary force to free said John Jones; and the killing of Sandy Jones, in resisting his attempts to free said John Jones, would be murder, unless excessive force was used by the said Sandy, or those acting with him, and, if excessive force was so used, then the crime would be manslaughter." The defendant excepted, and assigned as error that his honor erred in singling out and naming certain state's witnesses, and telling the jury that, if they believed what they said, they would find such and such a verdict, thus giving their testimony undue prominence and dignity, and further insists that the right to resist unlawful arrest was personal to the one arrested, and did not extend to deceased, nor did it extend after John Jones had peacefully submitted. "(3) That an officer may arrest without warrant for a breach of the peace committed in his presence, but he must, unless a known officer, notify the person that he is an officer and has authority, and if he fails to do so, especially upon demand, then the arrest is illegal, and may be lawfully resisted by the party arrested, or third persons; and the person making the arrest, slaying any one of those making the resistance or rescue, would be guilty of murder, unless excessive force was used by those resisting, and then he would be guilty of manslaughter." The defendant excepted, and assigned for error that there is no evidence that defendant was not a known officer; the only evidence on that question being that he had been a policeman of the town, and recognized as such, for more than six months; that if he were an officer, though not known to the one arrested to be such, his said failure would not make an arrest illegal; and, further, that the right to escape, even from illegal arrest, was personal to the party so arrested, and did not extend to third persons. "(4) That where the arrest is made legally, by a lawful officer, then he may use the amount of force necessary to prevent an escape or rescue, and no more, and if he uses excessive force, and death results, then he is guilty of manslaughter; but if excessive force is used, and he intentionally slays the person resisting arrest, or the person attempting the rescue, he is guilty of murder." The defendant excepted, and assigned for error that his honor failed to tell the jury that what would be excessive force in an individual, in an ordinary encounter, would not be so in an officer resisting the escape or rescue of a prisoner, and, further, that in using the phrase, "if excessive force is used," his honor failed to tell the jury by whom the excessive force, if used, led to such a conclusion, and left them to infer that if used by any one, either defendant or deceased and his associates, the same conclusion followed, which was erroneous.

W. A. Guthrie, Boone & Parker, and J. S. Manning, for appellant. The Attorney General and Fuller & Fuller, for the State.

CLARK, J. Ex. 1. The question was properly ruled out. It would not have served to corroborate witness as to what she saw which would have been competent, but only to show her belief or surmise, at the time, of the nature of the occurrence. It was simply irrelevant, and could throw no light upon the facts attending the homicide. There was no attempt to "cut off the head" of any one. That the witness thought and said otherwise that night, when she saw nothing that took place, is immaterial.

Ex. 2. The question was improperly excluded. It was competent to show the declaration of the prisoner made at the time as a part of the res gestae, and also to confirm his testimony of the transaction as given on the trial. While error in excluding competent testimony is cured by afterwards admitting it from the same witness, it is not cured by admitting another to testify to the same purport. State v. Murray, 63 N. C. 31.

Ex. 3. The third exception is well taken. John Jones, on behalf of the state, had testified, as an eyewitness, to the homicide, and had stated that he was not drunk when it occurred. Had this been pertinent only to impeach his character, his answer would have been conclusive. State v. Roberts, 81 N. C. 605. But it went, rather, to his capacity to know and remember with accuracy what took place. It was error, therefore, to exclude proof offered to show that he was "very drunk on that occasion." It would have served to contradict him, and to impair the credit to be given to his evidence, and would have been somewhat corroborative of the prisoner's theory of self-defense. When a witness has testified as an eyewitness to a transaction, it would be competent to show that during the occurrence he was asleep or insensible, and of course, also, that he was very drunk.

Ex. 4. The evidence of the homicide was not circumstantial, and, though the plea of self-defense was set up, it did not appear that the prisoner knew the character of deceased for violence. Evidence to show such character was therefore properly excluded. State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473; State v. Hensley, 94 N. C. 1022.

Ex. 5. The ninth prayer for instruction was erroneously refused. State v. Sigman, 106 N. C. 728, 731, 11 S. E. 520.

Exs. 6 and 10. The tenth prayer for instruction was properly denied. Much is left, necessarily, to the judgment of the officer, in such cases, when acting in good faith and without malice. State v. McNinch, 90 N. C. 605; State v. Sigman, 106 N. C. 728, 11 S. E. 520; State v. Pugh, 101 N. C. 737, 7 S. E. 757. But, when force so signal is used that death is caused thereby, there is no presumption of law that the officer acted without malice and in good faith, i. e. without excess of force. The jury must judge of the reasonableness of the force used, (State v. Bland, 97 N. C. 438, 2 S. E. 480,) and the burden remains on the prisoner to show matter of excuse or mitigation. Good faith and the absence of malice are matters of defense.

Ex. 7. The eleventh prayer for instruction was properly refused. Good faith and want of malice apply as to extent of force used, when the arrest is legal, but do not validate an illegal arrest. State v. Hunter, 106 N. C. 796, 11 S. E. 366. State v. Black, 109 N. C. 856, 13 S. E. 877, does not apply to cases where an officer is on trial for using excessive force, nor where the transaction is not fully completed and finished. If the arrest was invalid, while third parties had no right to assault the officer to take away the prisoner, (State v. Armistead, 106 N. C. 639, 10 S. E. 872,) the officer was also guilty of an affray, in attempting to hold the prisoner by force, against the efforts of himself and friends.

Ex. 8. The twelfth prayer for instruction was properly modified by inserting the words, "If the arrest was lawful."

Ex. 9. The sixteenth prayer for instruction was: "If the circumstances and facts of the homicide are left in doubt to the jury, and the jury are unable to say how the deceased came to his death, and under what circumstances, the jury will render a verdict of 'Not guilty.'" This would be correct, in passing upon the killing, if not conclusively shown to have been committed by the prisoner. But if the killing is proved or admitted to have been done by the prisoner with a deadly weapon, as in this case, exactly the opposite of the prayer is the settled law in this state. State v. Smith, 77 N. C. 488; State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 987. The use of a deadly weapon is proof of malice, for which the prisoner must show excuse or mitigation.

Ex. 10. The eighteenth prayer was: "If there is a reasonable hypothesis, supported by the evidence, which is consistent with the prisoner's innocence, then it is the duty of the jury to acquit." This would be correct as to finding the killing to have been done by the prisoner, when that fact is left in doubt. But when, as in this case, the killing by the prisoner has been established, the instruction would be illegal as to matters of excuse or mitigation, and the prayer must be construed with reference to the evidence. State v. Tilly, 25 N. C. 424. The law is too well settled in this state to be shaken now, that, if the killing is proved or admitted, all matter of excuse or mitigation devolves upon the prisoner. State v. Johnson, 48 N. C. 266; State v. Ellick, 60 N. C. 450; State v. Haywood, 61 N. C. 376; State v. Willis, 63 N. C. 26; State v. Bowman, 80 N. C. 432; State v. Vann, 82 N. C. 631; State v. Boon, Id. 637; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 481; State v. Mazon, 90 N. C. 676; State v. Carland, Id. 668; State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 987; State v. Thomas, 98 N. C. 590, 4 S. E. 518; State v. Byers, 100 N. C. 512, 6 S. E. 420. And there are others to same effect. The case of State v. Miller, 112 N. C. 878, 17 S. E. 167, relied on by the prisoner, makes no change whatever in this well-established rule.

Ex. 11. This raises the same point as exception 6.

Ex. 12 is without merit. The court cannot single out a witness or witnesses, and charge the jury that, if they believe those witnesses, to find so and so. State v. Rogers, 93 N. C. 523, and cases there cited. But there is no impropriety in saying to the jury that if they believe a certain state of facts, as deposed to by certain witnesses, then the law applicable is so and so, when the court, as in this case, has called to their attention the opposite state of facts, as deposed to by other witnesses, and instructed as to the law applicable thereto. This directs the jury's attention, not to the credibility of such witnesses, but as to a certain hypothesis or state of facts; and the reference to the witnesses is simply incidental, to refresh them as to the evidence tending to show that particular state of facts.

Ex. 13. There is no ground for this exception. The proposition of law was correctly stated, (State v. Kirby, 24 N. C. 201,) and contained no expression of opinion that the prisoner was or was not a known officer.

Ex. 14 is not well grounded. The prisoner has no cause to complain of the instruction. If so requested, the judge might have told the jury that what would be excessive force in an individual, in an ordinary encounter, might not be so in an officer resisting the escape or rescue of a prisoner. State v. McNinch and State v. Sigman, supra. But the omission was not error, when the instruction was not asked. Nor is the officer clothed with authority to judge arbitrarily of the necessity for killing. It must be left to the jury to judge of the necessity in each case. State v. Bland, 97 N. C. 438, 2 S. E. 460. Nor do we think that this instruction is open to the charge of ambiguity, pointed out by the exception. Error.

MACKENZIE et al. v. HOWARD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 27, 1893.)

EXECUTION — PROPERTY SUBJECT TO — TITLE OF PROPERTY IN CREDITOR AS SECURITY — RECEIVERS.

A judgment creditor whose debt is secured by an absolute conveyance of land, he having made a bond to reconvey, has no right to levy his fi. fa. upon the land, or to cause the sale of it, until he has made and filed a deed reconveying to his debtor. Nor, before doing this, has he any right to deprive the debtor of possession, and have the property put in the hands of a receiver, merely because the debt remains unpaid, the debtor has become insolvent, and his wife threatens to claim the land. After a proper levy is made, should a sale be hindered or delayed by a frivolous claim interposed by the wife, the creditor's right to equitable relief may then be different.

Error from superior court, Burke county; H. C. Roney, Judge.

Action by H. N. Howard, administratrix of the estate of William H. Howard, deceased, against James H. Mackenzie and another, for the appointment of a receiver, and for an injunction. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

The administratrix of William H. Howard brought a petition for injunction and receiver against James H. Mackenzie and his wife. On the hearing the injunction was granted, and the receiver appointed, and the defendants excepted. The petition sets forth, in substance, the following allegations: About February 6, 1888, Mackenzie delivered to Howard his promissory note, payable November 1st after date, to Howard or order, for $10,000, with interest from date at 8 per cent., together with attorney's fees of 10 per cent., and containing a waiver of homestead and exemption. On March 10, 1888, by deed recorded on the 16th of the following month, Mackenzie conveyed to Howard certain real estate in Waynesborough as security for the payment of the note. As additional security therefor he transferred to Howard 27 notes of various customers, representing them to be worth their face value, $10,108.29. He asked Howard to forward to him for collection two of these notes, amounting to $365, stating that he would collect the same, and send proceeds to Howard, which was done. On February 5, 1889, after repeated and earnest requests of Mackenzie to be allowed to collect said collaterals as agent for Howard, and for his account, the same were delivered to Mackenzie for collection only, all sums collected on any of them to be promptly remitted to Howard, and a full statement of all collections and notes still on hand to be rendered whenever called for, Mackenzie acting as agent for Howard, and not in any manner for his own use. On information and belief petitioner charges that a large part of said collaterals were collected by Mackenzie, but that only $1,500 were paid to Howard out of the collections, leaving a large amount unaccounted for in Mackenzie's hands; and that on demand, repeatedly made, for a full statement, he has failed and neglected to make it. Howard demanded the return of the uncollected notes, but Mackenzie refused to return any. On November 12, 1889, Howard sued Mackenzie in Burke superior court on his note for $10,000, with interest, alleging that Mackenzie had conveyed to him the land above mentioned as security, receiving from Howard a bond conditioned to make titles upon payment of the $10,000 with interest and attorney's fees. This action was defended by Mackenzie, and on June 5, 1890, a verdict was rendered in favor of Howard, and an award was granted by the judge for $6,756 principal, $412 interest to judgment, $500 attorney's fees, and costs, together with interest on the principal and attorney's fees from date of judgment at 8 per cent., with a special lien only on the premises described in the declaration. Judgment was duly entered on the verdict and award for said amounts. The same was not appealed from, and execution issued. After the rendition of the judgment, it was agreed between the parties, through their counsel, that the time of payment be extended on the execution, one-third to be paid on or before one year from date, one-third on or before two years from date, and the other third, in three years; all except costs to bear interest at 8 per cent.; the premises to be adequately insured in favor of Howard, and the policies to be delivered to him; failure to pay any installment rendering all due and collectible. Mackenzie failing to make any payment as per agreement, the execution was levied, February 29, 1892, on the lands described in the deed and judgment, as the property of Mackenzie. Notice was given to him, and the property was duly advertised for sheriff's sale on the first Tuesday in April, 1892. On the day before the day so advertised, Mackenzie's wife interposed her claim to the property, and made affidavit in forma pauperis; and the sheriff postponed the sale. Upon investigation petitioner found that Mrs. Mackenzie's claim to the property was based on a deed from her husband to her, dated September 4, 1888, reciting a consideration of $8,000, and recorded on February 17, 1891. Petitioner charges that this deed to Mrs. Mackenzie is without consideration, was intended to delay, hinder, and defraud creditors, and is void and of no effect against petitioner, especially as its date is subsequent to that of the deed to Howard, and its record is subsequent to that of the date of the judgment. From time to time pending the claim case, Mackenzie, for himself and wife, recognized and admitted that the judgment in favor of Howard was a valid lien on the property, and superior in dignity to the claims of any one, and asked and obtained further time until February 1, 1893, in which to pay the same; partly on which account and partly because at the time of the levy no deed had been filed under section 3654 of the Code, the levy on the property was dismissed by order of plaintiff's attorneys, December 5, 1892, no payment having been made. The extension of time granted has expired, and still no payment has been made. Mackenzie threatens that if another levy is made he will procure his wife to file another claim, and litigate that as long as he can, and that it will be years before the land will be subjected to the payment of Howard's judgment. Mackenzie has not only failed to make any payment on the judgment, but has failed to keep up the insurance, and to pay the taxes due on the property; and to avoid the risk of loss by fire petitioner has been compelled to pay $40 for insurance for the year ending March 10, 1893, and the same amount for the following year, and the sum of $34.50 city tax for 1892 to avoid a sale of the premises by the marshal of Waynesborough. Mackenzie and wife are in possession of one piece of the property, which is worth $400 per annum for rent, and by their tenant are in possession of the other piece, which is worth $200 per annum rent, and are thus receiving the benefit of all income therefrom. Demand has been made by petitioner for the payment of the debt and for the payment at least of the insurance premiums, taxes, and rental value of the premises; but all payment has been refused. At the time he made the deed to Howard, Mackenzie was solvent, but has since become insolvent, and there are now outstanding against him judgments for large amounts, unsatisfied; and Mrs. Mackenzie, according to her affidavit, is insolvent, and has little, if any, property subject to levy; and petitioner has reason to believe that the premises will not sell for enough to pay the principal of the debt, much less the interest, etc., and that the rental value of the premises will be applied to Mackenzie's use, and not to the reduction of the debt. In view of the danger of loss to petitioner, she prays for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the premises, collect the rents therefrom, and hold the proceeds until further order of court; that, if the amount due on the judgment is not paid within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, the premises be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the judgment; that Mackenzie and wife be enjoined from collecting any further rents, and from altering the present status of the property, etc. Discovery is waived. The defendants answered the petition, and also interposed a demurrer thereto. This demurrer alleges that there is no cause of action set out in the petition, and that the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law; that the law furnishes means of enforcing plaintiff's judgment lien on the premises by levy and sale; that, the property being realty, and held under adverse claim of right, a court of equity will not take possession of it, especially as the petition shows that the plaintiff claims a lien thereon which she has the right to enforce, and has had such right since June 5, 1891, and in view of the fact that she has caused the judgment to be levied, and voluntarily abandoned the prosecution of the levy; that if the facts as alleged are true they can be fully determined by any issue that may be made on the levy of the fi. fa., especially as petitioner waives discovery. Defendants specially demur to so much of the petition as refers to the collateral notes given in 1888 to Howard, there being no allegation that they are in any way connected with the title to the land or to plaintiff's claim of lien thereon, and there being no prayer in the petition to make Mrs. Mackenzie account for the same. Further, the petition is not an ancillary proceeding to any suit now in court, the allegation being that prior to the filing of the petition the plaintiff dismissed her levy; and there is in the petition no relief sought to which the bill is an aid or claimed to be. The evidence introduced before the judge at the hearing is brought up by full copies in the bill of exceptions, without making a brief of the same. In the order appointing the receiver he is authorized to demand possession of the realty, and is directed to take possession thereof, rent it out to the best advantage to such tenants as will give proper security for the rent, and from the rents collected pay all taxes, insurance, and necessary repairs, holding the balance until the further order of the court. He is authorized to rent to the defendants the place which they occupy, upon their giving satisfactory security for the payment of the rent and they are ordered to deliver possession of the premises to the receiver.

JACKSON v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

1. The only effect the newly-discovered evidence could possibly have would be to impeach the evidence of one of the state's witnesses, and therefore, under the oft-repeated rulings of this court, a new trial cannot be granted on this ground.

2. Alleged error in admitting oral evidence cannot be considered unless the evidence objected to is itself set out in the motion for a new trial or in the bill of exceptions.

3. The evidence, though far from satisfactory to this court, is sufficient to authorize the verdict, and, there being no error of law for correction, the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial was not abused, though the case was one in which it might well have been exercised in granting a new trial.

Error from superior court, Greene county; W. F. Jenkins, Judge.

John Jackson was convicted of murder, and, his motion for a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

John Jackson was indicted for the murder of Richard J. Youngblood, and found guilty, with a recommendation to life imprisonment. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted.

It appears from the evidence that Dr. Youngblood was killed in his store on the night of Monday, December 26, 1892, the indications being that he was shot with a gun from the outside. One McJunken testified: "I went by his store Monday evening, about seven o'clock. The door was closed. Don't know whether Dr. Youngblood was there. I saw a negro there. Thought it was John Jackson at the time. He came right along, and passed right to my rear, and went down on the last side of Dr. Youngblood's store, and then came back, and asked me where was Dr. Youngblood. I told him I thought he was at the store, and he said it was so cold that he would not stay. He went back the same way he came. He passed the mill, and I saw him when he went into Mr. Caldwell's store. I have known John Jackson for three years. He has been working around there. I am positive that this was the man I saw there. I said at the coroner's inquest that I was informed that the boy I saw was a yellow boy living at Mr. Wood's. After seeing him, I am satisfied. It was dark and sleeting. He was about ten feet in my rear. I didn't turn only my head. Heard no gunshots that night; only firecrackers. The party I saw went back of Mr. Caldwell's store. I watched him, and saw his legs under the house as he went up on Mr. Caldwell's platform. I could not have been mistaken in reference to this John Jackson being the man I saw. It was cloudy, and I saw it was a colored man; but it was not a yellow negro." The first ground of a motion for a new trial is based upon alleged newly-discovered evidence as contained in the affidavits of the coroner and one of the jury that held an inquest over the body of Dr. Youngblood. These affidavits are to the effect that the witness McJunken was a witness before the coroner's jury, and that he stated in his testimony at that time that he had noticed a negro boy in the neighborhood of Dr. Youngblood's store on the night of the murder; that he was a boy about half grown, and that he came in the direction of Eatonton road, and returned that way; that witness didn't know who the boy was, and that this boy was the only person that he saw in the neighborhood of Dr. Youngblood's store on the night of the murder. The usual affidavits of the defendant and his counsel accompany this ground, and it appears from the affidavit of counsel that they represented the defendant by appointment of the court. The next ground of the motion is that the court admitted in evidence, over the defendant's objection, certain alleged incriminating admissions as shown by the testimony of John S. Hall; the ground of objection being that the defendant was induced by Hall's conduct and language to make the admissions on the promise of Hall that he would need no lawyer to defend him of the charge of murder for which he was confined in jail if the defendant would only tell what he knew about it. The error assigned is in not excluding the admission on the grounds that they were induced by the hope of reward, and in leaving to the jury to pass upon whether the admissions were made voluntarily and free from hope of reward or fear of punishment. In the brief of evidence appears the testimony of Hall, substantially as follows: "I saw John Jackson on the Friday after the murder. I asked him if he didn't go out to the river the Sunday before, to see Mr. Caldwell. He said 'Yes.' I asked him why he went, and he said Mr. Caldwell sent for him. I asked him if he was not under contract with Capt. Linticum. He said he was. I then asked him if he didn't have an understanding with Mr. Caldwell to come back Monday, and he said he did. I asked him why he did not go and confirm the contract. He said he didn't go, and then said, 'I don't know anything about the murder of Dr. Youngblood.' I said I did not accuse him of it. He said he could prove his whereabouts from Thursday before the murder until Thursday after, by Fed Armour and his wife. Said he could prove by them that he was at their house on the night of the killing. I replied, 'That clears you then.' He went off, kept looking back, and seemed uneasy. I saw him two weeks after, and asked him if he had not traded coats with somebody in the Fork, and paid one dollar and a half in money. He said he had traded coats, but only paid one dollar, in front of Mr. Vincent's in Greensborough. Said he got the money from Capt. Linticum Saturday before the homicide. I had a conversation in the jail with defendant. I was feeding the prisoners during Sheriff English's absence. Saw some parties outside of the jail talking to Isom and defendant. I told them, 'If you think all this talking to people will do you any good, you had better hush.' Afterwards John said to me he was the best witness I had, and I said I knew he was if he would tell all he knew. I said if he was a witness he would not need a lawyer. Defendant sent for me to come to the jail, and started the conversation himself. He asked me, if he was only a witness, if he would need a lawyer. I told him no; further told him if he was not able to employ, the court would give him one. Before he made his statement I told him that I had nothing whatever to offer him, and it would not be lawful if I did; that I wanted him to distinctly understand this; and then told him that I had nothing to offer him. He then told me that he was down there the night of the murder, with Dawse Williams and Isom Lewis, playing cards. They went up to the store to buy some cheese, etc. Mr. Caldwell came in, and took a gun, and he and Dawse Williams fired and killed Dr. Youngblood. John then went up the river to George Jordan's, getting there the next morning at breakfast. Mr. Caldwell was suspected by many to have been connected with the murder as soon as Dr. Youngblood was killed. John possibly knew that when I had the conversation with him on Friday, in which he said he knew nothing of the killing." Capt. Linticum testified that the defendant came to him on Saturday before Christmas, and wanted to borrow $10, which witness refused to let him have, and that he paid him no money whatever before the murder. John E. Bernhart testified that he heard the second time defendant made a confession to Hall, and corroborated Hall's testimony. Afterwards defendant sent for witness and Hall, and said what he had said to them before was tales. Other circumstances in evidence, which need not be here detailed, point to the defendant as the murderer. On the other hand, numerous witnesses appeared in his behalf, and gave testimony tending to prove an alibi. The motion for new trial contains the general ground that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence.

HARRISON et al. v. BALDWIN et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 24, 1893.)

JUDGMENT LIEN—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

Where a will gives to the husband of the testatrix and his two minor children the whole estate, making him executor, and conferring upon him a power of sale and reinvestment, and he withdraws from the estate more than one-third thereof, and devotes it to his own use, he has no interest in what remains, and a judgment thereafter rendered against him personally for his own debt has no lien thereon.

Error from superior court, Macon county: R. L. Gamble, Judge.

Action by Baldwin & Co. against B. B. Odom. Plaintiffs obtained judgment, and levied execution on defendant's individual interest in realty. Calvin M. Harrison and Daniel S. Harrison intervened, claiming the property levied on under conveyance from defendant as executor of the will of his deceased wife. The court found against claimants, and they bring error. Reversed.

J. W. Haygood, R. F. Lyon, and Harrison & Peeples, for plaintiffs in error. E. A. Hawkins, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. By the will of Mrs. Odom, made in 1884, her husband and her two children each became the beneficial owner of one equal share in her estate. According to the evidence, that estate was of the value of $3,200, and, before the judgments against Odom were rendered, he had withdrawn from the assets more than his full share of the estate. This being so, what was left belonged to the two children, and a sale and conveyance of the same, made by Odom as executor under a power contained in the will, passed title to the purchasers free from the lien of the judgments in question, though that sale and conveyance did not take place until after these judgments were rendered. A legatee or devisee has no interest left in an estate upon which a lien could attach in favor of his creditor, after he has received and appropriated to his own use as much of the estate as he was entitled to. That he has done this informally, and without any partition or division in terms, would certainly make no difference, where the estate is in the hands of the legatee or devisee himself, and he is also executor, and enough of it is in ready money to pay off his interest, and he retains the money and appropriates it to his own use. In this case, suppose Odom had not exercised his power of sale as to these lands, but had retained the lands until after his children became of full age; could not the children have recovered them from him as their property, upon proof that he had expended, for his own use, money belonging to the estate, amounting to more than one-third of the whole value of the estate? We think there can be no question that they could. The direction in the will to keep the property together was not obligatory upon Odom as to his own interest in it, for he was a mature man, and no trust of which he was both the beneficiary and the trustee could be raised by the will which would be obligatory upon him as to his one-third clear interest in the assets of the estate. The court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiffs, and against the claimants, in the court below. Judgment reversed.

MAYNARD v. MARSHALL.

STATUTES—TITLE OF ACT—AMENDMENTS—USURY.

1. The title of a law being "An act to regulate and restrict the rate of interest in this state, and for other purposes," a provision in the body of the act declaring it unlawful for any person to reserve, charge, or take any rate of interest greater than 8 per centum per annum, and that any person violating this provision shall forfeit the interest and the excess of interest so charged or taken, or contracted to be reserved, charged, or taken, is covered by the title, and is not matter variant or different therefrom.

2. In view of the rule that statutes amending prior statutes are to be construed as intended to have operation on future transactions only, and as having no retroactive purpose not plainly expressed, the act of September 27, 1881, which amends the act of October 14, 1879, does not repeal or modify the second section of the latter act, save as to contracts entered into subsequently to the passage of the amending act. The effect of the amendment was to leave persons who had violated the original act subject to forfeit the interest, as well as the excess of interest, charged or taken, or contracted to be reserved, charged, or taken, while those violating the provisions of the act after the amendment would forfeit the excess of interest only.

3. There was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Monroe county; J. S. Boynton, Judge.

Action by W. T. Maynard against Ira J. Marshall to foreclose a mortgage. There was a verdict for defendant, and a new trial denied. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. D. Stone, R. L. Maynard, and Hall & Hammond, for plaintiff in error. T. B. Cabaniss, Berner & Bloodworth, and Harrison & Peebles, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The title of the act was sufficiently comprehensive to cover all the provisions embraced in the body of the statute, and nothing on this subject need be said in addition to what is set out in the first headnote.

2. The statute on the subject of interest which was of force when the note and mortgage involved in this case were made was the act of October 14, 1879, the first section of which was in these words: "That from and after the passage of this act, it shall not be lawful for any person, company or corporation, to reserve, charge or take for any loan or advance of money, or forbearance to enforce the collection of any sum of money, any rate of interest greater than eight per centum per annum, either directly or indirectly, by way of commissions for advances, discount, exchange, or by any contract or contrivance or device whatever." This section of the act is still of force, without modification. So, also, is the third section of the act, which reads thus: "That the legal rate of interest shall remain seven per centum per annum, where the rate per cent. is not named in the contract, and any higher rate must be specified in writing, but in no event to exceed eight per cent. per annum." The jury have found that, of the amount set forth in the note as principal, the sum of $99.03 was usury. This means that $99.03 over and above 8 per cent. interest on the loan went into the principal of the note as a usurious charge for the use of the money loaned. It results that as to the whole interest, including the usury, the contract evidenced by the note was unlawful when it was made, and remains unlawful still. Inasmuch as courts will not aid in the enforcement of an unlawful contract, the interest is not collectible upon general principles. Indeed, if it were not for the language of the second section of the act, which will be presently quoted, this illegality would taint the note, not alone as to the interest, but as to the principal also; and this it would do without any express provision in the statute declaring the note to be void. Such was the ruling of the supreme court of the United States in Bank v. Owens, 2 Pet, 527. The principal of the note, and that alone, was saved by the second section of the act, that section being in these words: "That any person, company or corporation violating the provisions of the foregoing section of this act, shall forfeit the interest, and the excess of interest, so charged or taken, or contracted to be reserved, charged or taken." It is contended, however, that by the modification of this section, which took place by the amending act of September 27, 1881, interest up to the lawful rate of interest on the principal of the loan was relieved from the taint, and rendered collectible. The first section of the amending act reads as follows: "That section 2 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate and restrict the rate of interest in this state, and for other purposes,' approved October 14th, 1879, which provides for forfeiture of all interest in cases of violation of its provisions be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words 'the interest and' in the third line of said section, so that, as amended, it will read as follows: "That any person, company or corporation violating the provisions of the foregoing section of this act shall forfeit the excess of interest so charged or taken or contracted to be reserved, charged or taken." The second section of the amending act expressly repeals section 4 of the prior act, which relates to the mode of proof, and the third section repeals all conflicting laws. The question is whether the first section ought to be so construed as to work a repeal, or even a partial repeal, of the second section of the amended act with reference to usurious contracts entered into prior to the date of the repealing act. The constitution of 1877 expressly prohibits the passage of retroactive laws, and the general rule laid down by the Code is that laws prescribe only for the future. It is also a general rule applicable to amending statutes that they are to be construed as intended to have operation on future transactions only, and as having no retroactive purpose not plainly expressed. The amending act left untouched sections 1 and 3 of the original act. There can be no doubt that these sections still apply to the note involved in this case, and we have already seen that they denounce in express terms the contract in that note to be illegal, both as to the interest and the excess of interest. This being so, is there the slightest probability that the legislature intended the amendment to retroact upon that note, and similar contracts in existence when the amending law was passed? We think not, and so rule. The case before us is not like that dealt with by the supreme court of the United States in Ewell v. Daggs, 108 U. S. 143, 2 Sup. Ct. 408, where the whole fabric of usury laws had been swept away by a provision contained in the constitution of Texas. Ours is a case in which the legislative declaration that the contract is unlawful is left standing upon the statute book unmodified and unrepealed. Indeed, if this were not so, it would be difficult to abide by the principle of several decisions made by this court, and yet treat contracts as gaining a legal status by the repeal of usury laws, when they did not have it at the time the parties contracted. See Shealey v. Toole, 56 Ga. 210; Campbell v. Murray, 62 Ga. 86; Broach v. Kelly, 71 Ga. 696. Are notes, deeds, etc., fatally vicious on account of usury, to become legally operative when the usury laws are repealed, and again vicious when those laws are reinstated, and so continue to rise and fall as often as the policy of the state with respect to usury may change, or will the first change only take effect upon them, and subsequent changes pass them by? We need not at present insist that the better and safer line of decision in respect to usurious contracts is the one which this court has heretofore adopted in the three cases just cited, because, whether the repeal of all usury laws would or would not infuse life into a contract which was not in it before, we can safely hold that where such laws are not repealed, so as to remove from the statute book all denunciation of such contracts as unlawful, they get no new life by an amendment of the law which can be fairly construed as intended to operate prospectively only. We thus reach the same result in the present case, wherein the effect of the amending act of September 27, 1881, has been made a direct question, as was reached in Crane v. Goodwin, 77 Ga. 362, in which the direct question appears not to have been presented.

3. The evidence was conflicting, and the verdict is not altogether satisfactory to this court; but it was satisfactory to the court below, and we cannot say that there was any error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

GORDON, Governor, v. TRIMMIER.

DEED—WHEN TITLE PASSES—DESCRIPTION—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. If a husband, being the owner of two adjacent town lots, execute to his wife a deed embracing both, though using in the description the number of one of them only, this would be a conveyance of both, provided the deed was delivered; but, if not, it would convey neither. Recording the deed, or having it recorded, would be sufficient, but not conclusive, evidence of delivery. If, notwithstanding the recording, it be shown affirmatively that there was really no delivery, and that the intention to deliver was abandoned, the deed would be inoperative. Should the deed embrace only one of the lots, it would convey no more, and the same rule as to delivery would, of course, apply.

2. If a father was the owner of two adjacent town lots, lying in the angle formed by the junction of a street with an alley, and conveyed to his daughter certain premises, (not specifying the quantity or dimensions,) described as lying in that angle, but designated by a number not corresponding with the number of either of the lots, and afterwards died intestate, the presumption is that he misdescribed the number of the lot which he intended to convey; but there is no presumption that he intended to convey both lots, although they were inclosed together, and his residence was located on one or both of them. His intention in this respect would be open to determination by extrinsic evidence of all relevant facts and circumstances. If he intended to convey both, although he specified but a single number, the daughter would acquire title to both. If, however, he intended to convey only one, and afterwards died intestate still owning the other, his widow, unless she took dower, would inherit from him at least a one-fifth undivided interest in the other, and this would be subject to levy and sale as her property under a judgment against her.

3. While a claim case is pending, an incomplete prescriptive term, as between the claimant and the defendant in fi. fa., will not become complete, as against the plaintiff in fi. fa.; the levy having been made and the claim interposed while prescription was running, but before it had ripened.

Error from superior court, Catoosa county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

Action on an official bond by John B. Gordon, governor of the state of Georgia, against one Brantley, principal, and Mrs. C. N. Trimmier and others, as sureties. There was judgment for plaintiff, and execution thereon was levied on property as that of Mrs. C. N. Trimmier. Mary Trimmier intervened, claiming to be owner of the property levied on. The court found for claimant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiff in error. McCutchen & Shumate, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. According to a map of the town of Ringgold, in evidence, three adjacent lots, (filling the space between Buck alley and Mountain street,) Nos. 40, 41, and 42, fronted on Middle street; and, of these, No. 40 was bounded on one side by Buck alley, and lay immediately in the angle formed by the junction of that alley with Middle street. Next to this lot, on the Middle street front, was No. 41, and next to it was No. 42, which extended to Mountain street. Neither of these two lots touched Buck alley; the first being separated from it by No. 40, and the second by both 41 and 40. The map is silent as to the dimensions or extent of any of the lots. It is clear from other evidence that No. 42, the "Vincent land," was never owned by O. W. Trimmier, and is no part of the premises now in controversy. It is conceded that the other two lots both belonged to him, but the only conveyance to him shown was a deed from Robert L. Barry, made in 1867, which described the premises thus: "Lot forty-one in the eastern division of the town of Ringgold, fronting on Middle street ninety feet, and running back two hundred and ten feet, more or less." There is no evidence as to whether 90 feet on Middle street would embrace two lots, or only one. It does appear, however, that O. W. Trimmier inclosed both lots together, and that his dwelling house was within the inclosure. Which lot it was on, or whether partly on each, does not appear. In September, 1871, he conveyed to his wife by deed of gift, describing the premises thus: "All that part or parcel of land in the town of Ringgold known and distinguished as 'Lot Number Forty-One,' being the lot I bought from Robert L. Barry, whose deed of conveyance to me is recorded in book —, page 53, of the Land Records of said county." This deed was duly recorded by himself on January 4, 1873; he being then clerk of the superior court, the recording officer designated by law. There is no direct evidence of its delivery, and his widow testifies it was never actually delivered, nor was she informed of its execution or existence. On the 8th of January, 1873, 14 days after he recorded the deed to his wife, he conveyed to his daughter Mary

M., the claimant in this case, a lot described as follows: "Known as town lot number forty-two, in the eastern division of the town of Ringgold, and in the angle of Buck alley and Middle street." This deed, also, was duly recorded by him on the day of its execution, and there is evidence of its actual delivery. The premises under levy as the property of Mrs. Trimmier—formerly the wife, now the widow, of O. W. Trimmier—are described in the levy thus: "Town lot in the town of Ringgold, Georgia, known as the 'Trimmier Property,' fronting on Buck alley on the south, and on Middle street on the west, and lying west of Mrs. J. M. Comb's property and the jail lot, and south of the Gilbert Vincent property." The levy is dated October 28, 1889, and the judgment on which it is founded was rendered in the previous month. O. W. Trimmier died in October, 1884, and up to that time resided with his family, including his wife and his daughter Mary M., on the premises embraced in his inclosure. It is certain he recognized the property, or some of it, as belonging to his wife, for he returned it for taxation as hers; and after her death it was returned in a similar manner by her son, down to and including the year of the levy. The evidence indicates that in some of the years the father, and after him the son, returned a part of the property, and a part only, as belonging to the daughter, the claimant. After the death of the husband and father, the family continued to reside on the premises; the daughter, as it would seem, claiming the whole, and the widow making no claim for herself, but recognizing the daughter's title. She testifies that she never heard of the deed from her husband to herself until after the levy. The son could not explain why he returned as hers the land for taxation, but he ceased so returning it when the levy was made, and has since returned it all as the property of his sister, the claimant.

1. Under the evidence, it is quite impossible to tell whether the deed to Mrs. Trimmier covers both lots, or only one. It is certain that it covers lot No. 41, but the doubt is whether it also embraces No. 40. If 90 feet front on Middle street would include both lots, the deed would convey both, although it, as well as the deed from Barry, to which it refers, describes the premises as one lot, and designates but one number. To make it effective at all, however, it would have to be delivered, not literally and manually, but substantially and virtually. The recording of it would be sufficient, though not conclusive, evidence of such delivery. The inference arising from this fact could be overcome by affirmative evidence showing nondelivery in fact, and that the intention to deliver was abandoned. On this question the circumstantial evidence in the record bears in one direction, and most of the direct evidence in the other. Upon either of two suppositions, the making of the second deed could be reconciled with the making of the first. One of these is that the first deed, whether it embraced the whole tract or not, was never made effective by delivery. The other is that each deed was intended to cover one lot only; the first being applicable to No. 41, and the second to No. 40.

2. As to the second deed, whether it be treated as embracing one lot or two, there is certainly a mistake in the number. The number specified is applicable to the "Vincent land," and that lot is in the angle of Middle and Mountain streets, not in the angle of Middle street and Buck alley. This deed, rejecting the mistaken number, would seem, on its face, to be intended to convey one lot, and no more,—the lot in the angle last mentioned, that lot being No. 40. It would be possible, however, to treat this angle, using the term in a very loose sense, as embracing both lots, to wit, Nos. 40 and 41, and this construction could be adopted, if shown by extrinsic evidence to be the correct one, according to the intention of the maker of the deed. The mere fact that both lots were in the same inclosure, and that his residence was within the inclosure, would afford no presumption that he intended to convey both by this deed. But all the relative facts and circumstances, taken as a whole, might manifest such an intention. Among these, a very important element would be the extent of the first deed. If that deed was confined by the 90-foot limit on Middle street to one of the lots, it is almost absolutely certain that the second was intended to cover the other lot only. If, on the contrary, the first deed embraces both lots, it is fairly probable that the second might be intended to displace the first, and embrace both also. It is manifest that, if the second deed conveyed only one of the lots, the non-delivery of the first, even if conclusively established, would not be decisive of the whole case, for in that event title to the first remained in the maker of both deeds, and when he died, if he died intestate,—and there is no evidence of a testacy,—his widow, unless she took dower, inherited from him at least a one-fifth undivided interest in that lot, and this would be subject to sale as her property under the levy already made upon the whole tract. The claimant could have no right, by virtue of the deed from her father, to defeat a sale, even of the whole of lot 41, unless this deed covers that lot as well as the other. By instructing the jury that, if they found that the deed to Mrs. Trimmer was never delivered, their verdict should be in favor of the claimant, the trial court erred, for the nondelivery of that deed would not be decisive of the whole case.

3. The court erred, also, in delivering any charge whatever on the subject of prescription. Prescription was not in the case, for O. W. Trimmer was in possession until his death, in October, 1884; and there is certainly no evidence that he held for his daughter, as against his wife, but the weight of the evidence is to the contrary. The levy was made in October, 1889, about five years after the possession of O. W. Trimmer was terminated by death. From that time up to the levy, no prescriptive title could have ripened in favor of any one, for the shortest period in which that could take place would be seven years. It is too plain for argument that no prescriptive title available on the trial of a claim interposed as against that levy could be acquired pending the litigation to enforce the levy on one side, and to defeat it on the other. Judgment reversed.

AUGUSTA RY. CO. v. GLOVER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1893.)

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT — WHO MAY SUE — PLEADINGS — STREET-CAR COMPANIES — NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE — DAMAGES.

1. The declaration sets forth a cause of action.

2. Where there is no special demurrer to a declaration, it is not error to refuse to strike from the latter certain words, as not relevant either in matter of form or substance, the motion to strike being made orally at the trial.

3. The right of action given by the act of October 27, 1887, to a mother for the homicide of her son, upon whom she is dependent in whole or in part for support, is not confined to residents of this state, but belongs alike to all mothers under like circumstances, wheresoever they may reside.

4. It is no bar to a suit by the mother for the homicide of her minor son, that the father has a pending suit in which he claims damage for the loss of the son's services up to the time the latter would have arrived at his majority.

5. Evidence of the father's physical disability to labor is admissible in behalf of the mother, as tending to show her partial dependence on the minor son whose homicide is complained of.

6. Where father and mother and minor children all reside together, and are mutually dependent upon the labor of the family for support, a minor child over 15 years of age, whose labor, or the proceeds of it, come into the common stock, is to be considered as contributing substantially to the support of the mother.

7. The fact that the passenger killed had never before ridden upon an electric car was admissible in evidence, for the purpose, at least, of illustrating the cause of his failure to alight from the car in safety.

8. An electric railway company which has provided its cars with gates to prevent passengers from alighting on the side next to a parallel track cannot defend itself against the charge of negligence in not keeping one of the gates closed, by the evidence of its president "as to observations he had made in reference to electric street-car lines, cable-car lines, and other street-car lines operating on double tracks, that he had made recently in various cities of the United States in reference to the use of gates on the cars, and to show that gates are not used."

9. Although there may be no negligence whatever in the failure of an electric street railway company to have gates to the platform of its cars, for the purpose of guarding against accidents to passengers by preventing them from leaving the cars on the side next to a parallel track of the same company, in the street, yet when a particular company has such gates to the platforms of its cars, not to keep them closed may or may not be negligence is the given instance, and this is a question of fact for the jury.

10. Although it is the duty of a street-car company to select a reasonably safe place for landing passengers wherever it may stop a car for that purpose, yet, if the place be safe for a passenger to get off while the car is at rest, the company is not responsible for any peril which the passenger incurs, without its fault, from attempting to alight after the stoppage has terminated and the car has been put in motion, provided a reasonable time for alighting was allowed while the car was at rest, and the conductor did not know that the particular passenger intended to get off at that place, and did not see him attempting to get off in time to warn or prevent him from so doing while the car was in motion.

11. When a car stops because of an obstruction on the track, and not to afford any passenger an opportunity for getting off, the company is not responsible for the safety of the place as one for getting off, whether the car, at the time the passenger undertakes to do so, be in motion or at rest, the conductor not seeing the passenger, or being aware of his purpose, at the time the attempt to get off is made.

12. Improper statements made by counsel in argument, which the presiding judge did not hear, and to which his attention was not called, either then, or afterwards during the progress of the trial, not even by any request to charge the jury, will not require or justify the grant of a new trial.

13. The charge of the court touching the measure of recovery was subject to misconstruction, and was not quite full enough as to the right of the jury to avail themselves of facts in the evidence, irrespective of the mortality tables.

14. In view of the facts of the case and the general charge of the court to the jury, there was no error in denying any of the requests to charge made by the defendant below.

15. It was not error to allow the plaintiff to write off part of the damages found by the jury.

Error from city court of Richmond; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Barbara E. Glover against the Augusta Railway Company to recover for the death of plaintiff's son. Plaintiff had judgment, and a new trial was denied. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

On January 13, 1891, Mrs. Glover sued the railway company for damages for the killing of her son, who was alleged to have been, at the time of his death, 15 years and 5 months old. The declaration alleged that her son was single, and had no child or children, that she was dependent on him, and that he contributed to her support; further, that he boarded one of defendant's street cars propelled by electricity in Augusta, for the purpose of going to the Georgia Railroad depot, took his seat, and paid his fare; that when the car reached a certain point, about opposite the Union Depot, it came to a stop, and her son got off the car from the rear platform, near to the parallel street railroad track of defendant, at which moment another of defendant's cars, running on the parallel track in an opposite direction to that of the car from which he had just dismounted, ran over him, killing him; that he was not familiar with the method in which the cars were run and operated; that he resided in the country, and had never before ridden on said electric cars; that the approach of the car which ran over him was wholly unexpected and unseen by him until too late to get out of the way; that it was the duty of defendant's agents in charge of the car on which he had ridden to the depot, to have had the platform gate next to the parallel track on the rear end of the car closed, and to have cautioned and seen that he did not leave the car from that side, which duties they negligently and carelessly failed to perform; that it was also the duty of defendant's agents in charge of the car which ran over him to have slowed up as it approached the point where it was to pass the other car, which duty was wholly disregarded, the car being actually run at the time at the rate of 12 miles per hour, a rate not only positively prohibited by the city ordinances, but which, in the absence of such prohibition, would at the locality have been an act of gross carelessness; that the motorman in charge of the car that ran over her son, at the moment or just before, was negligently engaged in a conversation with the conductor on his (the motorman's) car, instead of being on the lookout ahead of his car, as was his duty. Contemporaneously with the filing of the mother's suit, the father filed his suit in the same court, alleging the same acts of negligence as causing the death of his son, and claiming damages by reason of having been deprived of his son's services up to the time of his majority. The defendant demurred to the declaration of the mother on the grounds: (1) It set forth no legal cause of action. (2) There was no allegation that deceased could not have seen the car approaching him in time to have avoided coming in collision with it, or that he made any effort to avoid coming in collision with it. (3) Plaintiff failed to allege that the point at which he left the car was the regular stopping place, or that the stopping of the car was for the purpose of taking on or letting passengers off. If it was not stopped for such purposes, then plaintiff failed to allege that deceased gave any notice of his desire or intention to leave the car, or that defendant's servants in any other way had notice of such intention. (4) Because plaintiff failed to allege that defendant had any notice of deceased's want of familiarity with the running and operation of electric cars, or that his size or appearance were such as to cause notice thereof to be taken by defendant's servants. (5) Plaintiff failed to allege that she is a widow, or is living separate from her husband, or in what way she was dependent on her child, it appearing that he was only 15 years and 5 months old, and there being no allegation as to his ever having worked or earned money. Defendant also filed its plea in abatement, alleging the pendency of the two suits for the same cause of action, and that they were inconsistent, and praying that plaintiff be required to elect with which of the suits he or she would proceed, and other pleas. The father's case standing first on the docket when the court met to assign cases, the defendant insisted that the cases should be assigned in the order in which they appeared, and called the attention of the court to the plea in abatement. Thereupon the attorneys for the father, the attorneys in the two cases being the same, dismissed the father's case. The court overruled the defendant's demurrer, and struck defendant's amended plea, to the effect that plaintiff and her son, being residents of South Carolina at the time of his death and at the time of the trial, and ever since, could not recover under the act of October 27, 1887, giving the right of action to the mother. The court also refused, on defendant's motion, to strike from the declaration the words: "That the said John C. Glover was not familiar with the manner in which said cars of the defendant were run and operated; that he resided in the country, and had never before ridden on said electric cars,"—it being alleged that these words were irrelevant and illegal, and tended to confuse the issues, and raised an issue which, if established by testimony, tended to prejudice the rights of defendant. To these rulings defendant excepted pendente lite, and assigns error upon them in its final bill of exceptions. The jury found a verdict for plaintiff for $7,733.98. Defendant moved for a new trial. Before the hearing of this motion the father renewed his suit for the services of his minor son, whereupon defendant filed an amended motion for new trial, bringing to the attention of the court the fact of the filing and dismissal of the father's first suit, and the filing of the second, and, upon defendant's presenting this amended motion, the attorneys for the father dismissed the second suit.

The motion for new trial contained the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc.; also, that the verdict was grossly excessive, and, having been rendered by the jury within 18 minutes from the time they left the court room, showed that the jury did not fully consider the case, but found the verdict upon a mistake of fact and without due consideration. Because the court overruled the objection of defendant to the evidence of one Westbrook that deceased had never ridden on the electric cars before, the objection being that the evidence was irrelevant, and tended to confuse the legal issue before the jury. Error in admitting, over objection of defendant, the answer of one Hammond to the following question of plaintiff's counsel: "Q. Now, I will ask you if you are able to make any further statement on the question, as to anything that comes within your own knowledge regarding the question, as to whether his mother was not wholly or in part dependent upon the services of this son. A. I know his mother received benefits from the services of this boy, and I know that she is a dependent person." The objection was that the answer showed it was simply the opinion of the witness, and illegal, and because the witness only stated that the mother received "benefits" from the services of the boy, and that part is irrelevant, as it does not show dependence, and because the dependence referred to by the witness was not prior to the death. Because the court overruled defendant's objection to the following question and answer to and of Hammond? "Q. Do you know any fact that incapacitated the father from working? A. I know a fact which has incapacitated him for twenty-five years. Well, he has been working for me a number of years, and I have known him to be completely incapacitated, and for weeks at a time, on account of an old wound received at Secessionville, which breaks out now and then on him,"—the objection being that the testimony was irrelevant and illegal, and tended to prejudice the jury against defendant, and raised an issue for argument to the jury which did not legitimately belong to the issues to be tried. Because the court admitted, over defendant's objection, testimony of plaintiff that her husband was incapacitated to labor at times, and was over 50 years old; that there was an old wound which gave him trouble, and incapacitated him from 8 to 10 weeks, and when he was not laid up he was not able to do as much work as other men on account of his wound. The objections to this evidence were similar to those stated in the last ground above. Because the court admitted, over similar objections of defendant, similar testimony of plaintiff's husband. Error in charging: "The duty of exercising extraordinary diligence to protect the lives and persons of passengers continues not only while in transit, but until the passenger has reached his destination and safely disembarked. Carriers of passengers are required to provide, at points of destination, places where passengers can leave their cars safely." Alleged to be error, because, while correct in the abstract, it was not applicable to the facts in the case, and tended to confuse and mislead the jury, and further tended to impress the jury that it was defendant's duty to provide a regular station at which deceased could get off, and that any place where he did get off was to be considered such a station, notwithstanding defendant claimed that he got off the car without notice to it, and at a point not intended for passengers to alight. Error in charging: "If carriers contract or agree to deliver passengers at points other than regular stations or stopping places, the law requires that they shall select places where passengers can safely disembark." Alleged to be error because tending to confuse and mislead the jury, not applicable to the facts, and not sustained by the evidence, especially in that the court nowhere undertook to define or explain to the jury what constituted a station or stopping place for a street car on the public streets. Error in charging: "If you are satisfied from the evidence that deceased was a passenger of defendant's company, and that while disembarking from one car he was run over and killed by a passing car of defendant's company, I charge you the defendant would be responsible for the injury sustained, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff, unless you find also from the evidence that the servants or employees of defendant's company used extraordinary care and diligence to protect him against the injury, or that when the negligence of defendant's employees became apparent, or was existing, the deceased could have avoided the consequences of defendant's negligence. In either event your verdict should be for defendant." Alleged to be error because it put upon defendant the responsibility of exercising extraordinary diligence in protecting deceased from being run over by a passing car, notwithstanding defendant claimed that, after he had alighted from its car, the relation of passenger and carrier ceased, and it was only bound from that time to the exercise of all reasonable care and diligence to protect deceased; and because the charge was misleading and tended to confuse the jury, in that the court failed to explain what he referred to in speaking of the negligence of defendant's employees, in connection with the exercise of extraordinary diligence at that particular time. Error in charging: "If the injured person and the agents of the company are both at fault, the plaintiff may recover, but the damage shall be diminished in proportion to the fault attributable to the injured person." Alleged to be error because the court failed to qualify the same by adding: "Unless deceased could have avoided the effects of defendant's negligence by the exercise of ordinary care." Error in charging: "For the homicide by the negligence of a railroad company of her child, unmarried and childless, a mother may recover when the child contributed to her support, and she was substantially dependent on such child in part for support, although she was likewise dependent upon her husband and her own labor." Alleged to be error because the court simply took the language in Daniels v. Railway Co., 86 Ga. 236, 12 S. E. 363, without explaining to the jury that the law meant that the contribution must be a substantial one, and the dependence must be material. Error in charging: "If your verdict be for the plaintiff, it should be for full value of the life of deceased as shown by the evidence, without making any reduction for personal expenses had he lived. In determining the value of life of deceased, you consider his age, his expectancy of life, the amount he was earning when killed, his capacity to earn money in the avocations of life in which he was engaged. It is the cash value of the life that is to be given; not the gross amount he would have received during the term of years the tables say he could reasonably have expected to live. It is the gross amount reduced to present cash value." Alleged to be error because calculated to mislead the jury by impressing upon them the fact that they must find the full value of deceased's life, if they determine to find for plaintiff, without regard to deceased's contributory negligence; because the court failed to explain to the jury that they were not bound by the tables introduced, or by any procrustean rules, in arriving at the value of the life of deceased; because the court failed to explain to the jury the manner in which they should arrive at the cash value of the life of deceased; and because the charge, in effect, told the jury that they were bound to give deceased the expectancy that the tables showed. Also error in the entire general charge because the same stated only abstract legal principles, and failed to apply them in any way to the evidence, the jury being left entirely to their own convictions as to what points in the evidence such principles applied; because the charge nowhere explained when the relation of passenger and carrier ceased with reference to a passenger on a street railroad car, and, without such explanation applied to the facts, the jury were left under the charge to suppose that defendant was bound to furnish some kind of depot or alighting place for passengers getting off a street car in the streets, and this notwithstanding defendant claimed that the evidence showed that deceased voluntarily alighted from its car while in motion, without notice to its conductor, and at a point other than the place intended for passengers to get off; and because the charge failed to cover all the issues involved. Error in charging: "A carrier of passengers is legally bound not only to safely transport, but to furnish the means of safe egress from the trains and passage therefrom." Alleged to be error because tending to confuse and mislead the jury, and to put upon defendant the burden and duty not only of providing a safe exit from its cars, but of protecting deceased after he left the car and was upon the street; and because inapplicable to the facts.

Error in refusing to allow defendant's counsel to ask Dyer, president of defendant, and to permit Dyer to testify, as to observations he had recently made in reference to electric and other street-car lines operating on double tracks in various cities of the United States, in reference to the use of gates on the cars, and to show that gates were not used. One of the allegations in the declaration being that defendant was negligent in not having the gates on the rear platform of the car closed, the defendant alleges that this evidence was pertinent. Error in refusing to charge the following written requests of defendant: "The first question for you to consider under the evidence is, was the mother substantially dependent on deceased for a support? To be dependent substantially upon him she must 'rely maternally on him' for support. She must be unable to support herself materially or substantially without his aid in whole or in part, and he must be essential to her support in whole or in part. A dependent is 'one who is sustained by another, or who relies on another for support or favor.' The second question for you to consider, if you find that she was substantially dependent on deceased, is: Did he, before his death, substantially contribute to her support? That is, did the aid he furnished her substantially or materially contribute to her support? If you find from the evidence that deceased was about 15½ years old; that he lived at home with his father and mother; that he had an older brother and some sisters, who also lived at home and worked on the farm, and they all helped their father in this work; that deceased worked on the farm with his father and sisters and older brother, as one of the family, without wages, when he could, and helped his father at other work when he could; and that the proceeds of his labor, both on the farm and elsewhere when he worked, went into the common lot, or was used by the father and mother, and thus contributed to the help and support of (all) the entire family,—then I charge you that the mother, under the law, was not substantially dependent on him for a support, and you should find a verdict for the defendant. I charge you that the court understands the law to be that where a mother is substantially dependent on a child for support, and that child materially contributes to her support, the child stands in the place of and represents the father or husband, so far as he substantially contributes in whole or in part to her support. If you find in this case that the father lived with his wife and family, that he was the head of such family, and did all he could to support the same, and that deceased only aided and helped as a son would naturally do, and the result of his labor went for the benefit of himself and his father and mother and other members of the family, then I charge you that under the law the plaintiff was not substantially dependent on him, and you should find for the defendant." Alleged to be error because these requests were legal, pertinent, applicable to the facts, not covered by the general charge, and because they assisted the jury in applying the law to the evidence, and would have enabled the jury to have seen whether the facts came up to what the law required in each element of its requirements; also, because, if the court had given the charge divided as requested, the jury could have seen that the fact as to the son's contributing to his mother's support and her material dependence were issues to be tried, while under the charge as given these issues were not explained according to the facts. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "If you find from the evidence that plaintiff and her deceased son and the entire family, at the time of this injury, were residents of South Carolina and have so continued and are now, then I charge you that the act of October, 1887, giving the mother a right to sue for the homicide of her son, does not apply, and your verdict must be for the defendant." Alleged to be error because the uncontradicted evidence showed that plaintiff, her husband and entire family, were residents of South Carolina when the son was killed, and have ever since so continued, and the son was only in Georgia on a visit the day he was killed; defendant alleging that the act of October 27, 1887, applies only to one who when the right of action accrued was a resident of Georgia. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "I charge you that if deceased could have seen the car approaching him and avoided it by the exercise of ordinary care, then the plaintiff cannot recover." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, applicable, etc., and because the evidence showed that the view was unobstructed, and if deceased voluntarily got off the car while in motion, and on the side next to the parallel track, without notice to the conductor, and after the car had left the stopping place at the crossing, then deceased was bound to exercise ordinary care in looking as to where he was going and as to what was coming. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "I charge you that if you find from the evidence that deceased got on the car to go to the Union Depot; that the car stopped at the usual place of stopping to let passengers off at said depot; that it moved on, and that deceased left said car at a point beyond the stopping place, and on the side next to the parallel tracks, and while the car was in motion,—then you may consider these facts in passing on the question as to whether deceased could have avoided the accident by the use of ordinary care, and, if you find he could, then plaintiff cannot recover." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable to the facts. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "If you believe from the evidence that deceased stepped from a moving car, and that there was space enough between the tracks for a person to stand, and that from the manner in which he got off of the car he was thrown upon the other track, and that the motorman and other agents of defendant exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the injury, then plaintiff cannot recover." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable to the facts, and because if deceased voluntarily got off a moving car, without notice to the conductor and beyond the stopping place, he terminated himself the relation of carrier and passenger, and defendant from that time was only bound to exercise towards him all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "If you believe from the evidence that deceased stepped off of the car while it was in motion, and that another car, coming in the opposite direction, was within a few feet of him, and that the motorman of that car did not see him, or could not, in the exercise of extraordinary diligence, see him until he stepped off, and if you further believe that just as soon as he did see him he did all that was possible to prevent the car running over him, then I charge you that you may consider these facts in reaching a conclusion as to whether the defendant exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence after his danger became apparent, and, if you find it did, then plaintiff cannot recover." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable to the facts. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "If you find from the evidence that the time between the deceased stepping from the car and the injury was but a few seconds, you may consider this fact in determining if defendant used all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence in the time allowed, and under the circumstances of the accident, and, if you find it did, then plaintiff cannot recover, and you should find for defendant." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable to the facts, and because the evidence showed that the time between Glover's leaving the car and the injury was but a moment, and it was proper for the court to direct the jury's attention to this, and for them to consider what defendant could have done more than it did do in the time allowed.

Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "If you find from the evidence that the deceased saw the parallel tracks of defendant road, or could have seen them by the exercise of ordinary care, then I charge you that you may consider this fact in arriving at a conclusion as to whether deceased exercised ordinary care in getting off of the car of defendant on the side next to the parallel tracks of the road; and if you find he did not, and, as a result of getting off on that side, was killed, and defendant exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence after his danger became known, then plaintiff cannot recover, and you should find for defendant." Alleged to be error because illegal, pertinent, and applicable to the facts, and because the presence of a railroad track is itself a warning of danger, and defendant had a right to have the court call the attention of the jury to this element in the transaction, that they might consider it in passing upon the question as to what Glover could have done in protecting himself from injury. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "If you find that it was not customary, at the date of the accident, for the gates of the cars on the side next to the parallel tracks to be closed except on Broad street, and that they were closed on that street on account of the posts between the tracks, then you may consider this reason in passing on the alleged negligence of defendant; and, if you are satisfied that it was not negligence to open them while off of Broad street, you may relieve the defendant of any negligence charged on this account." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable, and because defendant's evidence tended to show that the gates were only intended to be closed on Broad street on account of the posts, and defendant was entitled to have the attention of the jury called to this claim. The charge as asked left the question entirely with the jury as to whether defendant should be relieved of the negligence charged in reference to open gates. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant was negligent in leaving open the gates of the car on the side next to the parallel track, and yet that deceased saw it was open, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen it, and after he saw that the gate was open he stepped off of the car while in motion, and on the side of the parallel tracks, then you may consider this fact in determining as to whether deceased could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care, and, if you believe he could, then plaintiff cannot recover, and you should find for defendant." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable, and because the evidence clearly showed that the gates were open all the time, and Glover therefore had no reason to rely upon their being closed, and it was defendant's right to have the jury's attention called by the court to this fact, as proper for their consideration in passing upon what deceased should have done, under the law, to protect himself against defendant's alleged negligence in not having the gates closed. Error in refusing to give the following written request of defendant: "A railroad company is not an insurer against accidents, and if you believe that the death of Mr. Glover resulted from an accident, in his losing his balance in stepping off of the car, and so near to the passing car that he was run over by it, and that the man on the passing car exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, after he saw him step off, to prevent running over or striking him, then I charge you that plaintiff cannot recover." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable, and because the evidence showed that Glover, either from holding to the car railing or stepping off backwards, lost his balance, and fell across the parallel track just as a car was passing in the opposite direction from the car off which he alighted, and defendant had a right to have the jury's attention called to this circumstance by the court in passing upon its liability; also, because Glover's death resulted, as defendant claimed, from an accident, and defendant had the right to have the jury told by the court that a carrier of passengers was "not an insurer against accidents." Further, because the abstract charge given by the court upon the questions of extraordinary diligence upon defendant's part and ordinary care upon the part of deceased did not cover the issue, there being a very general belief that there is no such thing as an injury to a passenger by a railroad company from which it can escape liability; and defendant had the legal right to have the court tell the jury that the law recognized the possibility of accident as such, even in a carrier of passengers. Error in refusing to charge the following written request of defendant: "If you believe that deceased got off of the car while it was in motion, then I charge you that you may consider that fact as to whether he should not have looked out for himself for danger; and if you believe from the evidence that, if he had looked, he could have seen the car which ran over him approaching, but stepped off when the car was too near him to be stopped by the exercise of all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence upon the part of those operating it, then plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable, and defendant had the right to have the court call the jury's attention to the difference in care which might be required between getting off a standing and moving car, and especially in view of the fact that the court had told the jury defendant was bound to safely disembark deceased. Error in refusing to charge the following written request of defendant: "If you believe from the evidence that Mr. Glover voluntarily stepped from the car while in motion and got upon the ground, then the relation of passenger and carrier ceased, and Mr. Glover was from that time entitled only to the same care and diligence from the railroads that any other citizen upon the street had. That care was the exercise of all ordinary and reasonable care upon the part of the company, and not extraordinary care. Extraordinary care is only required as long as the relation of carrier and passenger exists." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable, and because one of the issues was as to when the relation of carrier and passenger ceased, and defendant had the right to have the court inform the jury as to what the law on that subject was; and, further, because the general charge was too indefinite on this point to be a substitute for the charge asked. Error in refusing to charge the following written request of defendant: "If you find from the evidence that the car in which Mr. Glover rode had posted in the car, where they could be seen, notices to passengers not to get off while the cars were in motion, or next to the parallel tracks, then you may consider this fact in passing upon the question as to whether deceased had notice of the way and side on which, and the time at which, he should have gotten off of the car. The presumption is that these notices are seen and read." Alleged to be error because legal, pertinent, and applicable, and because the evidence showed warnings were placed in the car, and plaintiff's declaration claimed that defendant should have warned deceased, and defendant had a right to have the court call the jury's attention to the claim that notices were posted, and that the law presumed they were read; the evidence showing that Glover had been to school, was a bright, intelligent boy, was sitting inside the car, and that notices were posted in the car. Because the court erred, though he says he did not hear the remarks, in not stopping Judge Twiggs, who concluded for the plaintiff, in his closing argument to the jury, who said, after saying that the jury knew it was not dangerous or negligent to get off the street cars while in motion, the following: "Why, gentlemen of the jury, I do it myself every day. I live on the hill, and when the cars get opposite my gate I just step off of the cars. The cars do not stop, and I don't ask them to stop; and I step off when they are going pretty fast at that, and there is no more danger about it than there is in stepping on this floor." Defendant alleges that the omission or failure to stop Judge Twiggs in making this statement was error, because equivalent to allowing him to be a witness in the case, and to state facts which would not have been evidence even if he had been a witness; and the issue before the court and jury was not as to whether he could step off a moving car without danger, but as to whether it was negligent for Glover to have stepped off at the time and under the circumstances of his injury; and Judge Twiggs referring in his remarks to the cars of this identical company, it was calculated to mislead the jury, and the statement was therefore illegal, and should not have been allowed.

After argument on the motion, the judge took the papers, stating that he would render his decision later. Afterwards, and before the motion was determined, the father again renewed his suit for the loss of services of his son, which suit is still pending, and defendant filed an amendment to the motion, and brought to the attention of the court the facts herein before stated, as a proper matter to be considered in passing upon the motion. Before any decision upon the motion, plaintiff's attorneys, without notice to defendant's attorneys, wrote off from the verdict $905.02. Afterwards the court overruled the motion in the following order: "After argument on the within motion, the plaintiff having voluntarily written off from said verdict the sum of $905.02, it is ordered that said motion be overruled on each and every ground, and a new trial refused." Defendant alleges that it was error in the court to allow plaintiff's counsel, after argument and pending consideration of the motion, and without notice of it, to thus write off from the verdict, for, if the court was of the opinion that the verdict was excessive, it should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial. Defendant assigns the allowing of the writing off from the verdict as error, because such a practice is unfair and illegal, and tends to the manifest injury of defendant. It further alleges that it is fairly inferable, if not conclusive, from the language of the order overruling the motion, that if plaintiff had not written off the $905.02 a new trial would have been granted; and further alleges that the amount of the verdict, as left, is still grossly excessive, and unwarranted by the evidence. Defendant also alleges that the court erred in overruling the motion.

J. S. & W. I. Davidson, for plaintiff in error. Twiggs & Verdery, J. C. C. Black, Smith, Glenn & Smith, and J. T. Pendleton, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The material contents of the declaration are stated in the official report. A legal cause of action under the act of 1887 was set forth. It was not necessary to allege that the deceased could not have seen the car approaching him in time to avoid coming in collision with it, or that he made any effort to avoid coming in collision with it. It was not necessary to allege that the point at which he left the car was the regular stopping place, or that the stopping of the car was for the purpose of taking on or letting off passengers. It was not necessary to allege that he gave any notice of his desire or intention to leave the car, or that defendant's servants had notice of such intention. It was not necessary to allege that the company had notice of his want of familiarity with the running and operation of electric cars, or anything as to his size or appearance. The plaintiff's right of action did not depend upon widowhood or living apart from her husband, and as she alleged dependence on this son, although he was only between 15 and 16 years of age, it was not necessary to allege in what way she was dependent on him, or that he had ever worked or earned money. The declaration imputes the homicide to the negligence of the company, and points out specifically in what respects the company was negligent. The plaintiff's right to sue and to recover for the negligent homicide of her son is sufficiently apparent on the face of the declaration. There was no error in overruling the demurrer.

2. The motion to strike from the declaration the words: "That the said John C. Glover was not familiar with the manner in which said cars of the defendant were run and operated; that he resided in the country, and had never before ridden on said electric cars,"—was properly denied, the motion to strike being made orally at the trial. If these words were objectionable as having no appropriate place in the declaration, the right mode of expelling them was by special demurrer filed at the appearance term. It would be altogether impracticable for the court, when the trial is on hand, to entertain motions to purge the pleadings of superfluous and irrelevant matter, whether of form or of substance. The pleadings, so far as possible, should be settled before the trial term arrives, and this is the scheme of our law, except in so far as voluntary amendments are concerned. These, as matter of right, may be made at any stage of the case.

3. The special plea to the effect that the plaintiff and her son were both residents of South Carolina, and that she has resided there ever since, presented no defense to the action. The statutory right is given by the act of 1887 to all mothers, no matter where they reside, and without reference to the residence of the child whose homicide is the subject-matter of the action. Whenever a Georgia mother can recover, any other mother can do so under like circumstances. The act is general in its terms, and has no hint of any discrimination in favor of residents or against nonresidents.

4. Neither as a plea in abatement nor as one in bar is the pendency of a suit by the father of a minor son for the damage occasioned to him by the loss of the son's services, or in any other respect, any defense to an action by the mother founded on the act of 1887. By the terms of that act the mother is entitled to recover the whole value of the life. A claim by the father, and a suit to enforce that claim, whether it be well founded or not, cannot defeat or abridge the statutory right of the mother to bring her action and maintain it. If there is an exclusive right in either parent to complain of the homicide, it is certainly not in the father. But in truth there is no exclusive right, for the same tortious injury resulting in the death of a minor child may be a damage to both,—to the mother in the arbitrary measure of damages prescribed by the statute, and to the father to the extent of his own loss, irrespective of the statute, whatever that loss may be. The act of 1887 does not purport to withdraw from the father any right of action which he had before by the common law. What it does is to confer upon the mother a right which neither of the parents had at common law. The statutory right of the mother is to recover for the child's death; the common-law right of the father is to recover for the loss of services which the child would have rendered him had the child not been disabled by the tort complained of. Factory v. Davis, 87 Ga. 648, 13 S. E. 577.

5. There was no error in admitting evidence of the father's physical disability, and consequent impairment of ability to labor. He was a laboring man, and without fortune. This being so, anything which reduced his capacity to perform labor whereby to procure the means of support for the plaintiff, his wife, would render her less independent of any aid from her children, including the deceased son. The evidence, therefore, would tend to show her partial dependence on that son for support, present and future. The disability referred to had its origin long before the homicide of the son, and was in some degree operative at the time of the homicide, and has been so ever since.

6. The father, mother, and minor children all resided together, and were mutually dependent upon the labor of the family for support. The deceased child, although not 16 years of age, performed some labor, and it or its proceeds went into the common stock. Evidence to prove all this, or which tended to prove it, was admissible, and, if this condition of affairs was established, the deceased son might well be considered as contributing substantially to the support of his mother. Members of the same household, who live by their common labor and its proceeds, have a mutual dependence one upon another. Certainly so, unless it be affirmatively shown that a particular member consumes as much, or more, of the common stock than he contributes to it. Even that would not be a conclusive test, for the services of a child to a mother, or of a mother to a child, may well be reckoned as contributing substantially to the support of the recipient far beyond any money value which the services may have, and the chief element of dependence may be in respect to personal service of this nature. Moreover, in the case of laboring people, some regard must be had to the probability of future dependence of an older member of the family upon younger ones. A son between 15 and 16 years of age, whose vocation it is to labor for the family, may well be regarded as one of the stays and props, both present and future, of his mother, she being also a laboring woman, and liable to become disabled by age or infirmity before her son shall have passed the meridian of life.

7. Evidence that the son had no previous experience in traveling upon an electric car was admissible, not for the purpose of changing or affecting the measure of the company's diligence, but as a fact tending to illustrate the cause of his failure to alight in safety. The jury, in looking at the facts and circumstances of the homicide, would naturally desire to classify the particular passenger, not alone by his age, but also by his experience, or the want of it, in handling himself as a passenger on electric cars. Familiarity with this mode of transportation would qualify him to see and appreciate danger which he would not be likely to observe if he was wholly without experience. With experience he might be chargeable with fault; without it, with none. And hence in the one case his failure to come off safely might be attributable to his own negligence. In part or in whole, whereas, in the other case, he might be treated as free from any negligence whatever. It may be that the evidence might have other bearings, but it has this, at least.

8. The negligence charged as to gates was in not having the gate of this particular car closed on the side next to the parallel track. We think what the president of the company would have testified as to his observations on other double-track lines of street cars in various cities was not relevant, and was consequently properly rejected. Two reasons against the admissibility of this evidence occur to us. The first is that the practice of other lines would not serve for comparison on the question of diligence unless it was shown that these lines were properly equipped and managed, or were so recognized and reputed to be by experts in the business; the other is that it was not stated whether the other lines had gates to their cars or not, but only that gates were not used. There is no recital in the record of what was proposed to be proved by the president, except what is quoted, in the eighth headnote, from the motion for a new trial. If the lines examined by the president were without gates to their cars, their practice in not using gates would throw no light on the diligence of a company which, like the defendant, has provided gates, but omits to use them.

9. There may be no negligence whatever in failing to have gates for the very highest order of equipment may be dispensed with, provided the equipment is sufficient to come up to the standard of extraordinary diligence. This standard may be reached short of the very best or the superlative of the attainable. But, when a company has provided gates, due diligence might require it to use them, and failure to use them might be negligence in the given instance. Whether it would be or not is a question of fact for the jury. There was no error in so treating it; and this is so, irrespective of the particular object which the company had in view in procuring the gates, or of its own practice in their use. A hackman might put brakes on his hack for use in descending mountains only, and might restrict the use by his own practice to the making of such descents; but, having them upon his vehicle, it might be negligence not to use them on proper occasions, in descending ordinary hills as well as mountains. Extraordinary diligence may require the carrier to use what he has though it would not require him to have as much as he has provided.

10. The charge of the court that "carriers of passengers are required to provide at points of destination places where passengers can leave their cars safely" was somewhat misleading, as applied to a street railway. Companies engaged in carrying passengers on cars along a public street are not understood as engaging to make safe landing places, but to select them. The duty is to select such place with reference to getting off while the car is at rest. The company is not responsible for peril which the passenger incurs without its fault, in attempting to alight after the stoppage has terminated and the car has again been put in motion, provided a reasonable time for alighting was allowed while it was at rest. This is true, more especially if the conductor did not know that the particular passenger intended to get off at that place, and did not see him attempting to get off in time to warn or prevent him from so doing while the car was in motion. The charge that "a carrier of passengers is legally bound not only to safely transport, but to furnish the means of safe egress from the trains and passage therefrom," was not applicable to the facts. There was no question about furnishing the means of safe egress, but the complaint was that the passenger was permitted to use unsafe means, and in so doing was carelessly injured by another car.

11. Of course no duty touching the selection of a safe place for landing passengers is operative on any stop made on account of an obstruction upon the track. When a stop is made for that reason, and there is broad daylight by which passengers can see for themselves, if one of them undertakes to get off, whether the car be in motion or at rest, the conductor not seeing him or being aware of his purpose, he cannot complain that a safe place was not selected for him to alight. This, however, would not justify the company in negligently running over him, if, by accident, he failed to gain a firm footing on alighting, but fell on a parallel track, exposing himself to danger on that track.

12. The presiding judge did not hear the improper statements made by counsel in argument, and his attention was not called to them at the time, or afterwards during the progress of the trial, and no request was made to charge the jury touching the same. To say that a new trial is not required nor would be justified on this ground of the motion is but to repeat in substance what has been ruled many, many times.

13. In charging the jury touching the measure of recovery the court said: "In determining the value of the life of deceased you consider his age, his expectancy of life, the amount he was earning when killed, his capacity to earn money in the vocations of life in which he was engaged. It is the cash value of the life that is to be given, not the gross amount he would have received during the term of years the tables say he could reasonably have expected to live. It is the gross amount reduced to present cash value." This charge was subject to misconception. Neither here nor elsewhere was the charge quite full enough as to the right of the jury to avail themselves of facts in the evidence irrespective of the mortality tables.

14. What may be contained in the motion for a new trial which we pass over in silence we deem free from substantial error. This includes the many requests to charge the jury which were denied, and some other topics besides. If the plaintiff's son had, before he was injured, succeeded in getting a footing upon the street which he could have maintained, his relation as passenger would then have ceased. But we understand the evidence as warranting the conclusion that he failed to effect a landing upon the street, and fell upon the parallel track as the result of his attempt to land, and not as a sequence to a landing already accomplished. In Creamer v. Railway Co., 156 Mass. 320, 31 N. E. 391, the passenger had safely landed, and when stricken by the car was walking on the street.

15. We can see no objection to allowing a plaintiff to write off from her recovery voluntarily any sum whatever. If, by so doing, any excess of damages found by the verdict is voluntarily relinquished, it would seem that the amount of the verdict would no longer be a cause for a new trial. Why should there be a new trial solely for the purpose of reducing the damages, when the plaintiff had voluntarily relinquished all that could be treated as excess? Other grounds for a new trial would of course, stand unaffected. Judgment reversed.

McCAMY v. CAVENDER.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESS — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS—APPLICATION OF PAYMENT.

1. A general agent in the transaction of his principal's business is not incompetent, under the act of 1889, to testify to a particular transaction or communication, at which he was present, but in which he took no part, as agent or otherwise, between his principal and her debtor, since deceased, the case on trial being between her executor and the administrator of her debtor. As to transactions or communications between himself, as agent, and the debtor, he is incompetent to testify.

2. Where, at the time of making a partial payment, for the amount of which a receipt was taken, the creditor most probably held three promissory notes, of the same date, given by the debtor for the purchase money of a tract of land, the receipt being equally applicable to each and all of the notes, and for a less sum than the amount due upon any one of them, and afterwards, when a controversy arose as to the balance unpaid, the creditor produced two of the notes, and the debtor one of them, none of them being credited with the amount covered by the receipt, the presumption is, in the absence of any explanatory evidence, that, in taking up the note produced by the debtor, the amount embraced in the receipt was treated as a payment upon that note.

Error from superior court, Whitfield county; T. W. Miller, Judge.

Action on two promissory notes by R. J. McCamy, administrator, against J. W. Cavender, administrator. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiff in error. McCutchen & Shumate, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. By the act of 1889, an agent is disqualified to testify in behalf of his principal as to any transaction or communication between himself and the person with whom the transaction or communication was had, when that person is dead, and his legal representative is a party to the suit on trial. But the act does not disqualify the agent to testify to transactions and communications between his principal and the deceased person, in which the agent took no part. As to what they did and said in his presence and hearing when he was doing nothing as agent, but was a mere passive spectator and listener, he is upon the footing of any other disinterested witness. Although Walker was the general agent of his sister, the plaintiff's testatrix, and in other instances had acted for her touching her business with Cavender, the defendant's intestate, he did not so act at the interview between them, concerning which he testified. He was wholly passive. His sister acted and spoke for herself, and Cavender did the same for himself. Neither by conduct nor speech did Walker represent her on that occasion. His functions as agent were in no manner exercised, but, for the time being, were completely dormant. This is fairly inferable from the tenor of his testimony. He was competent to prove what he saw and heard at that interview, and, so far as relevant, to show the limits of the conversation between his sister and Cavender, as, for instance, that Cavender said nothing of any other credit which should appear on the notes. He was incompetent to prove anything favorable to the plaintiff as to what payments were or were not made to him, or as to entering them on the notes or receipting for them, or as to anything he said to Cavender, or Cavender said to him. The court erred in ruling out so much of the testimony as related to the fact and date of the interview, and to what the witness then saw and heard, together with the further fact that on that occasion Cavender said nothing of any additional credit on the two notes which the parties to the interview had before them.

2. The two notes in suit were for $100 each. They were given for the purchase money of land. Both of these, and a third similar note, were outstanding on the 1st day of January, 1884, as appeared from a written instrument of that date, in which Cavender promised to pay the plaintiff's testatrix 10 per cent. on three such notes in consideration of extending the time of payment. The inference is warranted that all three of the notes were mature at that date, though it does not appear to this court when any of them matured. Receipts produced by the defendant show that he made three payments,—one of $80, in November, 1884; one of $50, in February, 1885; and one of $30, in January, 1886. The last two are credited upon the notes in suit, both on one, or one on each. The first is not credited upon either of them, nor is it credited upon the third note, the latter note having been produced by the defendant at the trial. There was no evidence showing when or how this third note was paid off. The terms of the $80 receipt are equally applicable to each and every one of the three notes; the receipt mentioning notes, but not specifying any particular note. The amount embraced in that receipt is less than the principal of any one of the notes. As it was not applied to either of the two not paid off, the fair presumption is that it was applied in paying off the third. When a note is surrendered to the maker on being discharged by payment, there is no occasion to take up a receipt which has been given for a partial payment. In this instance, the balance may have been paid very soon after the receipt was given,—possibly on the same day,—and this may account for failure to enter it as a credit. The possession of the third note by the maker's administrator proves that it had been paid off, and the possession of the receipt as well as the note simply accounts for a partial payment which might as well be referred to that note as any other. So to refer it involves no inconsistency with the possession of the note, or with any other fact in the case. There is nothing to indicate that this note was paid off before the receipt was given. The decided probability is that all three of the notes were then outstanding. They certainly were on the first day of that year, and nothing appears by which to fix the time when one of them was taken up. We think the court erred in referring the $80 payment to the notes which were left out as unpaid, instead of to the one which was treated by the parties as paid and surrendered accordingly. In the absence of explanation, the surrender of that note was an application to it of the partial payment evidenced by the receipt. Judgment reversed.

COMER v. COMER.

INJUNCTION PENDENTE LITE—RECEIVERS.

The controversy being as to whether there is a tenancy in common existing between the parties, and there being controverted facts on which the evidence is conflicting, and also difficult questions of law, there was no error in granting the injunction and appointing a receiver, and thus preserving and protecting the property until the respective rights of the parties can, after a full investigation, be ascertained and fixed by final decree. The property consisting entirely of realty and income derived therefrom, the receiver was rightly directed to take possession of all the realty, it being within the power of the court, by proper interlocutory orders, to provide that he pay over to the defendant from time to time such sums, not exceeding one-half of the income, as she is beyond dispute entitled to receive.

Error from superior court, Bibb county; O. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Petition by Ann Comer against Eliza Comer for the appointment of a receiver and for an injunction. There was judgment for petitioner, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

This is a litigation between Ann Comer and Eliza Comer. In a case between the same parties a decision was rendered by this court on the 3d of last March. 18 S. E. 300. Afterwards, Ann Comer filed her petition, under which a receiver was appointed and an injunction granted, to which decision Eliza Comer excepted. The petition alleges the following: Both Ann and Eliza bore the relation of wife to Mack Comer while they all were slaves, they being negroes. Ann bore such relation for many years before and up to the time they were emancipated, and while bearing that relation had two children, of whom Mack was the father. One of these children died in infancy, the other, Cornelia, still lives. Ann continued to bear said relation to Mack up to and after March 9, 1866, and until his death, about January 8, 1888, and honestly supposed she was his lawful wife, until it was recently decided by the courts that Eliza became his lawful wife by virtue of the act of the legislature of March 9, 1866. Eliza has no children, and has never had any. In December, 1866, Mack moved Ann from Monroe county, where they originally became husband and wife, and where he had resided while a slave, to Vineville, a suburb of Macon, where she procured employment as a seamstress and house servant, and subsequently, for a short period, at other places in Vineville and Macon, he visiting and cohabiting with her regularly as his wife, and she honestly supposing that he was her husband. Eliza also resided in Monroe county before, and for a number of years after, December, 1866. In February, 1869, Mack selected a home for Ann, with her approval, in or near Vineville, and moved her and Cornelia thereto, where all three continued to reside until his death. Cornelia was recognized and treated by him, from her birth to his death, as his lawful daughter, he sending her to school and providing for her maintenance and education until her marriage, about January 7, 1879. She married against his objections, and there was, on this account, a temporary alienation between them, continuing until a short time before his death, when he sent for her, and they became reconciled; and she remained and resided with her parents (having previously procured a divorce from her husband) until his death, and has since resided with her mother, who has continued to occupy the place near Vineville up to now. From the time of her emancipation to the death of Mack, Ann got regular employment, making on an average one dollar per day. After Mack procured the Vineville home, he and Ann paying therefor with their joint earnings, they from time to time, with their joint earnings, and in part with other means in which they were jointly interested, procured other adjoining and contiguous lots, and erected thereon buildings which they rented out, using the income therefrom in supporting themselves and their daughter, and in procuring and paying for other property, Ann contributing about one-half the money which went to the purchase of the home place and the adjoining lots and improvements. She generally collected the rents from such of the property as was rented, kept house for Mack, cooked his meals, making up the beds and fires, drawing and bringing water for drinking, cooking, and other purposes, and generally caring for and attending to everything necessary about the dwelling and premises, and waiting on and serving Mack both while he was well and when he was sick, with some little assistance from her daughter. Mack was in a bad state of health for two years or more prior to his death, and required a great deal of care, attention, and waiting on by Ann, which service she faithfully and cheerfully rendered, often at late hours of the night, and continuously for many weeks prior to his death, when he was mostly confined to his room, and subsequently to his bed. During his ill health she also continued to earn wages as a seamstress, and used them in providing for him delicacies and other necessary comforts suitable to his infirm and diseased condition. Eliza did not visit him, nor contribute to his care, nor furnish him with money or other thing of value. They had no intercourse with each other for many years prior to his death, except possibly they may have casually met on the streets, as to which petitioner is not informed. The Vineville lands, purchased partly with the savings and earnings of Ann, are divided into lots on which are fourteen small dwelling houses and other improvements, one of which Mack and Ann occupied, and which has been continuously occupied since his death by Ann and her daughter. Eliza is now about to take out letters of administration on his estate, and claims the right to take possession of all of said property, and will do so unless restrained, depriving Ann and her daughter of the possession and of a home. Ann and Cornelia are dependent on their interest in said property very largely for a support, both of them being in such physical condition as prevents them from earning a living. By reason of her age and physical infirmities, Ann is and has for two or three years been so feeble as to prevent her from working, except part of the time. Cornelia has been in bad health for some years, and is still unable to earn a support. Both of them are without means to procure and pay for another home or place of residence, and are unable to procure regular employment and do daily service. Eliza has offered, as securities on her administration bond, A. T. Holt and his son C. C. Holt. The former claims to be worth $6,000; the latter, $15,000. Ann has reason to believe they both are not worth more than $10,000, and the property involved is reasonably worth about $8,000. She believes that, while the ordinary will feel bound to accept said securities, the bond will not protect the interest and rights of herself and daughter. A. T. Holt has hitherto favored Eliza, and treated Ann with marked harshness. He will doubtless control Eliza as administratrix, and will do all in his power to deprive her and her daughter of their rights, and will show them no consideration or kindness. The prayer is that Eliza be enjoined, as administratrix or otherwise, from interfering with the occupancy by Ann and her daughter of the dwelling where they reside, and from taking possession of any of the property in question, until that which rightly belongs to Ann, for the reason aforesaid, can be divided off and set apart to her under proper proceedings for that purpose; that to this end commissioners be appointed to make partition between Ann and the estate of Mack Comer of said property, either in kind, or by a sale and division of the proceeds; that, if the court deem it necessary, it be referred to an auditor or master to ascertain how much money or other things of value was contributed by Ann and Mack Comer, respectively, for the purchase of the property, and make report as to the same, and as to what would be an equitable and just division of the property or its proceeds; that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the property and collect the rents until such division or further order of court; and that general relief be granted. It is further alleged that J. P. Ross, the temporary administrator, has several hundred dollars in hand belonging to Ann and the estate, which is amply sufficient to meet the present expenses of administration, and until such division can be had, and which arose from the rents and profits of the real estate set forth in the petition. For the reasons already stated, Ann claims that half of the net amount so in his hands belongs to her, and prays that Eliza be enjoined from receiving or demanding from him more than half the amount remaining after the payment of expenses incurred by him. By further amendment, Ann alleges that Mack visited and cohabited with her as his wife, and constantly treated her as such, for a number of years while he and she were slaves, up to their emancipation, and thence until his death, except for a few months in or about 1867, when some trouble arose which caused her to bring suit against him for divorce and alimony. This trouble and the suit were settled a few months afterwards. During their pendency she did not receive visits from him and cohabit with him as before, but he recognized her as his wife, and she him as her husband. He recognized her as his wife during slavery, and after he moved her to Bibb county, with the exception of the short time just referred to, he not only treated and recognized her as his wife, but introduced her to his friends as such, both at their Vineville home and elsewhere. He used her earnings in buying and paying for the lands and houses already referred to, and spoke to her often of said property as having been paid for by their joint earnings, and told her that it was his purpose to accumulate and hold said property for their joint use and support, and for her and Cornelia after his death, if they outlived him. No debts contracted by him remain unpaid, so far as she knows or believes. If there be any, the money in the hands of the temporary administrator is amply sufficient to pay the same and leave a considerable surplus. Eliza Comer demurred on the grounds that there is no equity in the petition; that the plaintiff has an ample common-law remedy, if she has any right; that the petition shows that the defendant had not qualified as administratrix when it was filed, and she was entitled to 12 months before any suit could be brought against her; that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, it appearing that the title to the property was taken in the name of Mack Comer alone, more than 20 years before the filing of the petition, and that no copy deed to the property is exhibited. She demurred to the prayer on the grounds that no title in common is shown in Ann and Mack Comer, and that no notice for partition was given before filing the application.

The answer alleges the following: Mack and Eliza, prior to emancipation, bore the relation of husband and wife, which relation continued to his death. She was his lawful wife, his legal widow, and, since the filing of the petition, has been appointed administratrix on his estate. It is untrue that Ann and Mack ever bore the relation of husband and wife before or since emancipation. Ann was the slave of Dr. Winn, of Monroe county, Eliza was the slave of Dr. Searcy, and Mack was a slave of William Winn, all three of whom were near neighbors, and the families intimate. The relation of husband and wife between Mack and Eliza began some 17 years prior to emancipation, and continued up to emancipation, and for many years thereafter, up to his death, which fact was well known to Ann when she arrived at the age of womanhood, she being some 10 or 15 years younger than Eliza. There may have been some illicit intercourse between Mack and Ann, but the relation of husband and wife never existed between them. Some 10 years after Eliza and Mack married, and while they were living together as husband and wife, he commenced visiting Ann illicitly. Her master forbade him so doing, and once, catching Mack on his place at night, he shot at him with intent to kill him; and whatever relations Mack had with Ann during slavery were secret and illicit. It is true that after emancipation he removed to Macon, where he resided to his death. Ann followed him, and there continued her illicit intercourse with him, and Eliza, discovering this fact, required him to elect between them, and to abandon one of them. While he always denied to Eliza that there were any illicit or other relations between him and Ann, after the act of March 9, 1866, (he having from emancipation to that time, as he had from their first marriage during slavery to emancipation, continued to live with Eliza, as husband and wife,) he had a public ceremony of marriage between him and Eliza celebrated, and continued thereafter to live with her as her husband, and at all times to acknowledge her as his wife up to his death. Ann testified, on the trial of the suit which resulted in the judgment establishing that Eliza was the wife of Mack, and Ann was not, that she was informed of the celebration of the marriage ceremony the day after it occurred, and thereupon she separated from Mack, and did not cohabit with him again for some months. Ann being many years younger than Eliza, and a very comely woman, did succeed in seducing Mack from his allegiance to her, and cause him to desert Eliza for her, and they for years thereafter lived in illicit intercourse, she being supported by Mack; but Eliza denies that Ann ever contributed one dollar to the purchase of said property, or has any interest therein. The title of all of it was taken by Mack in his own name with the full knowledge of Ann, he paying every dollar of the money towards the purchase price, except what he received from Eliza, a large portion of which was furnished by her from her wages to him as her husband. The purchase was made April 2, 1870, the consideration being $1,100. It is not true that the daughter of Ann was the daughter, either legitimate or illegitimate, of Mack. It is untrue that the bond as administratrix is inadequate. Apart from her interest in the estate as Mack's widow and sole heir, Eliza has considerable property. A. T. Holt has real estate worth from six to eight thousand dollars, in Bibb and Houston counties; C. C. Holt is worth from fifteen to eighteen thousand dollars,—each of them over and above their liabilities. J. T. Searcy, the other security on the bond, is worth, over all liabilities, at a low estimate, $25,000 in mills and lands in Monroe and Bibb counties. If Ann contributed any moneys to Mack, as alleged, they were for an immoral and illegal purpose, to wit, inducing him to live with her as his concubine, and all rights are barred by the statute of limitations, more than four years having elapsed between the time of delivering the moneys, if delivered to him, and his death. He purchased the lands himself, took the title in himself, went immediately into possession, and so remained to his death. Upon his death the temporary administrator went into possession of all the property, and is in possession now. Ann obtained the possession of the house in which she resides, from the temporary administrator, by a contract of rent. Eliza, having qualified as administratrix, is entitled to receive from the temporary administrator all of the property.

At the hearing there were affidavits tending to sustain the allegations of fact set forth in the petition and answer. The title to the property in question was in evidence, the deeds conveying the land to defendant's intestate. It was admitted that on March 9, 1893, before she was served with or had any notice of the restraining order, the defendant was duly qualified as administratrix on the estate. One affidavit was that the deponent was well acquainted with Mack Comer, who was known by the name of Mack May. She knew him in Monroe county before the war as Mack May. His master was Ben May, and, after Ben May was old, Mack was sold to Bill Winn. He was still known by the name of Mack May. Deponent knew him after he came to Macon, and he was known as Mack May after he came there. Deponent remembers that Ann Comer, who was also known as Ann May, brought an action for divorce against Mack May, and deponent knew Mack Comer was Mack May. The plaintiff introduced a judgment of the superior court, dated July 24, 1867, in the case of "Ann May vs. George Mack May, application for alimony and counsel fees," to wit: "It appearing to the court that a libel for divorce has been filed between the above-named parties, and plaintiff having, in the opinion of the court, proved her legal marriage to defendant, and showing that she has no separate estate, it is ordered by the court that the defendant pay to Messrs. Harris & Hunter, counsel for plaintiff, ten dollars per month from this date as temporary alimony for the support of plaintiff and her child, these payments to continue until the final trial in the action of divorce, or until the further order of this court." This judgment was admitted over the defendant's objection that it was an interlocutory judgment between parties strangers to this issue, and that it was not pertinent to the issue on trial. The overruling of the objection is assigned as error. Another assignment of error is upon the admission of the testimony of Charles J. Harris, now deceased, given at the trial, November term, 1891, of the case between these same parties, being their contest for administration of the estate. The objection was that the former suit was as to who was the widow of Mack Comer, and therefore it was not substantially upon the same issues as the cause now pending. The order excepted to grants the injunction as prayed for, and appoints a receiver to take charge of all the property, rent the same, and collect and hold the rents, to be disposed of by further order of court; also, to take charge of the net amount in the hands of the temporary administrator, and to pay over half of that amount to the defendant as administratrix, etc.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

BEASLEY et al. v. HUYETT & SMITH MANUF'G CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)
SALE—WARRANTY—ACTION FOR PRICE—PLEADINGS.

1. A "dry kiln," an apparatus for drying lumber, being sold and "warranted to be of good material, well made, and, with proper management, capable of doing as good work as similar articles of any other manufacture in the United States," with a stipulation that "if said machinery, or any part thereof, shall fail to fill this warranty within thirty days of first use, written notice shall be given to the sellers, stating wherein it fails to fill the warranty, and time, opportunity, and friendly assistance given to reach the machinery and remedy any defects." * * * Continued possession or use of the machinery after the expiration of the time named above shall be conclusive evidence that the warranty is fulfilled,"—the reasonable and proper construction of the warranty is that it undertakes to protect the purchaser against all defects discoverable, and actually discovered, within 30 days of first use, of which written notice shall be given; defects not discoverable, or not discovered, until after the expiration of 30 days, being at the purchaser's risk.

2. To an action upon one of several promissory notes given for the price of the dry kiln above mentioned, all the others being previously paid, a plea alleging a partial failure of consideration on account of defects in the engine and piping (parts of the machinery included in the dry kiln) is no defense; the plea not alleging that any written notice of these defects had been given, and no point being made that the written contract introduced by the plaintiff in evidence, which contract contained the warranty and the stipulations in regard thereto, was not set out in the plaintiff's pleadings. Had this point been made, that contract, although in evidence, could not have been considered upon a motion to strike the plea.

3. But the plea of partial failure of consideration being amended and enlarged by a further plea of actual fraud on the part of the plaintiff, by having knowledge of, and fraudulently concealing, the alleged defects, knowing that they were latent and could not be discovered within 30 days from the first use of the apparatus, as in fact they were not, would be a defense to the action, to the extent, at least, of the partial failure of consideration occasioned by the fraud. The court erred in striking the special plea as finally shaped by the plea of fraud, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from superior court, Polk county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by the Huyett & Smith Manufacturing Company against Beasley, Hollett & Co. on a note given for a part of the purchase price of a dry kiln. There was judgment for plaintiff, by direction of the court, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Blance & Noyes, for plaintiffs in error. Ivy T. Thompson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. What was the warranty? It was that the dry kiln was of good material, well made, and, with proper management, capable of doing as good work as similar articles of any other manufacture in the United States. What was the consequence stipulated for between the parties, of a failure of this warranty? It was that written notice should be given to the warrantors, stating wherein the kiln failed, and time, opportunity, and friendly assistance were to be given to reach the kiln and remedy the defects. This notice was to be given, and the defects were to be remedied, if the failure occurred within 30 days of first use. The contract added: "Continued possession or use of the machinery after the expiration of the time named above shall be conclusive evidence that the warranty is fulfilled." Did the warranty extend to any defects not actually discovered within 30 days of first use, or to any which were so discovered if there was a failure to give written notice of the same? We think not. The fair construction of the contract, as a whole, is that 30 days would be allowed to test the kiln and develop any defects which could be and were discovered within that time, but as to any which were not discoverable, or not actually discovered, until the expiration of the 30 days, the purchasers took the risk. It will be noticed that possession or use of the machinery after the time limited was to be conclusive evidence that the whole warranty, not merely a part of it, was fulfilled. This stipulation manifests an intention to restrict the general words in which the warranty was expressed from their apparent application to all defects whatsoever to such of them as should be discovered within 30 days from first use. Perhaps a more accurate statement would be that the warranty embraces all defects whatsoever, and the stipulation introduces a condition equivalent to the expression, "provided they are discovered within the specified time, and written notice thereof be given." What we have said treats the warranty as an honest contract made upon an honest and fair sale of the property, with no fraud or fraudulent concealment on the part of the warrantors.

2. The plea of partial failure of consideration, not alleging that any written notice was given of the defects therein mentioned, was no defense to the action, testing it by the contract containing the warranty, which was in evidence. No point seems to have been made that it could not be so tested for the reason that the contract was not set out in the declaration. Had this point been made, of course the declaration alone could have been regarded, in testing the plea on motion to strike it.

3. But the plea of partial failure of consideration, when amended and enlarged by the further plea of actual fraud on the part of the plaintiff, by having knowledge of, and fraudulently concealing, the alleged defects, knowing that they were latent and could not be discovered within 30 days from the first use of the apparatus, (and in fact they were not discovered until afterwards,) would be a defense to the action, to the extent, at least, of the partial failure of consideration occasioned by the fraud. There can be no doubt that it is a fraud for manufacturers of machinery to fill it with latent defects not discoverable in 30 days, and then sell it as good, but warranting the same only as against defects actually discovered within 30 days; they knowing that the existing defects are not discoverable within that time, and concealing both the defects and their knowledge of them. To do this would be practicing deceit and committing actual fraud. Those who commit actual fraud cannot protect themselves against answering therefor by any form of warranty, or any limitations which they may introduce in the terms of the warranty. Fraud in the principal contract, the contract of sale, is not to be answered by setting up a collateral contract which was as much the offspring of the fraud as was the principal contract itself. The special plea, as finally shaped by the plea of fraud, should not have been stricken; and in striking the same, and in afterwards directing a verdict for the plaintiff, the court erred. Judgment reversed.

BROWN v. LATHAM.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

PLEADINGS—COMPLAINT.

There being abundant moral obligations set out in the petition, and it not being certain, in view of the great age of the defendant's father, and the alleged influence of the defendant over him, that there was any moral turpitude on the part of the father in yielding to the son's advice to convey property to the latter for the purpose specified, there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the petition. The petition is not multifarious, the object of the same being to settle and adjust the rights of the parties in respect to their father's estate as a whole.

Error from superior court, Haralson county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Q. V. Latham against W. J. Brown, Jr., to determine the rights of the parties in the estate of their deceased father. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the petition, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Adamson & Jackson and W. F. Brown, for plaintiff in error. J. M. McBride, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The petition in this case was filed in July, 1891; consequently it is governed by the law of pleading and procedure as shaped by legislation up to that time. If the petition is good either as a legal or as an equitable action, it should be upheld. The plaintiff and defendant are sister and brother, the daughter and son of a father who died intestate in 1886, leaving these parties and his widow as his only heirs at law. According to the allegations of the petition, the defendant has more than his due share of the assets of the father's estate, consisting of certain lands. It does not appear that any administration upon the father's estate has been granted, or that there is any impediment to an accounting and settlement between these parties as equitable tenants in common touching these lands, and as contracting parties in respect to the same. The points insisted upon as impediments are: First. That the petition shows on its face that, the father having in his lifetime conveyed the land to the defendant for the purpose of defrauding a creditor of the father, a court will not aid the sister of the defendant, any more than it would the father, to recover the lands, or any portion of them, from the defendant; consequently, that the lands are not to be treated as a part of the father's estate. Secondly. That this being so, there was no consideration for the alleged contract by the defendant with the plaintiff to account to her for the lands, or any part of their value. Third. That the petition is multifarious; and, fourth, that it is barred by the statute of limitations. Other grounds are mentioned in the demurrer, but they are of no consequence.

Treating the action as getting its standing in court not alone from the respective rights of the parties as heirs of their father, but partly from the contract between them which is alleged, it does not affirmatively appear that as much as four years had expired from the time this contract was to be performed until the action was brought. The time appointed for performance was when the claim case was settled, and it does appear inferentially that that occurred some time in the year 1887 or sooner, for in that year a payment was made upon the contract. The day and month of this payment were not stated, and whether it was earlier or later than July cannot be ascertained from anything disclosed by the declaration; hence it does not affirmatively appear that the action was barred.

With respect to turpitude in the agreement between father and son it may be said that, if a fraud was intended, the son concocted it; and on account of his influence over the father, and the age and weakness of the latter, there is no certainty that the father, of his own free will, participated in the fraudulent intention, or was in pari delicto with the son. The petition certainly endeavors to throw all the blame of that transaction upon the son, and nothing is disclosed inconsistent with the theory that the father was led into it by the undue exertion of the son's influence over him.

Touching the contract which the parties made after the father's death, there was ample moral consideration to uphold it if the petition be true; for, even if the son was in a position to protect himself against reconveying to the father, he could waive that protection, and upon his moral obligation to share the lands with his sister in proportion to her interest as a coheir with himself could contract with her to retain both her interest and his own in some of the lands, convey to her the balance, and pay her a money compensation besides. It is true, another coheir, the widow, might have reason to complain at this, and she might be a proper, if not a necessary, party to the present action; but no objection on account of her not being a party was made. We think the moral duty of the defendant to account to his sister for her interest in the land, although it may not have been a legal interest, or one that could be enforced, would be a sufficient consideration to uphold the contract between them.

The point made in the demurrer that the father had not complained of the conveyance in his lifetime has no force, because the time for a reconveyance agreed upon had not arrived when he died. Until that time arrived the son was to retain the title to the property, and before it arrived he contracted with his sister to convey some of the property to her, and retain the balance himself. To refer again to the widow, it may be that all this was satisfactory to her. She may have acquiesced in it without complaining, and if she did no one else has a right to complain.

The objection that the petition is multifarious is not sustainable, because, under our present system of pleading, contract rights, though they may relate to separate and distinct subject-matters, may all be enforced in one and the same action. Here the object is to settle up the claims of these parties, and adjust their rights in respect to their father's estate in this land as a whole, and the contract between them covers the whole. It may be that a decree or judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff only on terms, such as that she execute a relinquishment to the defendant as to all the lands which he by the contract was entitled to retain. If she gets a conveyance from him of some of the lots, it may be that it would be equitable, under the spirit of the contract, for her to relinquish or release to him all her claim to the other lots. On the points presented in the demurrer, we think there was no error in overruling it. Judgment affirmed.

CURRY v. GEORGIA MIDLAND & G. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

LIGENCE.

Where the conductor of a freight train having a cab attached thereto for the accommodation of passengers announced distinctly in the hearing of persons assembled at a place where the train did not usually stop to receive passengers that they would not get aboard there, but that the train would move out and stop for them elsewhere, a person who did not hear the announcement was not entitled to have the train remain standing at the place where the announcement was made until he got aboard. If he was injured while attempting to board the train at that place, neither the conductor nor any other person engaged in moving the train or controlling its movements being aware that he was endeavoring to board it, and the cause of his injury was the starting of the train before he had passed from the platform of the cab to the inside of the vehicle, his injury was not attributable to any fault of the company, and he has no cause of action against the company for compensation. On the facts in evidence the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and any errors committed by the court in charging the jury were immaterial and harmless. There was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Spalding county; J. S. Boynton, Judge.

Action by J. M. Curry against the Georgia Midland & Gulf Railroad Company to recover for injuries received while trying to board defendant's car. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Bryan & Dicken, for plaintiff in error. Goetchius & Chappell and Beck & Cleveland, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The conductor of the train, which was a freight train having a cab attached for the accommodation of passengers, announced distinctly in the hearing of persons assembled where this injury occurred that passengers would not get aboard there, but the train would move on, and stop for them at another place. This announcement was made to a collection of persons assembled at a place where the train did not usually stop to receive passengers. On this occasion it stopped there for another purpose, and the conductor took the precaution to proclaim that persons were not to board it there, but at a designated place near by. The plaintiff did not hear this announcement, but that was his misfortune. It was distinctly made, and was heard by others. Under these circumstances it could not have been the duty of the company to keep the train standing at that place, which was not a usual place for passengers to get on, so as to afford the plaintiff opportunity to board the train there. It is manifest from the evidence that neither the conductor nor any other person engaged in moving the train or controlling its movements was aware that the plaintiff intended to get aboard, or that he was endeavoring to do so, at the time he sustained the injury. His complaint is that the train started while he was upon the platform of the cab, and before he could pass or had passed from thence to the inside of the vehicle. If the place had been one at which the train, or such trains, usually stopped to take on passengers, the plaintiff would have been warranted in taking it for granted that it had stopped for this purpose on the occasion in question. But this place was not a passenger station, and the conductor proclaimed that it was not to be used at that time, and was not aware that the plaintiff or any one else was under any misapprehension afterwards. The injury was due to a misunderstanding by the plaintiff of the object for which the train was stopped at that place, and the company had no agency in producing that misunderstanding, but used the most natural and appropriate means to prevent it, which was to warn the crowd there assembled that they must not get on at that place, but at another. The verdict was correct upon elements of fact which controlled the case absolutely, and if errors were committed in charging or refusing to charge the jury they were immaterial and harmless; consequently they would afford no cause for granting a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

JONES v. LAMON.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT OF PROPERTY — LIABILITY OF CLIENT FOR CONDUCT OF ATTORNEY — DAMAGES.

1. The attachment under which the levy was made having been sued out by the attorney of the plaintiff in that case, and the facts and circumstances showing beyond question that there was no reason to believe that any property was or would be within reach of the attaching officer, except the horse and buggy on which the levy was made, and the attorney having been present when the levy was made, and not having said or done anything to forbid or dis-prove the act of the levying officer, it is a necessary inference that the act of the officer in seizing the particular property was as much the result of the attorney's conduct as it would have been if the latter had expressly pointed out the property, and directed the officer to seize it under the attachment. The levy should therefore be treated as having been made by direction of the attorney, and with authority from his client, the property, at the time of the levy, being in the possession of the defendant in attachment.

2. As the property in fact belonged, not to the defendant in attachment, but to his daughter, if the attorney knew, or had reasonable grounds for believing, it did belong to her, he was chargeable with notice of the daughter's title, and notice to him would be notice to his client. On this ground the client would be liable in an action by the daughter for the actual damages sustained by her in consequence of the levy, and might, in the discretion of the jury, be subject also to exemplary or punitive damages, if, either in the act or the intention, the tort was attended with circumstances of aggravation.

3. If the attorney was ignorant of the daughter's title, and believed in good faith that the title was in the defendant in attachment, as his possession indicated, and if he caused the levy to be dismissed without any unreasonable delay upon being informed of her title, the client would be liable to the daughter for actual damages only.

4. Actual damages recoverable for the wrongful seizure of personal property embrace the necessary expenses incurred in regaining possession, together with reasonable hire for the property during the time it was withheld from the owner. A part of the expense would be the loss of time, if any, by the owner, in giving necessary personal attention to the business.

5. Though the court may have committed some errors, yet, in view of the evidence and the small amount of the verdict, there was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from city court of Columbus; J. L. Willis, Judge.

Action by Belah Lamon against Rufus Jones for wrongful seizure of property. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Belah Lamon sued Rufus Jones for damages, alleging that defendant, in the name of Jones Bros., wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause procured an attachment to be sued out from a magistrate, naming him, in favor of Jones Bros. against John Lamon, and, having done so, maliciously and out of mere vexation, and without any reasonable or probable cause, procured and caused the attachment to be by a lawful constable, naming him, levied upon a horse and phaeton, at the time in petitioner's possession and her property; and the constable, being thus made the tool to carry out the malicious and wicked purpose of defendant, stopped petitioner and the horse and phaeton upon the public streets in Columbus, and took them from her, in the presence of a great multitude, etc. Defendant demurred upon the ground that the plaintiff did not allege that the levy was made by the order or direction of defendant, or that he was at the time present aiding and abetting the officer therein, or that the same was afterwards ratified by him, or that he had any knowledge thereof, before or at the time of the levy, of the officer's intentions and purposes, actings, and doings. The jury found for plaintiff $37. Defendant moved for a new trial, and the motion was granted, unless plaintiff would write off $2 from the verdict. This plaintiff did, and defendant excepts.

The motion contained the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc., and so contrary to law and evidence as to shock the moral sense. Also, because the court erred in charging: "Mind you, gentlemen, you must first see whether or not Mr. Jones, either by himself or by his agent or attorney, (if you believe he had an attorney,) placed this claim in the hands of this bailiff, and instructed him to make the money out of this man, and that in pursuance of those instructions he went ahead and levied upon the property against which the attachment was issued. If you believe that from the testimony, then the plaintiff in this case would be entitled to recover the amount of actual damages she sustained in recovering her property back." Error in charging the second sentence of the following paragraph: "Before you can find the defendant in this case liable, you must believe that he stood by, knowing that it was being done, or that he ratified it by some act afterwards. [Here comes error.] If you believe that Jones, or his attorney who was acting for him by his authority, stood by when this property was being levied on, notwithstanding he may not have instructed the bailiff to levy on it,—he stood by and saw him levying on it, and knowing it to be the property of the plaintiff in this case,—he would be just as liable as if he had instructed him to seize it." Error in charging: "If, on the other hand, you believe from the testimony that he ordered the levy made, and stood by and ratified the act, thinking the property belonged to John Lamon, and not Miss Belah Lamon, then she would be entitled to recover whatever actual damages she sustained,—the expense she was put to in the recovery of her property. If you believe, furthermore, that, even though they levied on the property of the plaintiff in this case, they believed it to be the property of John Lamon, they would not be liable except for the sum that she was put to in the recovery of her property,—actual damages. If you believe that Jones placed the claims into the hands of an attorney with instructions to sue it and make the money out of it, and the attorney acted upon these instructions, and proceeded to collect the claim, the attorney would be his acting agent. If he did not instruct him to do it, and he went ahead on his own commission, of course Jones would not be liable, and I so charge you. Gentlemen, I give you this in charge in regard to punitive damages, and not as actual damages." Error in charging the second sentence of the following paragraph: "If you believe from the testimony that John Lamon and his daughter lived together, and that Mr. John Lamon was in possession of this property,—actual possession of it,—it would be a circumstance that you might consider in saying whether or not there was any malice in having this levy made. [Error here.] I charge you, gentlemen, that, if he was in possession of it, that would not excuse him from actual damages she sustained in the recovery of her property, if wrongfully levied upon. Under the law, the presumption is that if a man is in possession of the property it belongs to him." Error in giving the following,—the concluding language of the charge: "You can look to the testimony. It is exclusively in your power to say whether or not there was any malice or want of probable cause. Look to the testimony, and say whether or not there was any malice in the case." Error in overruling the demurrer. Error in refusing a nonsuit, moved upon the ground that it had not been shown that Mr. Owens was the attorney of Jones Bros., who sued out the attachment for them, nor that they or defendant directed or ordered the levy made by himself, agent, or attorney, or that he had any knowledge of its having been made, or that he ratified it afterwards; also, upon the ground that the evidence showed defendant in fi. fa., John Lamon, to have been in the sole and exclusive possession of the horse and buggy when the levy was made, and because the evidence showed that plaintiff was John Lamon's daughter, and, when the levy was made, was living with her father, and not in possession of the property, in which event the law presumed that everything on the place belonged to her father. Error in refusing to charge upon the following pertinent subjects, after having asked counsel if they had any requests to make, upon which defendant's counsel requested the court orally to charge substantially as follows: "To charge the jury as to the presumption of law where the daughter lives with her father. Also, to charge the law as to circumstances, such as the dismissing of the case afterwards; as to whether or not there was satisfaction of the levy. Also, to charge that if the attorney at law exceeded his authority, and was not authorized by Jones to direct or order a levy upon this particular piece of property, to wit, the horse and buggy, and if he did so order and direct the bailiff to levy upon the horse and buggy, and such direction or order was given without the knowledge of Jones, and without thereafter ratifying it, then Jones would not be liable."

Thornton & McMichael, for defendant in error.

AMERICAN MORTG. CO. OF SCOTLAND, Limited, v. HILL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

EXECUTION—PROPERTY SUBJECT—EVIDENCE—LOST RECORDS—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. The minutes of the superior court applicable to a suit determined more than 20 years ago being lost or destroyed, the presumption is, nothing to the contrary appearing, that a verdict which should have existed as the foundation of a judgment which has been preserved, and is now produced, did in fact exist, and was duly entered on the minutes, or that the judgment itself was entered on the minutes, if that was necessary to give it validity without a verdict, a sale of land having taken place by virtue of an execution based on the judgment, and this sale having been acquiesced in by the parties concerned for 15 or 20 years after it was made. In the present case, treating the title of the defendant in execution as derived through the sheriff's sale, the property should have been found subject.

2. The defendant in execution having, while in possession of the premises, conveyed the land in dispute to his creditor as security for the debt now sought to be collected, and having an estate for life in the land under the will of his mother, which can be enjoyed by him or his assigns without interfering with the trust estate in remainder which the will creates in behalf of his wife and children, the court certainly erred in finding for the claimant, (the trustee,) so far as the life estate was concerned. The finding should have been that the property was subject as to the life estate, but not subject as to the remainder, if the present case is to be controlled by the terms of the will, and not by the sheriff's sale under the judgment.

Error from superior court, Quitman county; J. H. Guerry, Judge.

Action by the American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, against W. M. Tennille. There was judgment for plaintiff, and execution thereof levied. To the property thus seized William A. Hill, trustee, interposed a claim. From a judgment for claimant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

An execution against W. M. Tennille was levied on land which was claimed by W. A. Hill, as trustee for Mary J. Tennille et al. By agreement the case was submitted to the judge without a jury. He held the property not subject to the execution, and afterwards denied a new trial, and the plaintiff excepted.

(1) Two of the assignments of error are upon the ruling of the court that an estate in remainder passed under the will of Lucinda M. Tennille, the mother of W. M. Tennille, to his wife and children, and that the land in dispute could not be subjected to the execution; and upon the allowance to the claimant to introduce in evidence, over plaintiff's objections, a certified copy of the will of Lucy M. Tennille, and the petition and order under which the claimant was appointed as trustee for Mary J. Tennille and others; the objections being that this evidence was illegal and irrelevant, it being apparent from the will that no estate passed thereunder to the wife and children of W. M. Tennille, but the title to the property in dispute passed to him; and that Hill had no right to be appointed trustee under the will, nor to hold or control the property as trustee. Before the introduction of the evidence objected to, the claimant introduced a marriage contract between W. A. Tennille and Lucinda M. Fort, afterwards Tennille, dated October 10, 1842, and recorded January 6, 1843, wherein all her property is preserved as her separate estate, and an express permission is made authorizing her to dispose of all her property by will. It was admitted that she was the mother of W. M. Tennille, who was the only child of the marriage alluded to; that at the time of her death she was the owner of the land in dispute, which was included in the marriage settlement; and that she died on August 11, 1864, and her husband died on October 21, 1864. The will in question was dated February 13, 1863, and was admitted to probate on February 6, 1865. It directs that her executors shall keep up and cultivate her plantation with her slaves thereon for the purposes hereafter mentioned, but that, if the business shall become unprofitable for reasons to be judged of by the executors, they may sell and dispose of the whole of her estate, both real and personal, in such manner as they shall judge will best contribute to the interests of her estate, and invest the proceeds of sale in interest-bearing securities. In the next item she gives $1,000 to the son of her brother, and further gives the same amount each to three named females, in trust for their sole and separate use and benefit during their lives, and at their deaths to be equally divided among their children, and, should they die without children, these legacies should go to their brothers and sisters. These legacies are directed to be paid from the property and in come from the plantation, without interest whenever the executors see proper and can conveniently spare the money. Under this item, an absolute estate of $500 each is given to one Armstrong and his brothers, to be paid in the same way. The next item gives to Tennille Patterson an unconditional legacy of $2,000. The next gives certain negroes to the children of her brother, and certain lands in Alabama then in his possession, with the direction that the lands and negroes be used and possessed by her brother and his wife during their lives as a home for themselves and children, the annual income and profits thereof to be applied to the support and education of their children and themselves during their lives, and at their deaths to be divided in equal shares between their children. The next item is in these words: "I give and bequeath to my beloved son, William Meigs Tennille, all the rest and residue of my estate, whatever character the same may be, to have and to hold to him, his heirs and assigns, forever, subject, however, to the following incumbrances, conditions and provisions, to wit: That my beloved husband shall have the control and management of my whole estate for and during his life, with the power and authority to plant and gather the crops and control the slaves and other property, sell and dispose of the crops, and receive the proceeds arising from the sale during his life, in trust for my said son, without accountability for the use of the same, so that no unnecessary waste shall be committed; nor shall the same be taken for any debts or liabilities against him at the date hereof. And I do hereby appoint him as my testamentary guardian of my said son during his minority, not doubting that my said beloved husband, from his age and experience, will manage and control said estate for the best interest of our said son before and after his majority, for and during the life of my said husband. And if my said son shall die before his said father, my said husband, he shall continue to manage my said estate in connection with my other executor, Francis A. Tennille, my husband's brother, who shall manage the same together in the same way and manner aforesaid, provided my said husband, from his age or debility, shall at any time require his said brother's assistance, taking and receiving to himself, however, the proceeds arising from my said estate for his support and in trust for my said son, and preserving the corpus of the property in case of his, my son's, death, for the benefit of the wife and children of my said son, if any he should have at his death, or, in default thereof, for the benefit of the bequest hereinafter made." The tenth item gives certain special money legacies, to be paid in the manner specified by the executors or the legal representative having the estate in charge, upon the contingency that the son of the testatrix should die without wife or child living at the time of his death, and after the death of the husband of testatrix; and in such contingency the residue of the estate is given to the next of kin of her son. The last item appoints her husband, W. A. Tennille, and his brother, Francis A. Tennille, as her executors, and W. A. Tennille as testamentary guardian and trustee of W. M. Tennille. The petition of Mary J. Tennille, which was joined in by her husband, W. M. Tennille, was filed in the superior court for the benefit of herself and their minor children, and of other minor children of W. M. Tennille by a former wife, for the appointment of a trustee to keep and preserve the trust estate created under the will of Lucinda M. Tennille, and in place of W. A. Tennille, the former trustee, deceased. On this petition W. A. Hill was appointed trustee for such purpose. The filing of the petition and the order of appointment were of the same date, February 11, 1890. It was agreed that neither of the executors named in the will ever qualified as such, and that Delaware Morris was appointed administrator with the will annexed, at the March term, 1865, and was discharged at the May term, 1870, of the court of ordinary.

(2) The other special assignments of error are upon the ruling of the court that a judgment rendered at the November term, 1868, of the superior court, in favor of E. S. Bryan against Delaware Morris, administrator with the will annexed, etc., was void, for the reason that it was signed by plaintiff's counsel, and not rendered by the court; and upon the ruling that a sheriff's deed to W. L. Burnett and W. M. Tennille to the land in dispute, besides other land, in pursuance of a sale under an execution in favor of E. S. Bryan against Delaware Morris, as administrator, etc., issued from said judgment, was also void. In evidence was the original declaration in the case of E. S. Bryan against Delaware Morris, administrator, which was in statutory form, filed on April 26, 1867, being a suit upon a promissory note for $130.50, signed by the testatrix, dated January 1, 1860, and due one day after date. No verdict appeared on the declaration, and no order of the judge authorizing a judgment. The judgment entered thereon was for the amount of the principal of the note, with interest and costs, to be levied on the estate of the testatrix, and was signed by the plaintiff's attorney. The sheriff's deed embraced the land now in dispute and other parcels, in all 1,300 acres; was dated February 3, 1870, and recorded February 15, 1870; and expressed a consideration of $1,000. It recited that the land was levied on under an execution from the superior court in favor of E. S. Bryan against D. Morris, as administrator with the will annexed, etc., and was sold as decedent's property on the first Tuesday in February, 1870, at public outcry. It also contained the usual recitals of due advertisement. The plaintiff proved by the sheriff and the clerk of the superior court that the execution in favor of Bryan against Morris, administrator, was not in their office, and could not be found, and then introduced a transcript from the execution docket of the superior court, showing an entry of the case, with the amounts of principal, interest, and costs set out in the judgment above stated. The clerk testified that the minutes of the superior court containing the proceedings at the November term, 1868, were not in his office, and had not been since his term as clerk, and could not be found, and so as to the docket of said court for the April term, 1867, down to 1869; and that he knew of no pleadings in the case of Bryan against Morris, administrator, except the declaration. The claimant's counsel testified that he, with the clerk, searched the clerk's office for the papers connected with the suit mentioned; found no paper while the clerk was with him; and, after the clerk left, continued search, and found the declaration, but could find no other paper connected with the suit. W. L. Burnett testified he was one of the purchasers of the lot of land in dispute, together with other lands, at the sheriff's sale. The sheriff put him in possession after the sale. In a year or two thereafter, he and W. M. Tennille had a division of the land purchased by them at said sale, and the lot in controversy was a part of the land that W. M. Tennille got and took possession of under that division. Witness was at the sheriff's sale when the lands were sold, and bid them in. Does not remember what he paid at the sheriff's sale, but knows he paid for them twice. He had purchased a half interest in these lands of W. M. Tennille about a year before the sheriff's sale, for which he agreed to pay him $4,000. He does not know who caused the Bryan f. fa. to be levied, but he did not. The land was put up and sold in bulk thereunder. When he bought the half interest of Tennille, he did not know of the existence of the Bryan f. fa., and, not knowing how many more executions might be outstanding, he allowed the land to sell, believing it would be for his protection from other executions. He does not know whether the property was worth $8,000 or not at the time it was sold by the sheriff, but he would not give that for it now. He did not sell his half interest for over $4,000, but does not remember for how much. Does not know now what the 1,300 acres are worth. W. M. Tennille testified he became of age December 27, 1868. The 1,300 acres of land were worth ten or twelve thousand dollars when sold by the sheriff, and witness thinks it worth that sum now. Is of the opinion that at no time since the sheriff's sale it was not worth $8,000. Shortly before the sheriff's sale, witness sold Burnett one-half undivided interest in this land, together with half of the mules and corn on the place, for $6,000. The sheriff's sale came about thus: There was a debt or two hanging over the estate, which the administrator would not pay. Bryan sued and got an execution against the estate, and Burnett suggested to let the whole thing sell, and get a sheriff's title. The sheriff's sale occurred after the estate had been turned over to witness. The Bryan execution was never paid by the administrator. Witness does not recollect the circumstances of the sale. Burnett attended to the business, and witness had nothing to do with it. Some of the legacies were not provided for, and the legatees afterwards sued the estate. Burnett knew of these legacies, and thought the sheriff's sale would defeat them as well as all other debts overhanging the estate. His suggestion to sell the land under the Bryan f. fa., was made some time after witness sold him the half interest. The attorney for Bryan had the levy made, and Burnett then suggested that we let them sell. Delaware Morris, the administrator, put witness in possession of the whole of these lands as his own property; but, after being discharged as administrator, witness went along and held the property as his own, and sold Burnett one-half interest. In letting the land sell they were trying to defeat the legacies mentioned, and the debts overhanging the estate. Witness held the land from the time it was turned over to him until he sold a half interest in it to Burnett. They held the land together until, after the sheriff's sale, they had a division. Witness then held his part, including the lot in controversy, from that time until the claimant took possession. Does not know whether Morris put him in possession as against the will or under it.

The evidence further shows that on May 3, 1883, W. M. Tennille made to one Sherwood a deed to the land in dispute under Code, § 1969 et seq., to secure a loan. On the next day Sherwood conveyed the same land to the plaintiff, subject to the right of Tennille to have a reconveyance on payment of the loan. The plaintiff obtained judgment against W. M. Tennille on March 12, 1889, and on October 12, 1891, for the purpose of a levy, filed and had recorded a deed conveying the land to him. The sheriff testified that W. M. Tennille was in possession of the land in 1882, and so remained until the claimant took possession. Witness is cultivating the land this year. Rented it from W. M. Tennille and the claimant both. Consulted both, but gave neither any obligation for rent.

W. E. Simmons and W. C. Morrill, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Kiddoo, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The ultimate question in the court below was whether the premises levied upon by virtue of an execution in favor of the mortgage company against W. M. Tennille were subject to sale as his property, as against a claim thereto interposed by Hill, as trustee for Tennille's wife and children. At the death of Tennille's mother, in August, 1864, these premises belonged to her, and she died testate, leaving him her residuary legatee, he being her only child. Her husband and her husband's brother were nominated in the will as executors, but they never qualified. Her husband died in October, 1864, and in the next year one Morris was appointed administrator with the will annexed. He obtained letters of dismission in 1870. W. M. Tennille arrived at majority in 1868. The administrator put him in possession of all the lands of the estate as his own property. He sold one-half interest in them to one Burnett. Thereafter, in February, 1870, all these lands were sold at sheriff's sale as the property of Mrs. Tennille's estate, by virtue of an execution based on a judgment rendered by Quidman superior court at November term, 1868, in favor of Bryan against Morris, as administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Tennille, and the sheriff conveyed the whole to Burnett and W. M. Tennille as the purchasers at that sale. He put Burnett in possession, who held the premises now in controversy until a voluntary partition of the whole lands was made between him and W. M. Tennille. By that partition Burnett's interest in these premises ceased, and from thenceforth Tennille had and held the exclusive possession up to the year 1890, if no longer. While thus in possession, he conveyed the premises by absolute deed as security for a loan of money; this deed being made under section 1969 of the Code. The ownership of the debt created for the loan, and title to the premises held as security therefor, passed from the lender into the mortgage company, which obtained judgment against Tennille for the amount of the loan in March, 1889. After revesting title in Tennille, as provided for by section 1970 of the Code, the premises were levied upon as his property in July, 1892, by virtue of an execution founded on this judgment, and a claim was interposed by Hill, as trustee for Tennille's wife and children. By consent of parties this claim was tried by the presiding judge without a jury. His finding was in favor of the claimant, and a motion made by the mortgage company for a new trial was overruled. The contention by the mortgage company is: First, that by virtue of the sheriff's sale, and the conveyance thereunder to Burnett and Tennille, and the subsequent petition between these two, Tennille had absolute fee-simple title to the property levied upon; second, that if he acquired no title by the sheriff's sale, he has title, by virtue of his mother's will, to at least a life estate in the premises, and that that estate, if no more, ought to have been found subject to sale under the execution; third, that no trust in behalf of Tennille's wife and children was created by the will, and therefore that the appointment of Hill as trustee, which occurred in February, 1890, was without any validity.

1. Several objections were made to the sheriff's sale and to the title of Tennille in so far as it depends upon the deed made by the sheriff in pursuance of that sale, but only one of them was passed upon by the trial court. The others, not having been adjudicated, will be left for determination on a future trial. The objection ruled upon was that the judgment on which the execution was founded was entered up and signed by the plaintiff's attorney, and no verdict was produced or proved on which such a judgment could have rested, nor did it appear that the judgment itself had been entered on the minutes of the court so as to make it good as a judgment of the court rendered without the verdict of a jury. The judgment was more than 20 years old, and the minutes of the court applicable to the term at which the judgment was rendered were lost or destroyed. There was no proof tending to show that a proper verdict was not entered on the minutes, or, if no verdict, that the judgment itself was not so entered. Had it appeared affirmatively that the minutes contained no verdict, and no entry of the judgment, then the execution might possibly be held as having had no legal judgment to support it; but without showing these things affirmatively the presumption is, and ought to be, after such a lapse of time, that the minutes contained what they ought to have contained,—that is, either a verdict on which a judgment signed by the plaintiff's attorney could properly be based, or a copy of that judgment and the signature of the judge to the minutes of the day's proceedings on which the entry took place. To invoke such a presumption for upholding a sale made under an execution based on the judgment, which sale was acquiesced in by the parties concerned for some 20 years before any attack was made upon it, would be to rightly use the doctrine of presumptions, and to treat with proper deference a judgment which the parties to it and the officers of court in acting upon it must have regarded as legal and binding, and which for more than a score of years has stood without any proceeding to reverse or set it aside. Rather than rip up a judgment and a sale under it, both of them so old, any presumption should be indulged which it is legally possible to invoke. The action in which the judgment was rendered was based on a promissory note made by the testatrix, Mrs. Tennille, and at the trial of the present case none of the papers connected with that action could be found except the declaration and the judgment as entered up thereon and signed by the plaintiff's attorney. It did not appear whether any issuable defense had been filed on oath or not. The docket on which any defense would have been noted, according to regular practice, was lost or destroyed. If no such defense was filed, the case was one in which, under the constitution of 1868, judgment should have been rendered by the court without the intervention of a jury. The judgment produced, though not signed by the presiding judge, would be a compliance with that requisite of the constitution if it was entered on the minutes of the court. This has been heretofore ruled. Odom v. Causey, 59 Ga. 607; Jones v. Word, 61 Ga. 26; Tharpe v. Crumpler, 63 Ga. 273. What we now rule is that, under the circumstances of this case, a presumption that it was so entered is to obtain, the ground of this presumption being that it ought to have been so entered if no issuable defense on oath was filed. The only possible alternative is that such a defense was filed; and, if it was, then there ought to have been a verdict, and that verdict ought to have been entered on the minutes of the court. The principle of the foregoing presumption covers this alternative, for if a jury ought to have passed upon the case, and their finding ought to have been entered on the minutes, these things should be presumed, in favor of the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, to have been done; the same, on the hypothesis involved, being necessary prerequisites to the rendition of the judgment. It follows, we think, manifestly, that, as against the one objection to the judgment which we have considered and discussed, the premises levied upon should have been found subject.

2. But conceding that the case is to be tried by the terms of the will of the defendant's mother, the will gives him an estate for life which could be enjoyed by him or his assignees without interfering with the trust estate in remainder which the will creates in behalf of his wife and children. This being so, the court certainly erred in finding for the claimant, the trustee, so far as this life estate was concerned. The administrator with the will annexed put Tennille in possession, and while in possession he conveyed the land in dispute as security for the debt now sought to be collected. If he has a life estate in it, and not the whole fee, why should not this life estate be devoted to the payment of the debt? He is a grown man, and has no need of a trustee to manage and control his life interest in the property. If he can use and enjoy it without interfering with the trust in remainder, why may not his assignee or vendee do so too? And if his own assignee or vendee could do it, why could not one who comes in as a purchaser at a judicial sale? According to the true spirit of our law at present, whatever a man can enjoy himself as property can be sold for the payment of his debts, unless it be exempted from levy and sale in the manner pointed out by the homestead and exemption laws. The material terms to be noticed in the will are that the residuary clause gives to Tennille the whole residue, "to have and to hold to him, his heirs and assigns, forever, subject, however," to certain specified incumbrances, conditions, and provisions. Among these was that the income of the whole estate was to be received by the husband of the testatrix during his life without accountability for its use. Another was that the husband was to preserve the corpus for the benefit of the wife and children of the son, if any the son should have at his death; or, in default thereof, for other beneficiaries, afterwards specified. The husband having died in 1864, his interest terminated, and this extinguished his interest in the income, together with the trust for the son as to the income, which was a personal trust without accountability; but the trust as to the corpus survived. That trust, however, did not interfere, certainly as to realty, with full and complete enjoyment of the property by the son during his own life. No trust as to him, apart from the office of executor, appears to have been contemplated by the testatrix, except a personal one in her husband, which was to continue for his lifetime only. As the terms of the will relevant to this litigation are set out in the official report, there is no need to transcribe them in this opinion. The court certainly erred in finding nothing whatever subject to sale under the levy and claim in controversy. Judgment reversed.

HOGG v. SAVANNAH, A. & M. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

FIRST NEW TRIAL.

There was no abuse of discretion in granting a first new trial in this case.

Error from superior court, Stewart county; W. H. Fish, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Z. T. Hogg against the Savannah, Americus & Montgomery Railway Company. Plaintiff obtained a verdict, and from a judgment granting a new trial he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

This was a suit by Hogg against the railroad company for damages resulting from an injury to his hand, which he sustained by the collision of a lever car (or hand car) with the rear end of a passenger train. The jury found for the plaintiff $1,750, and the court, on motion of the defendant, granted a first new trial, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted. The grounds of the motion were that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence, and to several portions of the charge of the court, and that it was excessive. The plaintiff's declaration showed that he was in the employment of the company as a laborer, under the supervision and control of a foreman, on the railroad track. Late in an afternoon, he and other workmen under the same foreman were returning home, as was their custom, on a lever car. The foreman left this car, and got on the rear end of a passenger train which was ahead, and going in the same direction, ordering the plaintiff and the others on the lever car to follow close behind the passenger train. While so following, the time being about 8 o'clock at night in February, the passenger train stopped, and the lever car ran against it, and plaintiff's hand was caught between one of the handles of that car and the bumper of the passenger coach, breaking and bruising the same. The plaintiff alleged that he was without fault, and unable to get off the car or to avoid the collision; that, as soon as he saw that the passenger train had stopped, he called out to the other laborers to put on brakes, so as to stop the lever car as soon as possible; and that the laborer at the brakes put them on with all his power, but they failed to have any effect on the car, or to impede its progress, because they were defective, although properly manipulated. The specifications of negligence were that the defendant furnished to the plaintiff and his fellow servants a lever car with brakes so defective that they would not operate so as to stop the car, and failed to notify plaintiff of such defect, and that the defendant's agent stopped the passenger train suddenly at an unusual place, at the bottom of a steep grade, without giving any signal, and with knowledge that the lever car, with plaintiff and the other workmen on it, was following close behind. The evidence was conflicting on the material issues.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

DIRECTING VERDICT—LACHES OF COUNSEL.

1. The suit being based on promissory notes and an account, and the defendant having been personally served, and the case, according to the judge's docket, being in default, and no plea having been filed, it was not error for the court to apply section 3457 of the Code, and direct a verdict for the plaintiff without proof of the account; the notes sued on and the open account being introduced in evidence by the plaintiff.

2. On the showing made, the court could consider counsel for the defendant below as in laches in not looking to the state of the docket, and seeing in due time whether his name was marked thereon or not.

3. There was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

• (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Wayne county; J. L. Sweat, Judge.

Action by Mayer & Ullman against William M. Wiggins to recover on promissory notes and an open account. The court directed a verdict for plaintiffs, and denied a new trial. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

G. B. Mabry and Stewart Johnson, for plaintiff in error. Crovatt & Whitfield and Harrison & Peeples, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. As the action was not based exclusively on unconditional contracts in writing, but included, with the promissory notes, an account, the case was not one for rendering judgment by the court without a jury. According to the bench docket it was in default; no counsel was marked for the defendant, and in point of fact no plea was filed. There had been personal service of the petition and process on the defendant. The Code, in section 3457 provides that in all cases of suits on open accounts, where there has been such service, and no defense is made, either in person or by attorney, at the time the case is submitted for trial, it shall be considered in default, and the plaintiff shall be permitted to take judgment as if each and every item were proved by testimony. In the present case, personal service was equivalent to proving the account, and the notes declared upon were introduced in evidence with the account, and thus the whole cause of action was established, and there was no error in directing a verdict.

2. There was no motion to open the default and make defense instant, but counsel contended that there was in fact an appearance and a verbal answer to the case when it was called on the docket at the appearance term, and by his own testimony and that of his client showed that this was true in fact; but the court disregarded this parol evidence, and decided to abide by the docket. We cannot say that this was error. A good reason for abiding by the docket might be that counsel for the defendant was in laches in not looking at the state of the docket, and seeing in due time whether his name was marked thereon or not. Six months had elapsed from the time this docket was called and the entry of default made. Certainly, that entry would not have been made if the court had heard counsel answer orally at the call of the case. The Code provides that the general issue shall be considered as filed in all cases which are answered to at the first term. Code, § 3458. But the appropriate evidence of a case being answered to at the first term is an entry made at that term on the bench docket, the usual entry being the word "Answered," or an abbreviation of it, together with the names of counsel making the answer, these names being commonly put on the margin of the docket opposite the statement of the case. Here the usual evidence of answer was wanting, and no writing whatever, either plea or entry, was produced to vouch the fact. Inasmuch as answer is to be a substitute for a written plea, the fact of answer ought to be matter of entry on the docket; and it could well be regarded as laches on the part of counsel in not looking at the docket and having the proper entry made, if not at the appearance term, as soon thereafter as was practicable.

3. There was no error in denying a new trial on any of the grounds taken in the motion. Judgment affirmed.

INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION.

There was no error in denying the interlocutory injunction.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by the Southern Medical College and others against John S. Thompson and others for an injunction. From a judgment denying an interlocutory writ, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

A petition was brought by "the Southern Medical College, the Southern Dental College, the faculty of the said Southern Dental College, and the board of trustees of the Southern Medical College," against five individuals, praying for an injunction to restrain them from procuring a charter, for which they had applied to the superior court, incorporating them under the name of the Southern Dental College, and from conducting the business contemplated by the proposed charter under that name. The defendants demurred and answered; and, on conflicting evidence, the injunction was denied, and the plaintiffs excepted.

It appears that in 1887 an amendment to the charter of the Southern Medical College was granted, whereby it was constituted a dental college, in addition to its powers as a medical college; the application for the amendment, and the order granting the same, containing no statement as to change or modification of name. The plaintiffs make the following allegations: As soon as the same could be done, the dental faculty provided for in said amended charter was elected, and the Southern Dental College, as authorized by its charter, was organized under that name as a department of dentistry, and has been in successful operation ever since, teaching the science of dentistry, etc., and carrying into effect, in good faith, the objects and purposes of said corporation. The said Southern Dental College contracted in its said name, advertised therein, became and was known thereby in Georgia and other states of the Union. It has prospered, and its standing is high among the dental colleges of the state, and it has the confidence of the people. It is now about to reap the reward of the labor of its founders. Said dental college is not only named by necessary implication from the recitations of the charter as granted, and the right to the said name is asserted to the same, but it has had the business thereof advertised therein, has used said name, with the knowledge and consent of the defendants, for six years, has contracted for a large sum of money in the name of the faculty thereof, in the said name binding the defendants by their consent to the payment thereof in the name of the Southern Dental College, as a department of dentistry of the Southern Medical College, and has done and carried on its business in said name for six years, and still does so, of all of which the defendants have full knowledge, and have given their consent to the same, they themselves having been professors and lecturers and teachers therein. Plaintiffs have a right to the name from long use as a trade-name, and any infringement upon it is in violation of their rights. Two of the defendants have resigned from the faculty of said college, not in good faith, but in order to injure and damage plaintiffs, and have combined and confederated with the other defendants to defraud, injure, and oppress plaintiffs, as hereafter stated. The defendants seek to be incorporated as the Southern Dental College, the identical name given to and used by plaintiffs and some of defendants for the college started as aforesaid, and used for six years. The defendants propose, in their application for charter, to do business in the city of Atlanta, which is the place of business of plaintiffs' college. There will arise, and has already arisen, confusion in their correspondence, and the public will be confused and misled into the belief that the colleges are the same. Business intended for the present college will be attracted to the new in the following manner: The law and custom of the said dental colleges is that students will be and are required to attend three sessions of the college before graduation, and the students of the present college will be and are now being induced to attend the new college for graduation, on the idea that it is the same college, and being conducted by some of the same professors, and in the same name, inquiries having been made with that impression; and the new students will be imposed on, by being induced to believe that the new college, if incorporated, will be the true one, while the present one is an impostor, notwithstanding the defendants are responsible for its name. have assisted in getting it in debt, and have resigned and left it to break it up, by getting a charter for another of same name, in said city, and for same purposes. The acts threatened by defendants, and now being done, in procuring the charter and in organizing and establishing the same under the name of the Southern Dental College, and in running the same in that name in Atlanta, and in canvassing the students of the present college, are contrary to equity and good conscience, under the circumstances, and will and have already injured and damaged the plaintiffs, who are remediless by the strict rules of law, there being no provision in law for objections to the grant of the charter.

The demurrer by the defendants was on the grounds that there is a misjoinder of parties, and there is no law authorizing actions in the name of the trustees or faculty or dental college in the charter of said medical college; that there is no cause of action set out, nor any sufficient reason for injunction or other relief; that there is no charge that defendants are not able to respond to any action that might be brought by plaintiffs; that the petition, on its face, showed that the corporate name, and the only one in which petitioners are authorized to conduct business by virtue of their charter, is the Southern Medical College; and that there is no law authorizing objection to the granting of a charter in the manner in which plaintiffs attempt to object.

not true that any charter has ever been obtained by any one, and especially the Southern Medical College, by amendment or otherwise, authorizing them to use the name of the Southern Dental College, nor that said name was adopted or used by the Southern Medical College; but the name so adopted and used under and by virtue of its charter was the Dental Department of the Southern Medical College, under which name it has awarded diplomas, made advertisements, used an official seal, and done all of its official acts. Said college is not now advertised, known, or conducted as the Southern Dental College. There is no charter or law authorizing it to conduct business under that name, but it is controlled by the privileges named in its charter, wherein the official name is given as the Southern Medical College. It is true that three of the defendants were in the faculty of the dental department of the Southern Medical College until February, 1893, when they tendered their resignations. Before this, two of defendants, and L. D. Carpenter, one of the plaintiffs, held frequent consultations as to the organization of a dental college in Atlanta, and Carpenter took an active and leading part in said conferences, accompanied respondent to the office of an attorney, and employed the attorney to file application for charter as the Southern Dental College. The purpose of organizing said college was to better advance the science of dentistry, dignify the profession, and protect the public against unskilled operators. At all of said meetings the objects and purposes were fully discussed. Carpenter was present, and joined in and advocated establishing said Southern Dental College, and agreed and did become one of the faculty therein, when the charter should be obtained. He well knew that there was no disposition by respondents, or any of them, to injure or damage the plaintiffs. He sent in his resignation at the same time at which defendants tendered theirs, and co-operated with them in all the movements to establish the Southern Dental College; one of the ideas being to have a dental college separate and apart from any other institution, deeming it advantageous to the profession as well as to students. It is absolutely false that any of defendants have attempted to injure, damage, or oppress any of plaintiffs; but defendants have acted in the utmost good faith, and have everywhere stated and advertised that the Southern Dental College had no connection with any medical college. It is well known that each of them stand high in the dental profession, and would do nothing contrary to the ethics thereof, or to good conscience. They are at a loss to account for the conduct of Carpenter, who made affidavit to the facts set out in the petition; and, in view of his previous knowledge and conduct, defendants say that he could not truthfully subscribe to the affidavit, and must have signed it without reading it. Plaintiffs are endeavoring to place every obstacle in the way of defendants, to prevent them from establishing the dental college, and their motive is that of breaking down competition. It is not true that plaintiffs have the right to use the trade-name of the Southern Dental College. There is no disposition or desire on the part of defendants to make the public believe that the colleges are the same. They have expended a large amount of money in advertising, making contracts, and in said name have done many things in a business way, anticipating the granting of their charter by the court. New students are not required to attend three courses at the same college, but can attend two or one course at any college, and afterwards complete their course at any other colleges. The Southern Medical College has several departments, and all of them are conducted under style of departments, and are so advertised, to wit, the Law Department of the Southern Medical College, Pharmaceutical Department of the Southern Medical College, and Dental Department of the Southern Medical College, and this is the only manner in which plaintiffs are authorized to advertise and conduct their business. They have never conducted the college, or any department thereof, in separate and distinct names, and they are not authorized to conduct the dental department under the style of the Southern Dental College.

FELTON et al. v. STATE.

RECOGNIZANCE—BREACH.

When a bail bond in a criminal case is conditioned for the appearance of the principal at the county court to answer a bill of indictment, the bail is not bound to produce his principal until a bill of indictment has been found, although, when the obligation was entered into, there was pending in the county court an accusation for the offense, made out after the accused had waived indictment. If it was the purpose of the officer to take an obligation for appearance to answer the pending accusation, that purpose was not signified by taking an obligation to answer to a bill of indictment; a county court accusation not being a bill of indictment, but something different therefrom, both in form and substance.

J. A. Hixon and E. H. Outts, for plaintiffs in error. L. J. Blalock and O. B. Hudson, Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLACKLEY, C. J. County courts can deal with two classes of misdemeanor cases, the one class being indictments originating in and transferred from the superior court, and the other being accusations originating in the county court. Can bail, who obligate themselves in their contract to produce their principal in the county court to answer a bill of indictment, be required to produce him there to answer a county court accusation? We think not. A case triable on indictment is not a case for accusation, and a case triable on accusation is not one for indictment. An accusation, it is true, could be abandoned by the state, and an indictment for the same offense procured, or an indictment might be abandoned and an accusation preferred; but, where bail enter into an obligation to have their principal forthcoming to answer an indictment, they do not violate that obligation by failing to produce him to answer something which is not an indictment, either in name or in fact, but something which the statutes of the state themselves distinguish from it. In this case the bail is not concerned with the fact that, at the time he contracted touching the indictment, there was an accusation for the offense pending in the county court, and that this was made out after the accused had waived indictment. This state of facts would not indicate that the bail meant to waive indictment, but rather the contrary, for what he undertook was to produce his principal to answer to an indictment, and the better supposition would be that the state meant to abandon the accusation, procure an indictment in the superior court, and have it transferred to the county court. At all events, no purpose to have the accused present in the county court to answer an accusation was signified by taking an obligation to have him there to answer a bill of indictment. The bail is entitled to stand on his contract according to its terms, and, no indictment having been found, his obligation has not been broken. Judgment reversed.

CONVERSION—PLEADINGS—MISTATING TITLE OF COURT—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—FORM OF BOND.

1. It is no cause for setting aside a judgment rendered by the city court of Atlanta that the court was characterized in the plaintiff's petition as the city court of Fulton county, the process correctly describing it as the city court of Atlanta, which court is the only city court held in Fulton county, and its jurisdiction extending to all residents of the county; nor is it any cause for setting the judgment aside that the property alleged to have been converted was vaguely and loosely described in the petition, and that some of it was stated therein to be the clothes of plaintiff's father.

2. That the same inaccuracy in designating the court was also in the bail bond is no ground for setting aside the judgment; nor is the omission to date the bond, or the failure therein to describe the property, the bond fully identifying the action in which it was given.

3. The bond given in this case corresponded substantially with that prescribed in section 3419 of the Code, and the judgment was properly entered thereon against the principal and surety for the amount of the recovery in the action. It was not incorrect to designate the surety as such in the judgment, although he was not expressly described as surety in the bond, and did not add the word "surety" or "security" to his name in executing the same. In an action for the conversion of personal property, the election of the plaintiff to take a money verdict is sufficiently apparent from the mere fact of the rendition of such a verdict, together with entering up judgment thereon payable in money only.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by Laura C. Kennedy against H. Wolf and another for conversion. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

A statutory action for the recovery of certain personal property was brought by Miss Kennedy against H. Wolf. A verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff were rendered on May 22d, and, on June 1st, motions were made and sworn to by Wolf and by Barwald, the security in the bail bond, to set aside the judgment. On the hearing the motions were overruled, and the movants excepted.

The grounds of Wolf's motion are as follows: (1) The verdict and judgment were taken by default, in the absence of defendant and his counsel, who had a good and meritorious defense to the suit, and was prevented from appearing and defending by inadvertence and mistake. As soon as defendant was served, he consulted his counsel, and employed them to prepare his defense and defend him in the suit. The copy of the petition and process which was served on him was accidentally mislaid, and he did not therefore show it to his attorneys, but informed them of it, and both he and they then supposed the case was in the superior court, as the clerk of the superior court is also the clerk of the city court, and the papers, process, and wrappers used in both courts are very similar, if not precisely alike, in size, style, shape, color, and general appearance. Defendant never once thought of the city court, and it was not once suggested in any of his consultations with his attorney, who advised him that it was only necessary for him to appear or plead at the first term of the superior court, which would not convene until March, 1893, and would continue in session until about the 1st of July, and promised to enter appearance by writing their names for him in the trial docket of the superior court before the adjournment of the first term, which is still in session, it having been the intention of the attorneys so to enter their names, and file pleas, if necessary, before adjournment, not once supposing the case was in any other court. Meanwhile, defendant was procuring his witnesses, and his defense was being prepared. His counsel informed him that, on account of the crowded condition of the docket of the superior court, it would necessarily be over a year before the case could be reached for trial in that court. The matter was in that shape when the case was called in the city court of Atlanta, which recently had but two terms a year, but, by a change of the law which went into operation since defendant was served, now holds six terms a year; and on May 22, 1893, in the absence of any appearance or defense of defendant or his attorneys, the verdict and judgment were rendered for the full amount alleged to be the value of the goods sued for, and execution was immediately issued, and levied on property of Barwald as security, and defendant then heard of it for the first time; and now at the first opportunity, and during the same term of the city court of Atlanta, he makes this motion, and shows that he has the following good and meritorious defense to the suit, (setting forth a number of alleged facts, including the statements that he never did have possession of the property sued for, or any of it, that no demand was ever made on him therefor, and that the affidavit of the plaintiff to the suit was false.) Said suit and verdict are a fraud on defendant, and, if allowed to stand, will do him unconscionable injustice. (2) The verdict and judgment are void because the declaration is addressed "to the city court of said county," and prays process to the "city court for Fulton county," there being no such court in existence or authorized by law; and because process was issued by the clerk of the city court of Atlanta in the name of the judge thereof, and was attached to the petition, and a copy served on defendant. (3-5) The verdict and judgment are void on their face, because they do not show that the plaintiff elected what kind of verdict and judgment she would take, and because no alternative is given, allowing the defendant to return the property; but they are a simple verdict and judgment as in case of assumpsit. (6) The verdict and judgment are void because the petition does not describe the property with sufficient certainty, or identify it, to render a verdict or judgment on it, or for defendant or his security to return it, or the sheriff to receive it. For instance, the petition mentions: "One carpet of the value of $20; one oilcloth of the value of $5; four family pictures of the value of $50; two volumes of encyclopedia of the value of $15; one lot of books of the value of $5; several ladies' dresses of the value of $12; several doll chairs of the value of 50 cents; several pairs of nice gloves, and a great many other keepsakes, that money could not have bought, of the value of $10; one small sack of old family papers, containing two morocco pocket books filled with valuable family papers, at a small valuation of $200; one lot of petitioner's father's clothes of the value of $100; heirloom jewelry of the value of $5,"—without further description; and yet all and each of said articles are included in the amount of the verdict and judgment, with many more equally as badly described, and none of the articles in the petition are described with sufficient certainty. (7) The verdict and judgment are void because the petition includes the item of "one lot of petitioner's father's clothes of the value of $100," without alleging that they were then the property of petitioner, but showing, on the contrary, that they were not her property. (8) The verdict and judgment are void because the obligation of the bond is that defendant shall produce the property, and have it forthcoming to answer the judgment, and the verdict and judgment are silent as to that, and do not allow it. (9) The judgment is void because the property is not described in the bond, and the bond is not dated, and because the bond recites that it is based on a suit in the city court of Fulton county, and is returnable to that court, when there is no such court created or authorized by law.

Barwald, the security, sets forth in his motion the following grounds: (1) The judgment and execution describe him as security, when he is not named at all in the bond, either as principal or security, his name being simply signed to it with Wolf, who is named in the bond as principal, without naming anybody as security in the body of the bond. (2) Neither the bond nor the approval thereof is dated. (The bond as shown by the record is dated this —, 1892, and refers to the suit as returnable to the next January term, 1893, of the city court for the said county. Following the bond is an affidavit by Barwald "that he is security on the within bond," and that he owns property to a certain amount, which affidavit is dated December 16, 1892.) (3) The property is not described in the bond. (4) There is no such court as the city court of Fulton county. (5) The verdict and judgment are not in the alternative, and do not allow the defendant or his security to produce the property in accordance with the condition of the bond. (6, 7) There is no pleading on which to base the verdict and judgment. (8) Variance between the petition and process, as alleged in the motion of Wolf. (9) Insufficient description of the property in the petition. (10) Some of the property sued for is shown by the petition not to belong to the plaintiff, with no averment showing her right to recover it.

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

1. It not appearing from the motion for a new trial or the bill of exceptions that the bills of indictment were objected to when offered and received in evidence, or that any motion was made to rule them out, it was not error to deny a new trial because of their admission, and because the solicitor general was allowed to comment upon the same in his argument to the jury.

2. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

John Jackson was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and a new trial was denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

John Jackson was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and excepted to the overruling of his motion for a new trial. The motion contains the general grounds, and alleges that the court erred "in admitting in evidence three other indictments then standing against the defendant, he never having been tried thereunder, and the defendant's character not having been put in issue by himself;" and "in allowing the solicitor general to comment to the jury on other indictments against defendant, introduced in evidence over defendant's objection." This is all the motion discloses on this subject. The brief of evidence recites that the solicitor general tendered in evidence the bills of indictment in which Jackson and Hall were jointly indicted, and in which Hall had pleaded guilty; that defendant's counsel objected to the indictment as against Jackson, because the state could not put his character in issue; and that the court ruled them in. The evidence also shows that Hall was introduced as a witness by the defense. In the charge of the court appears the following: "Certain bills of indictment have been put in evidence here as against Hall, and against Hall and Jackson combined, and as against Jackson combined with the others. Hall has pleaded guilty to these indictments; and if he has pleaded guilty to save others, and he has sworn on the stand that he is entirely the guilty person in this case, and that he was entirely the guilty person in the several other cases, that I have a right to say to you, because it is conceded by the defense, the position of the state is that the state claims before you that Hall is not sincere in these pleas of guilty; that for some purpose of his own—that he has done so for some motive of his own—he has done this for the purpose of relieving Jackson of this and the other indictments. Now, if those indictments have been put in here for the purpose to enable you to judge of Hall's credit,—of his relation to the case,—if Hall did not stand before you in the way he does, these indictments would not go in against this defendant,—they would not be evidence against him; and in themselves they are not evidence against him, but they are only evidence for the purpose of enabling you to judge Hall's testimony. And if you, gentlemen of the jury, believe that Hall swore the truth in spite of all the other evidence in the case, why, this defendant would not be guilty. You could not find him guilty, because Hall says this defendant is not guilty, and he is the only one that is guilty; and hence this is, as I said to you, to enable you to dispose of Hall's testimony, to believe it or not to believe it, as you may see fit."

SNYDER v. VIGNAUX.

APPLICATION FOR CERTIORARI—NOTICE.

A letter addressed to and served upon the defendant in certiorari, in the following words: "I have been waiting for an answer from you, as to whether you will agree to set aside the judgment in the Vignaux case. The certiorari has been granted, and returned to the J. P. court. I have also paid the judge the costs which have accrued to date, and, of course, the jury fee paid out by you will be given back. I think, in view of all the circumstances, that you will be none the loser to set this aside, and let us have a final trial before a jury. I saw Mr. Rosser, and submitted the matter to him, and I am certain he is in favor of it. We can try it to-morrow before a jury, or next month, just as you please. Please answer,"—is not a sufficient compliance with section 4059 of the Code, which requires written notice to the defendant, not only of the sanction of the writ of certiorari, but also of the time and place of hearing, at least 10 days before the sitting of the court to which the same is returnable.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

John Jackson was convicted of larceny from a house, and, his motion for a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The indictment is not a part of the record in this court. From the judge's charge to the jury it appears that the defendant was indicted for committing a burglary on the place of business of the Commercial Oil Company, and stealing therefrom money, etc. The plaintiff in error was found guilty of larceny from the house. He moved on the general grounds for a new trial. The motion was denied, and he excepted. The theft of the property was proved, and a witness testified that it was the property of the Commercial Oil Company, which is a branch of the Peerless Refining Company of Cleveland, Ohio, a corporation, while the Commercial Oil Company is not incorporated, has no president, but has a general manager. In another part of his testimony the witness states that it was the property of "the firm," and was in charge of the manager. The defendant was a watchman for the Commercial Oil Company's premises, and had keys which gave him access to the building. There was testimony tending to show a confession by him of the larceny, corroborated by the finding of some of the property at or near the spot where he said it was to be found.

CLAIM AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—PRESUMPTION OF PAYMENT—LIMITATIONS.

1. Where, on the settlement of an administrator's accounts, a balance found in his hands is ordered to be divided proportionally among creditors, a creditor cannot, 21 years thereafter, assert his claim in a lien creditor's suit against such administrator, instituted by other creditors of the estate.

Appeal from circuit court, Green county

D. Harman, Jr., for appellant. John E. Roller and Duke & Duke, for appellee.

LACY, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Green county, rendered at its June term, 1890. The appellant, R. M. White, filed his petition in the circuit court of Green county, in the cause therein of Davis v. Offield, seeking to have a certain debt claimed to be due to him by James Offield's estate paid out of the funds in the hands of the court, arising from the sale of the said lands in a creditor's suit against Offield. He sought to have his petition filed in June, 1889. His claim is that his brother William W. White had died in October, 1865, leaving a considerable personal estate, and that James Offield had qualified as the administrator of his estate in the same month, in the county court of Green. At the February term following, in 1866, of the said court, an order was entered, requiring the said Offield to settle his accounts before a commissioner, and, in pursuance of said order, his accounts were settled, and it was found that there was in his hands as administrator a net balance of $922.36 for distribution among the creditors of said William W. White's estate. The debts were in excess of the assets, and the amount was apportioned by the court, and the interest of each creditor ascertained, and the report confirmed March, 1868. In 1887 the said pe-petitioner, R. M. White, filed his bill in chancery, seeking to establish his claim against White's estate against Offield and his sureties, and make it out of the latter, regarding the former as insolvent; but his bill was demurred to, demurrer sustained, the bill never amended, and that suit was dismissed. That in that suit the court decided that he had a judgment against the said Offield by reason of the said proceedings in the county court, and was barred by the statute of limitations. The petitioner asked leave to file his petition in the lien creditor's suit in the said court in the style of Davis v. Offield, and the other cases consolidated with it, and that his debt might be declared the first lien on the land, and paid first out of the fund. At the June term, 1889, of said court, Offield demurred to and answered the said petition. He denied that he owed anything to the creditors of W. W. White. That, many years before, he had settled his accounts, and returned his vouchers to the clerk's office; and that by reason of the lapse of so great length of time, or by reason of some unknown cause, they had been misplaced and lost in the clerk's office, and had not yet been found. That the recited orders of the county court in 1868 were not, in his opinion, judgments; but, if so, still they were obtained March, 1868, more than 20 years before, no execution had ever issued on them, and they were barred; and that the demand is stale, by reason of the laches of the creditor, and ought not to be enforced in a court of equity; and, moreover, the said petitioner, at the March rules, 1887, filed his bill against him and his sureties on his official bond as administrator of W. W. White, for the purpose of enforcing his supposed judgments, and at the June term the court decided that he had no valid claim, and dismissed his bill, and he went out of court. That the said bill raised the same questions as those now raised by the petition, and the decree dismissing the said bill was never appealed from, and has become final and irrevocable. That in that suit, by that decree, were settled all the questions involved in that suit actually decided, and all such as might properly have been decided, therein, or were involved therein, and therefore the questions now raised are the same questions raised again between the same parties, and are res adjudicata and cannot be again heard or decided, and the petition ought to be dismissed, which was done, accordingly, by the court. The circuit court decided that these were judgments, or had the effect of judgments, and were liable to the rules of law applicable to judgments, and were barred by the statute of limitations, no execution having been issued nor scire facias sued out thereon within 10 years, and dismissed the petition, with costs, whereupon the petitioner, the appellant, applied for and obtained an appeal to this court.

This decree is plainly right. There is no ground upon which any other could have been placed. (1) The judgments were barred after the lapse of 10 years. (2) The great lapse of time raises the presumption of payment, and the laches of the parties in asserting their claims are fatal. (3) The questions having been decided and the suit dismissed, and no appeal taken, the question is res adjudicata, and cannot be again raised. McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 533; Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Grat. 665; Insurance Co. v. Clemmitt, 77 Va. 366; Miller v. Cook, Id. 808; Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 251; Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Grat. 756; Fleming v. Dunlop, 4 Leigh, 338; Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 626, 13 S. E. 71. For the foregoing reasons, the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

BAIL BOND — VALIDITY — SCIRE FACIAS PROCEEDINGS.

1. Under Code, § 4100, providing that no action or judgment on a recognizance shall be defeated or arrested by reason of any defect in the form of the recognizance, it is no objection to the issue of a scire facias on a bail bond given by one accused of felonious assault that the condition of the bond was that defendant should appear "to answer the charge against him," instead of "to answer the felony whereof he stands charged."

2. A recognizance conditioned that the prisoner appear "on next Friday to answer the charge against him, and not to depart without leave of the court," is broken if the prisoner appear on said Friday, and, the trial having been commenced and adjourned to the next day, fail to appear on said next day.

Fauntleroy, J., dissenting.

Error to Loudoun county court.

The defendants, sureties on a certain recognizance for the appearance of one Allen, having had judgment against them on a scire facias issued on said recognizance, sue out a writ of error to this court. Affirmed.

John M. Orr, for plaintiffs in error. R. Taylor Scott, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

HINTON, J. At the April term, 1892, of the county court of Loudoun county, Benjamin Allen, one of the appellants, was indicted along with Benjamin Allen, Jr., for a felonious assault upon one Johnson Furr. At the September term of said court the said Benjamin Allen "appeared," as the record recites, in obedience to his recognizance, and entered into a new recognizance in the sum of $500, with Elizabeth Payne and John Allen his sureties in the like sum of $500, conditioned for his "personal appearance before the judge of this court on Friday next, to answer the charge against him, and not to depart without the leave of the court," etc. On the said Friday, September 16, 1892, he appeared, and pleaded not guilty. The evidence was partly heard, and the case adjourned over to the next morning. When the jury was brought into court on the 17th day of September, 1892, the prisoner failed to appear, whereupon a scire facias issued against the said Benjamin Allen and his sureties, returnable to the first day of the next term of the court. On the 10th day of October, 1892, this scire facias was, on the motion of the defendants, quashed, and the scire facias which is assailed in this case issued. This scire facias is in the usual form, and states the condition of the recognizance to be "that, if the said Benjamin Allen should personally appear before the judge of the county court for the said county, at the courthouse thereof, on Friday, September 16, 1892, to answer as of a felony whereof he stands accused, and should not depart without the leave of the said court, then the said recognizance was to be void." At the December term the defendants demurred to the scire facias, pleaded nul tiel record, and answered. Each of these contentions having been determined against them, they obtained a writ of error to this court, and urge the same objections here.

Now, was the recognizance of September 13, 1892, insufficient and void? We think not. The record would perhaps have been more formal had it stated that the condition of the recognizance was that the defendant Benjamin Allen should appear before, etc., "to answer the felony whereof he stands charged," instead of "to answer the charge against him," etc. But the difference is not material. Code 1893, § 4093, has prescribed no set form of words to be adopted when the parties are recognized in open court, and section 4100 specially enacts that "no action or judgment on a recognizance shall be defeated or arrested by any defect in the form of the recognizance if it appears to have been taken by a court or officer authorized to take it, and be substantially sufficient." The language of the Code is: "The condition when it is taken of a person charged with a criminal offense shall be that he appear before the court, judge or justice before whom the proceeding on such charge will be, at such time as may be prescribed by the court or officer taking it, to answer for the offense with which such person is charged, * * * and * * * shall not depart thence without the leave of the court." Here the language of the order of the court,—for in practice the recognizance is not usually written out in full when it is merely a renewal recognizance taken during the term of the court,—while certainly general, is sufficiently definite, as it points to the only offense with which the prisoner stood charged. Archer v. Com., 10 Grat. 627; Bolanz v. Com., 24 Grat. 31.

These observations will also dispose of the next assignment of error,—that there was no such record. The variance between the language of the recognizance and the scire facias must be regarded as immaterial.

The third and last assignment of error is, the prisoner fulfilled the condition of the recognizance by merely appearing and pleading, and that the recognizance was thenceforth void and of no effect. But this has been so often decided the other way that it cannot be necessary to do more than to cite some of the adjudged cases where the subject is fully discussed. Com. v. Ross, 6 Serg. & R. 427; Dennard v. State, 2 Ga. 138; Com. v. Teevens, 143 Mass. 211, 9 N. E. 524; State v. Stout, 11 N. J. Law, 133; Glasgow v. State, (Kan.) 21 Pac. 253. The provision in the recognizance that he shall not depart thence without leave of the court is inserted for the express purpose of having the party forthcoming and ready to answer the charge then preferred against him, and any other information that may be exhibited against him before he receives his discharge; and from this liability he cannot discharge himself and his sureties by any mere act of his own. We see no error in the judgment of the county court of Loudoun, and the same is affirmed.

APPEAL—WHEN LIES—NONSUIT—REVIEW—SETTING ASIDE VERDICT.

1. The setting aside of a verdict and the ordering of a venire de novo cannot be reviewed when no facts or evidence are certified to the supreme court.

2. A nonsuit entered by plaintiff is not a final judgment from which an appeal lies.

Error to circuit court, Orange county.

Action by one Mallory against one Taylor and others. A nonsuit was entered by plaintiff, and he brings error. Writ dismissed.

J. C. Gibson, J. W. Morton, and A. R. Blakey, for plaintiff in error. Rixey & Barbour, for defendants in error.

LACY, J. This is a writ of error to a certain ruling of the circuit court of Orange county rendered herein on the 3d of March, 1893. There appears to be no final judgment in the case to which a writ of error can lie. There was a verdict and judgment in this case on the 7th day of October, 1890. But this verdict and judgment were first suspended, and then set aside, and a venire de novo ordered, whereupon the plaintiff excepted; and there is a bill of exceptions to this action of the circuit court, showing that the plaintiff (plaintiff in error here) excepted to this action of the court against him, but no facts are and no evidence is certified, and we have nothing in the record upon which we can review the action of the circuit court and consider whether it be erroneous or otherwise. Upon the calling of the case upon the new trial, and the evidence being heard, but not recorded herein, the defendants demurred to the evidence of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff joined therein; whereupon the plaintiff asked to be allowed to enter a nonsuit, which leave was granted, and, the plaintiff being nonsuited and required to pay the costs, the defendants waived the five dollars damages. So there was an end of that suit upon the motion of the plaintiff, the effect of which was that the plaintiff retracted his suit without prejudice (by that action of retracting his suit) to his right to bring another suit when so advised. But this is not a final judgment, and does not come within any provision of section 3454 of the Code of Virginia, and no writ lies thereto. A nonsuit is not a final judgment, but the opposite. 4 Minor, Inst. pp. 859, 229; Tucker v. Sandridge, 82 Va. 535. Mr. Minor says: "In Virginia all employ the word 'nonsuit' to express any failure on the part of the plaintiff to prosecute his suit, whether upon being called at the trial or any other time. So that it includes not only the idea of a nonsuit proper, but also of a non prosecutor and of a nolle prosequi, (non pros. and nol. pros. as they are respectively called.) The effect of the nonsuit in this comprehensive sense is to put an end to the pending suit without precluding another for the same cause of action. The nonsuit is resorted to in our practice when the plaintiff finds himself unprepared with evidence to maintain his cause, either in consequence of his being ruled into a trial when he is not ready or for any other reason. By our statute a nonsuit (that is, any voluntary abandonment of the cause) must be suffered, if at all, before the jury retires from the box." Code, § 3387; 4 Minor, Inst. p. 783. The writ of error, therefore, in this case, must be dismissed as improvidently awarded.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 23, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INCREASING SENTENCE—PREVIOUS IMPRISONMENT—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

Code 1887, §§ 4179–4182, provide that if a person sentenced to the penitentiary and received therein shall have been before sentenced to like punishment, and the record of his conviction does not show that he was sentenced under sections 3905 or 3906, requiring a sentence for an increased term in such cases, the superintendent of the penitentiary shall file an information in the circuit court of Richmond to require the convict to say whether he is the person formerly convicted and sentenced; and if he remain silent, or deny such identity, a jury of bystanders shall be summoned to try the issue thus raised, and upon a verdict against the prisoner the court shall sentence him to such further confinement as is prescribed by chapter 190 in case of a second or third conviction. Held, that such provisions are constitutional, as such prisoner is not in the position of one charged with a crime for the first time, with all the presumptions of law in favor of his innocence.

Petition by Scott King, alias John Walker, for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner, having been sentenced to the state penitentiary, was brought before the circuit court of Richmond to be resented, (Code 1887, §§ 4179–4182,) as having before received a like punishment. He was tried under said sections, and resented. Writ denied.

R. Carter Scott and W. R. Booker, for petitioner. R. Taylor Scott, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HINTON, J. Section 4179 of the Code of 1887 makes the circuit court of the city of Richmond the court for the trial of all criminal proceedings against convicts in the penitentiary. Section 4180 provides that "when a person convicted of an offense and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary is received therein, if he was before sentenced to a like punishment and the record of his conviction does not show that he has been sentenced under sections 3905 or 3906, the superintendent of the penitentiary shall give information thereof without delay to the said circuit court of the city of Richmond whether it be alleged or not in the indictment on which he was so convicted, that he had been before sentenced to a like punishment." Section 4181 provides that "the said court shall cause the convict to be brought before it and upon an information filed, setting forth the several records of convictions and alleging the identity of the prisoner with the person named in each shall require the convict to say whether he is the same person or not." Section 4182 provides that "if he say he is not or remain silent, his plea or the fact of his silence shall be entered of record and a jury of bystanders shall be impaneled to inquire whether the convict is the same person mentioned in the several records." Section 4183 provides that "if the jury find that he is the same person, or if he acknowledge in open court after being duly cautioned, that he is the same person, the court shall sentence him to such further confinement as is prescribed by chapter 190, on a second or third conviction as the case may be." In pursuance of these provisions of the Code, the convict, Scott King, alias John Walker, was brought on the 5th day of February, 1892, before the circuit court of Richmond, and there tried upon an information framed in accordance with the statute, adjudged identical with John Walker, and sentenced to five years additional confinement in the penitentiary, to commence from the expiration of his then term of confinement therein. Thereupon he was brought before this court by writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he is illegally imprisoned, and praying to be discharged therefrom. And the judgment of the circuit court has been assailed upon various grounds, which have been urged with earnestness and ability by the counsel for the prisoner, all of which are bottomed upon the assumption that the prisoner stands in the position of a person charged with a crime in the first instance, who is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, for whose protection the law has provided certain safeguards and formalities which must be absolutely observed on the trial, or the trial will be vitiated. But manifestly this case has no analogy to that, and therefore we shall not examine them. Here it cannot be denied that there had been two trials and two convictions in due course of procedure and in accordance with the forms of law. The only question is whether the prisoner is the person convicted in each case. It is therefore a mere question of identification, and it cannot be doubted that the course prescribed by the act of assembly to judicially ascertain this fact is all that could be expected or required. By the information he is notified of the records of the several convictions alleged against him, and is charged with being the person convicted in each case. He is allowed to answer, and of course to offer any evidence he may have to disprove the fact, and the fact is tried by a jury. This seems to us all that is required by justice or the circumstances of the case. The case of Tuttle v. Com., 2 Gray, 505, is not in point. In that case the effort was made, under an indictment containing seven counts, each charging the sale of one gill of intoxicating liquor without license, and without alleging any previous conviction of the same offense, or even a finding of that fact by a jury, to sentence the prisoner to an increased penalty. This the supreme court of Massachusetts held could not be done. Manifestly what was said in that case can have no application to this. Upon a careful examination of the case, we think that the provisions of the Code which have been set out in this opinion are constitutional and valid, and that the prayer of the petitioner must be denied. Writ denied.

MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE—SELF-DEFENSE—JURY—SUMMONING FROM ANOTHER COUNTY.

1. Where, in a criminal case, a venire facias is ordered to be directed to the sergeant of another county to summon jurors, under the authority of Code 1887, § 4024, it is not necessary that a list be furnished such officer, as is

2. An entry by the clerk on the minutes or order book that defendant excepted to a certain ruling will not supply the place of a bill of exceptions.

3. If one willfully inflict on another a dangerous wound, calculated to endanger and destroy life, and death ensue therefrom within a year and a day, he is not relieved of responsibility for the result by the fact that deceased might have recovered, but for the aggravation of the wound by unskillful treatment.

4. During an election, defendant accused the deceased of fraud, whereupon a fight ensued; and two days thereafter deceased published a card in a paper edited by him, relating this occurrence, and applying opprobrious epithets to defendant. The latter, when informed of this, stated to several persons his intention to get even with deceased, saying that they could not both live in the same town a day longer; and less than three hours before the shooting he stated that the deceased would have to leave town, "the quicker the better." Defendant, seeing deceased in an office which he had entered, went out, going up the street; and the deceased soon after left the office, and went up the same street, where he met the prisoner, and was shot by him. In a dying declaration, deceased said that he did not have a pistol, and had made no assault on the prisoner before the firing commenced. Four shots were fired, and four chambers in defendant's revolver were found empty. Defendant was found to be shot in the wrist, and declared that deceased did it, whereupon the latter denied that he had a pistol, and no weapon could be found on him. Held, that a verdict of manslaughter was justified.

5. The prosecution is not bound to call all the witnesses present at the time of the commission of a homicide, or named on the indictment.

6. A witness present at the commission of a homicide, and named on the indictment, if called by the court of its own volition, is not a witness for or against defendant.

7. Where death ensues on a sudden provocation or quarrel without malice prepense, the killing is manslaughter; and, to reduce the offense to killing in self-defense, the accused must prove that before the mortal blow he retreated as far as he could with safety, and that he killed the deceased through the necessity of preserving his own life, or to save himself great bodily harm.

Error to corporation court of Danville.

Berkeley & Harrison and Teatross & Harris, (James T. Harrison, of counsel,) for plaintiff in error. R. T. Scott, Atty. Gen., and Col. W. R. Aslett, for the Commonwealth.

LEWIS, P. The prisoner was indicted in the corporation court of Danville for the murder of J. R. Moffett, was found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced, in accordance with the verdict, to five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

1. The first point made in the petition for the writ of error, and insisted upon in the argument here, is that the jury that tried the prisoner was not a lawful jury. One of the grounds of this objection is that, after an unsuccessful attempt had been made to obtain a jury in Danville, the court ordered a venire to be directed to the sergeant of Lynchburgh, commanding him to summon 24 persons from that city, which was done, but no list was furnished, of the names of persons to be summoned. It is contended that such a list ought to have been furnished, and the same point was made before the jury was sworn. The trial court, however, overruled the objection, and in this there was no error. Authority to direct jurors in a criminal case to be summoned from another county or corporation than that in which the trial is to be is conferred by section 4024 of the Code, and there is no requirement that a list, in such a case, shall be furnished. Sections 4018 and 4019 apply only to the summoning of jurors in felony cases from the county or corporation in which the trial is to be; and the reason, no doubt, of the difference between those sections and section 4024, in respect to furnishing a list, is that in the former case the court or judge is presumed to have the means and information essential to intelligent action in the matter, but not so in the latter case. At all events, there is nothing in the statute to support the prisoner's contention, and we cannot, without assuming legislative authority, interpolate into the statute a requirement which the legislature has not seen fit to insert in it.

Objection is also made to the exclusion from the panel by the court of Hirsh and Vernon, after they had been sworn on their voir dire, and accepted as qualified jurors. As to this matter, the transcript recites that, after Hirsh and Vernon had been thus accepted, the attorney for the commonwealth moved to be allowed to re-examine them on oath as to their fitness to serve as jurors, and to introduce witnesses to prove that the said Vernon had on one or more occasions after the death of the deceased, said the prisoner ought not to be convicted of the murder charged, "which being done," it is further recited, "they were excluded from the panel, to which action of the court the prisoner, by counsel, excepted." No formal bill of exceptions, however, was taken, and the entry by the clerk on the minutes or order book that the prisoner excepted cannot supply the place of a bill of exceptions. Improvement Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 589; Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 299, 12 S. E. 671, and cases cited. The point therefore, is not presented by the record proper, and hence cannot be considered here. It is not improper, however, to say that, were it regularly presented, we would have no hesitation in holding that it is altogether without merit.

2. The next assignment of error is that the court misdirected the jury upon the law. No reasons, however, are urged in support of this general assignment of error; and it was virtually conceded in the argument that the action of the court in regard to the instructions was without error, as it unquestionably was. The ninth instruction given for the commonwealth, and the only one we deem it necessary to specially mention or consider, is as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the prisoner willfully inflicted upon the deceased a dangerous wound,—one that was calculated to endanger and destroy life,—and that death ensued therefrom within a year and a day, the prisoner is none the less responsible for the result, although it may appear that the deceased might have recovered, but for the aggravation of the wound by unskillful or improper treatment." The prisoner shot the deceased in the abdomen, with a pistol, on the street in Danville, inflicting, according to the evidence for the commonwealth, a mortal wound, from which death resulted in less than 36 hours afterwards. An attempt was made on behalf of the prisoner to show that death resulted from improper surgical treatment, but without success, and it was to meet the evidence on this point that the instruction just quoted was given. In Com. v. McPike, 3 Cush. 181, it was ruled that where a surgical operation is performed in a proper manner, and under circumstances which render it necessary, in the opinion of competent surgeons, upon one who has received a wound apparently mortal, and such operation is ineffectual to afford relief and save the life of the patient, or is itself the immediate cause of death, the party inflicting the wound will nevertheless be responsible for the consequences. Lord Hale states the same principle thus: "If a man give another a stroke, which it may be is not in itself so mortal but that with good care he might be cured, yet if he die of the wound within the year and day, it is homicide or murder, as the case is, and so it hath been always ruled. * * * If a man receives a wound, which is not in itself mortal, but either for want of helpful applications, or neglect thereof, it turns to a gangrene or a fever, and that gangrene or fever be the immediate cause of his death, yet this is murder or manslaughter in him that gave the stroke or wound; for that wound, though it were not the immediate cause of his death, yet if it were the mediate cause thereof, and the fever or gangrene was the immediate cause of his death, yet the wound was the cause of the gangrene or fever, and so, consequently, is causa causati." 1 Hale, P. C. 428. To the same effect is Com. v. Hackett, 2 Allen, 136, where, after a review of the authorities, the court, speaking by Chief Justice Bigelow, declared the rule to be that if the wound was a dangerous wound,—that is, calculated to endanger or destroy life,—and death ensued therefrom, it is sufficient proof of the offense of murder or manslaughter, as the case may be, and that the person who inflicted it is responsible, though it may appear that the deceased might have recovered if he had taken proper care of himself, or submitted to a surgical operation, or that unskillful or improper treatment aggravated the wound and contributed to the death, or that death was immediately caused by a surgical operation rendered necessary by the condition of the wound. "A different doctrine," it was added, "would tend to give immunity to crime, and to take away from human life a salutary and essential safeguard." See, also, Com. v. Green, 1 Ashm. 289; State v. Bantley, 44 Conn. 537; State v. Morphy, 33 Iowa, 270. In the case in 44 Conn. the deceased was shot in the arm, and died 11 days thereafter of lockjaw. The prosecution claimed that death resulted from the wound; the accused, that it resulted from the treatment of the case by the attending physicians. The wound was dressed in the first instance by one surgeon, and afterwards, to the time of death, by another. These differed radically as to the manner in which the case should have been treated. The accused was convicted of manslaughter, and the conviction was held good. "There is no such defect in the law," it was said, "as that the person who intentionally inflicts a wound calculated to destroy life, and from which death ensues, can throw responsibility for the act upon either the carelessness or ignorance of his victim, or shield himself behind the doubt which disagreeing doctors may raise as to the treatment proper for the case." In conformity with these authorities, Greenleaf lays it down that "if death ensues from a wound given in malice, but not in its nature mortal, but which being neglected or mismanaged the party died, this will not excuse the prisoner who gave it, but he will be held guilty of the murder, unless he can make it clearly and certainly appear that the maltreatment of the wound, or the medicine administered to the patient, or his own misconduct, and not the wound itself, was the sole cause of his death; for, if the wound had not been given, the party had not died." 3 Greenl. Ev. § 130.

3. The law having been correctly pronounced to the jury, the remaining question is whether the verdict was warranted by the evidence, upon which question the prisoner occupies in this court the position of a demurrant to evidence; the evidence, not the facts, being certified. That is to say, he must be considered as admitting the truth of the commonwealth's evidence, and all just inferences which the jury could properly draw therefrom, and as waiving all his own evidence in conflict therewith, and all inferences from his own evidence which do not necessarily result therefrom; and unless, when viewed in this light, the verdict be plainly wrong, it is our duty to affirm it. Code, § 3484; Acts 1891-92, p. 962; Gaines' Case, 88 Va. 682, 14 S. E. 375; Read's Case, 22 Grt. 924; Gravely's Case, 86 Va. 396, 10 S. E. 43.

The evidence in the case is voluminous, but its salient points may be briefly stated: The deceased was a Baptist preacher, and an ardent Prohibitionist. He was also the editor of a paper called "Anti-Liquor." The prisoner was a lawyer, and an ardent Democrat. Both were young married men, in the prime of life. During the progress of the presidential election, on the 8th of November, 1892, both seem to have been actively engaged at the polls in what is called North Danville, when the prisoner accused the deceased of attempting to perpetrate a fraud by having bogus Democratic tickets printed. At this the deceased struck the prisoner a blow, whereupon they were separated, and both were afterwards fined. Two days thereafter, the deceased published a card in his paper relative to the disturbance on election day, in which he spoke of the prisoner as "a contemptible whiskeyte," and also as "a one-horse lawyer" who had been doing the dirty work of the liquorites for two years, and who, during a wet and dry campaign, had proposed to the liquor men to buy a lot, and settle a nigger on it, next to Mr. Moffett, the deceased. The prisoner was absent from Danville at the time of this publication, and did not return until the evening of the next day, when he was informed of it. The day before the publication, however, (i. e. the day or the evening after the election,) in conversation with several gentlemen on the street relative to his difficulty with the deceased, he declared his purpose to "get even with him," and that they both could not live in the same town 24 hours longer; and within less than three hours before the shooting he declared, in the presence of several witnesses who testified for the commonwealth, that the deceased would have to leave town, and the quicker he left the better it would be for him. It appears that just before the shooting, and soon after being informed of the above-mentioned publication, the prisoner went into the office of the Danville Register in search of a copy of the paper. When he reached the office, however, he observed the deceased in conversation, standing with his back to the door, and immediately turned and went out. This was between 8:30 and 9 o'clock in the evening. Upon coming out of the Register building, the prisoner walked up the street, and in a little while the deceased came out, and walked up the same street. In a few minutes they met, when the prisoner shot and mortally wounded the deceased. The latter, in his dying declaration, said: "I left the Register office, and walked up Main street. I met a man approaching me. He seemed to be coming straight, so I stepped aside to give him room. He was four or five yards from me when he commenced firing upon me. I endeavored to secure his weapon, but was not successful in doing so until Mr. Green Williams, chief of police, came up, and separated us." His assailant, he said, was the prisoner, though he did not recognize him until he commenced firing; and, in answer to questions, he further stated that he had no pistol, and that he made no assault on the prisoner before the firing commenced. There were four shots fired, and upon examination of the prisoner's pistol, after the parties were separated, four of its five chambers were empty. The fifth contained a loaded shell. The prisoner was found to be shot in the wrist, and he declared that the deceased had shot him, whereupon the deceased denied that he had a pistol, and requested the officer to search him, which he did, without finding any. The prisoner, it seems, had been in the habit of carrying a pistol for a number of years.

Now, if this evidence stood alone, the jury would have been well warranted in finding the prisoner guilty of murder. But there was evidence tending to show that the parties were engaged in a mutual combat before any of the shots were fired; and the jury were, no doubt, influenced by this evidence in finding the prisoner guilty of manslaughter only. The testimony of two of the witnesses, viz. Green Williams, the officer just mentioned, and one Gravely, is very positive on this point. Both claim to have been eyewitnesses of the shooting, and the name of Williams was among those at the foot of the indictment. Accordingly, at the trial, the prisoner moved that these witnesses be called for the prosecution, but the court refused to grant the motion. It did, however, put them upon the stand, with liberty to both sides to cross-examine them, which was done; and it is now contended for the prisoner that their testimony is commonwealth's evidence, but this position is untenable. According to Hill's Case, 88 Va. 633, 14 S. E. 330, the prosecution is not bound to call all or any of the witnesses present at the transaction, in cases of homicide, as in England, but it is for the representative of the commonwealth to say what witnesses he will call, and this discretion ought not to be interfered with. The trial judge, however, may, in his discretion, call any witness who was present at the transaction, or whose name is on the indictment, for cross-examination by both sides; but, as was said in Hill's Case, a witness so called is not the witness of either party. The point, however, is not a very material one, in the present case, because the jury found the accused guilty of manslaughter; and, if we were to consider all the evidence in the record, the result would be the same.

It is a fundamental principle of criminal law that where death ensues on a sudden provocation or sudden quarrel, without malice prepense, the killing is manslaughter, and in order to reduce the offense to killing in self-defense the accused must prove two things, viz. (1) that before the mortal blow was given he declined further combat, and had retreated as far as he could with safety; and (2) that he killed the deceased through the necessity of preserving his own life, or to save himself from great bodily harm, which has not been shown in the present case. In Valden's Case, 12 Grat. 717, it was held that, to make out a case of self-defense, the accused must show to the jury that the defense was necessary to protect his own life, or to protect himself against grievous bodily harm, and that, with regard to the necessity that will justify the slaying of another in self-defense, the accused must not have wrongfully occasioned the necessity, for a man shall not in any case justify the killing of another by a pretense of necessity, unless he were without fault in bringing that necessity upon himself. The prisoner was examined as a witness in the present case, and testified that when he met the deceased the latter caught him by the coat, and pushed him back several steps, at the same time drawing a pistol from his hip pocket; that he (the prisoner) knocked his hand down, and then drew his own pistol and fired. But the assertion that the deceased had a pistol is positively disproven. He denies it in his dying declaration. He denied it in the presence of the prisoner, immediately after the shooting, and when, at his request, he was searched by the police officer, no pistol was to be found. It is perfectly clear from the record that he had no pistol, and that the prisoner's sworn statement on the subject was fabricated. In short, there is no element of self-defense in the case, and the verdict, so far from being without evidence to support it, is remarkable for its mildness. The judgment is affirmed.

ZUMBRO v. STUMP.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 25, 1893.)

REVIVING JUDGMENT—DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY —REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. In a proceeding to revive a judgment by scire facias the scire facias must pursue the terms of the judgment, and a judgment on a writ of scire facias, awarding an execution in favor of different parties, for a different sum of money than that recited in the scire facias, will be set aside by the court on motion made at the same term at which it is rendered, and a new trial will be awarded.

2. A discharge in bankruptcy may be set up in a state court to stay the issue on an execution on a judgment recovered against the bankrupt after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy and before the discharge, although the defendant did not before the judgment ask for a stay of proceedings, under Rev. St. U. S. § 5106.

3. When the defendant moved the court to set aside its finding and grant him a new trial, which motion was overruled, and he failed to except to the opinion of the court and procure the court to certify all the facts proven at the trial, if the finding is substantially sufficient, generally the appellate court will presume that the opinion and judgment of the court in overruling the defendant's motion was right and proper, the contrary not appearing.

Error to circuit court, Calhoun county.

Action by William A. Zumbro against Salathiel Stump to revive a judgment. From a judgment vacating the judgment rendered and granting a new trial, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Linn & Hamilton, for plaintiff in error. R. F. Fleming, for defendant in error.

ENGLISH, P. On the 22d day of December, 1882, one William A. Zumbro sued out of the clerk's office of the circuit court of Calhoun county a writ of scire facias against Salathiel Stump for the purpose of reviving a judgment which was recited in said writ as having been recovered on the 23d day of October, 1878, by the judgment of said court against said Salathiel Stump for the sum of $230.77, with interest thereon from that date until paid, and his costs by him about his suit in that behalf. More than two years have elapsed since the date of said judgment, yet execution of the debt, interest, and costs, aforesaid, remains to be made. On the 24th day of February, 1883, the parties appeared by their attorneys, and the defendant tendered a plea in writing, to the filing of which the plaintiff objected, and the court took time to consider thereof until the next term. On the 21st day of June, 1883, the parties appeared by their attorneys, and the defendant tendered his plea No. 2 in writing to the plaintiff's action, to the filing of which the plaintiff objected, which objections to said pleas numbered 1 and 2 were overruled, and the court permitted the said pleas to be filed. Said plea No. 1 averred that before suing out of the clerk's office of this court the said writ of scire facias, to wit, on the 23d day of August, 1878, he, the said Salathiel Stump, became a bankrupt on the petition of himself, and that he, the said Salathiel Stump, was on the 23d day of August, 1878, to wit, in the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia, at Clarksburg, in said district, upon the petition of himself filed in said court on said last-mentioned day, duly adjudged a bankrupt, and a certificate was awarded him, available for all purposes as a protection to him in bankruptcy, and thereby said Salathiel Stump became a bankrupt within the true intent and meaning of the act of congress of the United States of America, and called the "United States Bankruptcy Act," passed March 2, 1867, and in force on said 23d day of August, 1878, at said district, at Clarksburg, aforesaid; and that the said supposed judgment in said writ of scire facias mentioned, if any such there be, was predicated upon a debt contracted by said Stump to said Zumbro, and said debt did accrue to said plaintiff before said Salathiel Stump so became a bankrupt, as aforesaid, to wit, on the 21st day of January, 1875; and defendant, Stump, alleged that his said petition was still pending and undetermined in said United States district court for the district of West Virginia, at Clarksburg, and of this he put himself upon the country, etc. Plea No. 2 reads as follows: "And the said defendant, Salathiel Stump, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when," etc., "and for further plea, says that on the 23d day of August, 1878, defendant resided in the county of Calhoun, in the state of West Virginia, and within the district of West Virginia, and was then owing debts not contracted in consequence of defalcation as a public officer, nor while acting in any fiduciary capacity, and was then and there a bankrupt within the time, intent, and meaning of the act, and entitled to all its benefits. That on the 23d day of August, 1878, he presented his petition to the United States district court for said district of West Virginia, at Clarksburg, setting forth truly, according to his best knowledge and belief, a list of his creditors, their places of residence, and the amount due each, together with an accurate inventory of his property, rights, etc., of every name and description, and the location and situation of each and every portion thereof; also setting forth the inability of him, said defendant, to pay all his debts in full, his willingness to surrender all his estate and effects for the benefit of his creditors, and praying for the benefit of the act of the congress of the United States entitled 'Bankruptcy,' which petition was duly verified by his oath. That upon the presentation of said petition such proceedings were had thereon that defendant afterwards, to wit, on the 28th day of February, 1883, was duly ordered and decreed to be a bankrupt; and further, that in pursuance of said act, to wit, on the 28th day of February, 1883, in the district aforesaid, a certificate of discharge was granted to said defendant, and a final discharge and certificate were granted to him in and by said court, which discharge and certificate are in the words and figures following, to wit: 'District of West Virginia—sa.: District court of the United States for the district of West Virginia. In bankruptcy. In the matter of Salathiel Stump, bankrupt. Whereas, Salathiel Stump, in the county of Calhoun and state of West Virginia, has been by this court duly adjudged a bankrupt under the act of congress entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and appears to have conformed to all the requirements of the law in that behalf, it is therefore ordered by the court that said Salathiel Stump be, and he hereby is, forever discharged of and from all debts and claims which by said act are made provable against his estate, and which existed on the 23rd day of August, 1878, on which day the petition for adjudication was filed by him, the said Stump, excepting such debts, if any, as are by said act excepted from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy. Given under my hand and the seal of said district court at Clarksburg, in the said district, this the 28th day of February, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three. J. J. Jackson, Judge of the District Court of U. S. for the District of West Virginia. [Seal of Court.] And the said defendant avers that the promissory note filed in the said plaintiff's declaration, upon which said judgment in said scire facias mentioned was and is predicated and founded, if any such promissory note was made, was made and accrued before the presenting of said petition of said defendant to be declared a bankrupt, and was provable under the act aforesaid. Also that the supposed debt in said scire facias and declaration mentioned was not created in consequence of any defalcation of the defendant as a public officer, or as an executor, etc., or while acting in any other fiduciary capacity. And the said defendant avers that such discharge and certificate were a full and complete discharge from all liability on account of said supposed judgment," etc., "and this he is ready to verify," etc. "Salathiel Stump. By Counsel. Levi Johnson and Henry C. Flesher, for Deft."

On the 20th day of June, 1889, the plaintiff moved the court to strike out of the cause said special pleas No. 1 and No. 2, which motion was overruled, and the plaintiff replied generally to each of said pleas. These were the only pleas interposed, and on the 18th day of February, 1890, the parties waived a jury, and submitted the whole matters of law and fact to the court, and the court rendered a judgment upon said scire facias in favor of William A. Zumbro and George S. Smith, late partners trading under the firm name of Zumbro & Smith, against said Salathiel Stump, and awarded execution against the defendant for the sum of $432.40, with interest from the 20th day of June, 1882, till paid, and $10.45 costs, together with the costs of said writ. On the 20th day of February, 1890, the defendant moved the court to set aside the judgment given against him, and the plaintiff, by his attorney, stated that the order entered on the 18th day of February, 1890, was a judgment in favor of Zumbro & Smith against Salathiel Stump, and that there was nothing in the record which would justify such an order, and that said order should be set aside; and the plaintiff moved the court to enter the judgment to which he claimed he was entitled upon the said scire facias; and thereupon the court refused to enter the said judgment, but ordered the same to be set aside, and awarded the defendant a new trial; to which action and ruling of the court in refusing to enter the said judgment and in granting a new trial of the said cause the plaintiff excepted, and prayed the court to certify all the evidence on the said trial and on the motion for a new trial, and the court did accordingly certify as follows: That on the trial before the court in lieu of a jury the plaintiff read in evidence a judgment in favor of William A. Zumbro and George S. Smith, partners trading under the firm name of Zumbro & Smith, against Salathiel Stump, rendered by said court at the June term thereof, 1882; and also an execution book, showing the entry of the said judgment therein, a copy of which judgment is made part of the bill of exceptions, and is for the sum of $432.40, with interest thereon from the 20th day of June, 1882, and costs. The transcript from the execution book was also made a part of the bill of exceptions, and shows a judgment for the same amount, with interest from the same date, and $9.70 costs. And the defendant, to maintain said pleas Nos. 1 and 2, filed by him, offered and read in evidence a certificate of protection in bankruptcy, showing that he was on his own petition on the 23d day of August, 1878, duly adjudged a bankrupt, and also his final discharge in bankruptcy, dated the 28th day of February, 1883, both of which papers are set forth in and made part of said bill of exceptions. And it was stated on said trial of the scire facias that the judgment of Zumbro & Smith v. Salathiel Stump was the judgment relied on by the plaintiff; and the defendant's attorney, being asked if he had any further evidence to offer, replied that he had not, whereupon the court found for the plaintiff upon the issues joined, and awarded execution in favor of said Zumbro & Smith against said Salathiel Stump for the sum of $432.40, with interest thereon from the 20th day of June, 1882, until paid, and costs, $10.45, and the costs of said writ; and on the 20th day of February, 1890, the defendant moved the court to set aside said judgment, and grant him a new trial, which was done. On the 21st day of June, 1890, the cause was again submitted to the court in lieu of a jury to try the same; and the court, having fully heard the evidence and argument of counsel, found for the defendant upon the issues joined, and gave judgment for costs against the plaintiff, and on the same day the court certified that before rendering judgment for the defendant the plaintiff moved the court to set aside the finding of the court for the defendant, on the ground that it was contrary to the law and evidence, and also because of the matters set forth in bill of exceptions taken at a former term, which motion the court overruled, and the plaintiff obtained this writ of error.

The only pleas interposed in the case were those designated as Nos. 1 and 2, and the defendant moved the court on the first trial to strike out these pleas, and when the court overruled his motion he replied generally thereto. The first question, then, is, did these pleas constitute a good defense to the scire facias? Now, if either of these pleas was good, and constituted a bar to the scire facias, it should have been filed; and as, in our opinion, there can be no question that plea No. 2 was a good one, the circuit court committed no error in allowing it to be filed. Said plea No. 2 avers that on the 23d day of August, 1878, the defendant resided in the county of Calhoun, in the state of West Virginia, and was then owing debts not contracted in consequence of defalcation as a public officer nor while acting in any fiduciary capacity, and was then and there a bankrupt, within the true intent and meaning of the act, and entitled to all its benefits, etc. The plaintiff moved to strike out both of these pleas, but his motion was overruled, and said pleas were filed, and the plaintiff replied generally thereto. The effect of a motion to strike out stands upon the same footing as a demurrer thereto, so far as it operates as an admission of the truth of all matters of fact which are sufficiently pleaded. These facts, however, were put in issue by the general replication. Upon the question as to whether said plea constituted a good defense if the averments therein contained are to be taken as true, we refer to the case of Boynton v. Ball, 121 U. S. 457, 7 Sup. Ct. 981, where it was held that "a discharge in bankruptcy may be set up in a state court to stay the issue of an execution on a judgment recovered against the bankrupt after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and before the discharge, although the defendant did not, before the judgment, ask for a stay of proceedings under Rev. St. § 5106." The judgment in the case under consideration, as in that case, was rendered between the date on which the defendant was adjudged a bankrupt on his own petition and the date on which he obtained his final discharge. Justice Miller, in the case of Boynton v. Ball, supra, in commenting on the case of Dimock v. Copper Co., 117 U. S. 559, 6 Sup. Ct. 855, says, among other things: "The principle on which the case was decided was that, while the discharge in bankruptcy would have been a valid defense to the suit if pleaded at or before the time judgment was rendered in the Massachusetts court, it had in that respect no more sanctity or effect in relieving Dimock of his debt to the company than a payment or a receipt or a release, of which he was bound to avail himself by plea or suggestion of some kind as a defense to the action in proper time; that, showing no good reason why he should not have presented that discharge, and permitting the judgment to go against him in the Massachusetts court, without an attempt to avail himself of it there, the judgment of the court was conclusive on the question of his indebtedness at that time to the copper company. That case, so parallel in its circumstances to the one now before us, would be conclusive of the latter if Boynton had had his certificate of discharge, or if the order for it had been made by the bankruptcy court before the judgment in the state court. But, as we have already seen, the judgment in the state court was rendered more than a year before the order of discharge in the bankruptcy court, and Boynton therefore had no opportunity to plead a discharge which had not been granted as a defense to that action." In the case under consideration we find the judgment recited in the scire facias was obtained on the 23d day of October, 1878, and the judgment in favor of Zumbro & Smith, which was offered in evidence by the plaintiff, was rendered on the 20th of June, 1882, while the said final discharge of Salathiel Stump bears date the 28th day of February, 1883, so that said discharge could not have been pleaded at the date of either of said judgments, and the ruling of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Boynton v. Ball, supra, shows that plea No. 1 could only have been made available if pleaded, at the proper time to obtain a stay of proceedings until the discharge was obtained, which might have then been pleaded puls darein continuance. A valuable note upon the questions involved in this case may be found in Clark v. Rowling, 53 Amer. Dec. 297, where it is said that the great preponderance of authority holds that, "where a judgment is recovered against a bankrupt or insolvent between the petition and discharge for a provable debt existing at the time of the petition, whether the discharge be under a state insolvent law or under the bankrupt act of 1841 or that of 1867, the judgment does not merge the original cause of action, so as to constitute a new debt, but is merely a new security for the old debt; and, the former debt being barred by the discharge, the judgment is also barred including costs;" citing numerous authorities. See, also, Lackey v. Steere, 121 Ill. 598, 13 N. E. 518.

That the court committed no error in setting aside the judgment on said scire facias rendered on the 18th day of February, 1890, is manifest for the following reasons: In the first place, the execution is awarded for nearly double the amount recited in the scire facias as the amount of the judgment; second, the execution is directed in favor of a firm by the name of Zumbro & Smith, when the judgment recited in the scire facias is described as being in favor of William A. Zumbro; and because both plaintiff and defendant conceded that the judgment was erroneous, and the court pursued the proper course in setting aside the judgment and awarding the defendant a new trial. Foster on Scire Facias (57 Law Library, [N. S.] p. 54) says: "The scire facias must pursue the terms of the judgment, and a variance from it is error, as if it mistakes the sum." And Barton, in his Law Practice, (volume 2, p. 1016,) says: "The function of these cases of the scire facias is not to render a new judgment, but it only awards an execution on the judgment originally rendered." Upon the second trial, which was had on the 21st of June, 1890, the cause was again heard by the court in lieu of a jury, and, having fully heard the evidence and argument of counsel, it found for the defendant; and, before rendering judgment for the defendant the plaintiff moved the court to set aside the finding of the court for the defendant on the ground that it was contrary to the law and evidence, and also because of the matters set forth in the bill of exceptions taken at former term, which motion the court overruled. The plaintiff, however, took no bill of exceptions to the ruling of the court upon his motion for a new trial, and, as a matter of course, did not set out the facts proven upon the last trial. It is true that the certificate of the court shows that the motion to set aside the finding was based upon the alleged ground that it was contrary to the law and evidence, and also because of the matters set forth in the bill of exceptions taken at the former term. We cannot, however, well see how a bill of exceptions setting forth the facts proved at a former term upon a former trial can be looked into to determine the correctness of the ruling of the court upon the last trial, for at the time the bill of exceptions referred to was taken and saved it may have contained all of the facts then proved; but how can we say it contains all the facts proved when the second trial was concluded? Barton, in his new Law Practice, (volume 1, p. 659,) says: "The facts stated in one bill of exceptions, however, cannot be noticed by an appellate court in considering another, unless the first bill is referred to in the second, and adopted as part of it;" citing Crawford v. Jarrett's Adm'r, 2 Leigh, 639; Perkins v. Hawkins, 9 Grat. 649; Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. (Va.) 106. The difficulty in the case under consideration is that no bill of exceptions setting out the facts proved in the last trial was taken, and in consequence we have no certificate of all the facts proved. In the case of Campbell v. Hughes, 12 W. Va. 184, this court held that, "when the defendants moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant a new trial, and the court overruled the motion, and the defendants failed to except to the opinion of the court, and procure the court to certify all the evidence given or facts proven at the trial, if the verdict is substantially sufficient, generally the appellate court will presume that the opinion and judgment of the court in overruling the defendant's motion was right and proper, the contrary not appearing." Again, this court has frequently held that, "where a bill of exceptions taken to the opinion or ruling of the court below does not set forth sufficient facts, matter, or evidence to show whether the court erred or not, the presumption will be that the court was right." See Wise v. Postlewait, 3 W. Va. 453; Bank of the Valley v. Bank of Berkeley, Id. 386; Fawcett v. Railway Co., 24 W. Va. 755; Todd v. Gates, 20 W. Va. 464. Under these rulings, then, as we are, in the case under consideration, unable to determine what evidence was before the court at the second or last trial, we must presume that the rulings of the court complained of were right, and for these reasons the judgment complained of is affirmed, with costs and damages.

GIBSON v. CITY OF HUNTINGTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

Nov. 11, 1893.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—DEFECTIVE STREETS— NEGLECT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. A municipal corporation is absolutely liable for injuries caused by its failure to keep in repair the streets, alleys, sidewalks, roads, and bridges. Chapman v. Milton, 7 S. E. 22, 31 W. Va. 385.

2. A municipal corporation is liable for injuries sustained by the negligent management of its corporate property, to the same extent that private individuals are liable for the same character of negligence.

3. A municipal corporation is liable for injuries caused by its negligence in the discharge of, or failure to discharge, such duties as are purely ministerial, and not governmental or discretionary.

4. A municipal corporation is not liable for injuries caused by the negligence of its agents and officers in the discharge of, or omission to discharge, duties which are purely governmental or discretionary.

5. When the injury sued for is alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligent use of its corporate property, or in the discharge or omission to discharge of a ministerial duty, the burden of proving negligence is on the plaintiff; and if the jury, by its determination, finds that the facts are not sufficient to sustain the charge of negligence, the court cannot disturb the verdict, even though it be of a different opinion. To do so would be a denial of the right of trial by jury guaranteed by the constitution of this state.

Error to circuit court, Cabell county.

Action by Eustace Gibson, administratrix of the estate of Mary Lewis, deceased, against the city of Huntington, to recover for the death of decedent. Defendant had judgment, and a new trial was denied. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Gibson, Hutchinson & Gibson, for plaintiff in error. Campbell & Holt, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. Mary Lewis, an infant four years and five months old, while playing on the side of a road in the city of Huntington on the — day of May, 1892, was killed by the falling of an embankment which had been left along the street or road as a barrier to keep travelers along the highway from driving into the adjacent creek. This embankment had been undermined to some extent by persons digging out sand and gravel, and was in a dangerous condition, as the death of the child bears witness. The street commissioner, after some excavating had been done, (how much, the evidence does not disclose,) put up a notice forbidding the taking of sand and gravel from this place; but afterwards (how long does not appear, nor how long before the accident) a man by the name of Brown excavated sand and gravel, and hauled it away; for what purpose, is not revealed, but, so far as the evidence shows, it was without the knowledge of the municipal authorities. The jury were taken to view the place of the accident.

It is now firmly established, by a long line of well-considered decisions, that a municipal corporation is liable for injuries occasioned by its negligence in the following three classes of cases: (1) Failure to keep its streets, alleys, sidewalks, roads, and bridges in repair, under the statute. (2) In the discharge of ministerial or specified duties, not discretionary or governmental, assumed in consideration of the privileges conferred by charter, even though there be the absence of special rewards or advantages. (3) As a private owner of property, to the same extent as individuals are liable. It would be impracticable to cite all the authorities settling these propositions, but the following are referred to as leading cases: Mendel v. City of Wheeling, 28 W. Va. 233; City of Richmond v. Long's Adm'rs, 17 Grat. 375; Orme v. City of Richmond, 79 Va. 86; Mackey v. City of Vicksburg, 64 Miss. 777, 2 South. 178; Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540. In the first class of cases, negligence is presumed, and notice of defect is not required. In the second and third classes, negligence must be alleged and fully proven. Chapman v. Milton, 31 W. Va. 335, 7 S. E. 22; Biggs v. Huntington, 32 W. Va. 55, 9 S. E. 51.

This suit is not proper under the first class, or statutory provision, because it was not caused by any defect or obstruction in the roadbed; but it can be maintained under the two latter classes, because it is made the ministerial duty of the municipality, by law, to protect the public and individuals from anything dangerous, and the embankment that caused the injury was maintained by the city as its property, in lieu of other barrier along and within the boundaries of a public highway. The city has no more right to erect or keep within or along a public highway an unnecessarily dangerous structure, even though it be for some public purpose, than an individual. It is true that the city did not erect this embankment, but, as the witness said, it was placed there by nature, and the city adopted and maintained it as a barrier to prevent travelers from driving into the creek. Had there been an artificial structure so rudely constructed of stone, wood, or iron as to fall of its own weight, and crush this child, the liability of the city would not have been questioned; and it certainly ought to make no difference whether the city builds or adopts one already there, even though nature was the original builder. It was its ministerial duty, neither governmental nor discretionary, to see that it was not dangerous to any one lawfully using the road, or any part thereof.

By leaving the embankment there as such barrier, the council fixed the limits of the road, and any one using it had the right to lawfully use it, up to the limit so fixed, whether it was the traveled part of the road or not.

Was the child using the road for a lawful purpose? Children are not responsible for the choice of their parents, nor the place or condition of their birth. God decides these for them when he breathes into them the breath of life. Poor parents are unable to provide a place of healthful exercise and play for their children, but it requires all their earnings to clothe, feed, and shelter them. The law prohibits them, under the penalty of being trespassers, from entering on the lands of others; and now to forbid them to use the road to its utmost boundary for the purpose of play, when not interfering in any manner with the traveling public, would savor too much of the dark ages of barbarism, when children were subjected to inhuman and diabolical punishments, and their lives were at the mercy of those having charge over them. It is the only commons they now have, and to confine them in the narrow limits of their cheerless tenement houses would be cruel, unjust, and oppressive, blight their young lives, and render their bodies weak, sickly, scrofulous, and vile; and, if they could manage to escape the long list of contagious diseases so fatal to their kind, they would grow up to adult age morbidly despising laws so tyrannous and unworthy a civilized and liberty loving people. It is a right they have immemorially enjoyed, and should continue so to do as long as the public fails to provide them other free commons, where they can have the pure air, bright sunshine, and sportive exercise so necessary to the healthful growth of their sensitive bodies. Horses, cattle, hogs, dogs, and other domestic animals, are all at large in the streets, unless prohibited by special ordinance, and why not children? The public highways can be put to no better use. So I am clearly of the opinion the child had the right to be there, even though out of the beaten path, and only for play. Neither was it old enough to realize the danger it was in, or the dangerous condition of the embankment, and could not possibly be guilty of contributory negligence.

The most troublesome question is that of negligence. In all cases where the remedy is not given by statute, but the common law, negligence must be proved by the party alleging it. Where the facts are indisputable, and there can be no fair difference of opinion as to whether the inference of negligence should be drawn, the question becomes one of law alone, and the court may decide it, if appealed to for this purpose. But, even where the facts are not disputed, if there may be a fair difference of opinion as to whether the inference of negligence should be drawn, or as to whether the facts sustain the charge of negligence, the jury are the sole judges, and their verdict cannot be disturbed, although the court may be of the opinion that the facts do not sustain it. The litigants have the constitutional right to a trial by a jury of fair and impartial men under the rules of law. Having demanded and had it, they have no right to complain, and the court has no right to interfere. It is a tribunal of their own choosing. It has been held in cases of this character, "that notice to the corporate authorities, either express or implied, must be shown. If the defect causing the injury had existed for such length of time that proper diligence would have discovered it, then no notice need be proven; but if the defect arise otherwise than from faulty structure, or the direct act of said authorities or other agents, and be a recent defect, it is generally necessary to show that the town authorities had knowledge thereof a sufficient time before the injury to have, by reasonable diligence, repaired it, or that they were negligently ignorant of it." Curry v. Town of Mannington, 23 W. Va. 14. The embankment was on the side of the road, in a remote part of the city. The authorities had the right to leave it there as a barrier, provided it was not dangerous to the lawful users of the road. There is no evidence tending to show that it was dangerous when left there, but the evidence shows it afterwards became dangerous by reason of the excavations made under it. The street commissioner, when he found that persons were removing the sand and gravel, posted a notice warning them from so doing, not because he regarded it dangerous, but to prevent it from being destroyed as a barrier,—the city's property. After this notice was put up (how long, the evidence does not disclose, nor how long before the accident, except as a mere conjecture) a man by the name of Brown, without the knowledge or permission of the authorities, and against the express notice posted as aforesaid, did further excavating of sand and gravel, and hauled it away, which, presumably, was the excavating that rendered the bank dangerous. It is not shown that the authorities had notice of this last excavating. On the contrary, it appears from the evidence that they had no notice of it. The witness Brown, for some unexplained reason, is not introduced to show when or by what authority he did the excavating. It is true the street commissioner says he passed along there frequently, but it does not appear that he passed there after Brown had done his work, nor does it appear that there was anything to indicate to him that the embankment was in danger of falling; and none of the plaintiff's witnesses testify that they had any knowledge beforehand of the dangerous character of the embankment that produced the injury, and one of his principal witnesses says: "I considered it dangerous from falling on top. I didn't know it would cave down on them." From this evidence the jury certainly had a right to conclude that the structure was not rendered dangerous by the direct act of the city authorities; that they had no notice of its dangerous character a sufficient time before the injury to have, by reasonable diligence, repaired it; and that they were not negligently ignorant of it. While we might have found a different one, we have no right to disturb their verdict. Their decision is supreme and final. But, even if this did not conclude us, there is another question that would; and that is the jury were taken to view the spot and its surroundings. The counsel deemed it necessary. What effect this had on the minds of the jury in reaching a conclusion, this court cannot say, but that it was material cannot be doubted. The remoteness of the place, the situation and character of its surroundings, and the nature and condition of the embankment, would obviously all be taken into consideration in making up a verdict. None of these things are before this court; and the settled rule is that this court will not disturb the finding of a jury unless all the material evidence touching the matter at issue that was considered by the jury is before it, as the case, as presented to the two tribunals, would be materially different.

No instructions were asked, and no points of law raised; and, there having been a fair hearing before an impartial jury, this court is legally powerless to interfere, and the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

MAXWELL v. MILLER et al.

Nov. 18, 1893.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETIES—RIGHTS OF SURETIES.

Where a defaulting, insolvent ex-sheriff, with the proceeds of taxes collected by him, has taken up a large number of county orders, and, instead of having them credited as payments on his arrearage, is engaged in secretly selling and transferring them to various persons, who are trying to collect them again from the county, at the instance of the sureties of such ex-sheriff a court of equity will interfere, and compel the application of such orders to the relief of such sureties.

Appeal from circuit court, Tucker county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

Bill by W. B. Maxwell against M. V. Miller, the county court of Tucker county, and others, for an accounting, an injunction, and for other relief. Plaintiff had decree, and the county court and others appeal. Affirmed.

A. B. Parsons, for appellant county court. Dayton & Dayton, for appellant Tygart's Valley Bank. C. W. Dailey, for appellee.

DENT, J. M. V. Miller was sheriff of Tucker county for the term of office from January 1, 1885, until the 31st of December, 1888, and as such sheriff executed a general bond in the penalty of $30,000, with the plaintiff, W. B. Maxwell, and the defendants William H. Lipscomb, Levi Lipscomb, E. Harper, John R. Loughery, and John J. Adams as sureties therein; and also a school bond in the penalty of $10,000, with the defendants A. C. Minear and John H. Deetz as his sureties. Said Miller was also made trustee in a deed of trust executed by Robert Geisberger, and as such was required to execute a bond in the penalty of $5,000, which he did, with the plaintiff, W. B. Maxwell, and A. C. Minear and F. S. Pifer as sureties. At the expiration of his term of office the settlements of said Miller showed he was in arrear to the state to the amount of $1,470.46, to the county court of Tucker county to the amount of $3,207.49, to the several boards of education to the amount of $2,256.98; aggregating the sum of $6,934.46. As trustee for said Geisberger he owed the sum of $2,305.21. To secure these several sums he executed a deed of trust or assignment of certain property to A. J. Valentine, trustee, but insufficient in amount to pay them. Maxwell, Harper, and Adams, sureties, were compelled to pay the amount due the state, and Maxwell paid the amount due on the Geisberger trust deed. The county court and the several boards of education instituted suits at law against said sureties, and the latter recovered judgments. The amount of money realized by said trustee Valentine was in his hands undischarged. And so matters stood, when one of the sureties, the plaintiff in this suit, learned that said Miller had a large amount of county and district orders, taken up by him with the public funds in his hands, which he was selling and transferring to other parties, who were trying to get payment of them out of the present sheriff, A. H. Bonnielield. He immediately filed his bill setting up these facts, and asking the aid of the court in compelling said Miller to disclose the amount of these orders, and to whom he had transferred them, and asking that they be applied as a credit on the indebtedness of said Miller to the county, and also praying that A. H. Bonnielield, sheriff, be enjoined from paying any of them. He afterwards filed two amended bills, making the assignees of certain of these orders parties, and praying that the county court be stayed in its suit at law until these matters could be properly heard and determined, and that Miller be stayed from dismissing certain certiorari proceedings instituted by him to obtain credit for certain judgments against the county which had been paid by him. The circuit court heard all these matters, overruled the demurrers to the bills, refused to dissolve the injunction on motion of the county court, referred the case to a commissioner, and on the coming in of his report overruled the exceptions to it, confirmed it, and entered a decree settling the various matters between the parties, ascertained the balance due the county court, which was promptly paid by the sureties.

The county court, the only appellant, relies on the following assignment of errors. to wit: "First. The court erred in overruling petitioner's demurrer to said bill and amended bills. Second. The court erred in not dissolving said injunction at the November term, upon petitioner's motion. Third. The court erred in referring said cause to said commissioner. Fourth. The court erred in overruling said petitioner's exceptions, and each of them, to said commissioner's report, as well as overruling the numerous exceptions of other defendants in said action. Fifth. The court erred in pronouncing said final decree in said cause at the March term, 1892, in this: that said court had no right to offset the demands of the county court with orders or drafts aggregating the sum of $1,031.31, with interest thereon to the amount of $168.62, aggregating in all $1,199.93, claimed to have been taken up by M. V. Miller, late sheriff, after his term of office had expired, and after his last final settlement, which said orders and drafts had been indorsed by A. H. Bonnielield, sheriff of Tucker county, the agent of the county court. Said circuit court had no right to decree against petitioner $244.09, the judgment in behalf of Miller and other parties in the mandamus case lately pending in the supreme court of Miller against said county court, and also in certain certiorari proceedings pending on the law side of the circuit court of Tucker county, which certioraris were improvidently awarded, two years having elapsed before the same were granted, and more. Sixth. The court erred in decreeing costs against petitioner. Seventh. The court erred in ousting the jurisdiction of the law side of said court in the notice against Miller and his sureties and the certiorari proceedings by assuming jurisdiction of them in chancery in this cause, without authority of law, and by enjoining further proceedings there at law. Eighth. The court erred in entering said decree either for or against any of the boards of education of said county, none of said boards being parties to said suit. And your petitioner, by its attorney, further represents that said orders and decrees are in other respects uncertain, informal, and erroneous."

As to the eighth assignment of error, there is nothing in it. The boards of education were not necessary parties, because no relief was sought against them. The seventh is unfounded, because the court had the right to control the proceedings at law for the furtherance of justice. The sixth there is nothing in, as the defeated defendant, who interposes a vigorous defense unnecessarily, should pay the costs. Fifth. The county court ought not to complain on account of its own just orders being credited up against the amount due it, even though held by other parties by assignment, if the latter make no complaint. As to the $244.09 aggregate of judgments against the county, paid by Miller, the record evidence shows that this credit was proper, and no effort was made to defeat it. The fourth assignment is but a repetition of the matters contained in the other assignments, and raises the same points for consideration. The determination of them determines it. Third. The court having jurisdiction of the cause, and there being matters of account to be settled, the cause was properly referred to a commissioner. Second. The temporary injunction, so far as the county court was concerned, was probably unnecessary, as the circuit court could on mere motion stay the proceedings on the law side thereof until the chancery cause could be heard; but the county court was not injured by it, and has, therefore, no cause of complaint. First. The real merits of this controversy arise on the demurrers to the bills, and that is whether they stated a sufficient cause for equitable jurisdiction, or unlawfully interfered with the appellant in the discharge of its legal duties, contrary to public policy and public justice. The bills to invoke equity jurisdiction charge in substance that a defaulting insolvent ex-sheriff, for whom the plaintiff is surety, has taken up with the public funds a large number of county orders, and, instead of having them applied on his indebtedness to the county, is engaged in secretly selling and transferring them, to the prejudice of the rights of his sureties, to third parties, who are seeking to collect them off of the county again, the number, amounts, and purchasers of which orders are unknown to the plaintiff; and he therefore asks the assistance of the court to ascertain these matters, to stop the illegal transfer of the orders, and to have them credited as payments on the balance due the county. This certainly states a good cause for equitable interference. It has been well said: "There are a great variety of circumstances where equity steps in for the reason that the law affords no adequate redress, and prevents impending or threatened injury;" that a "surety occupies ground peculiar to his own relation, and is favored in both legal and equitable tribunals;" that "there is no adequate remedy at law, when the principal debtor is insolvent, by which his effects and credits in the hands of others can be made to be applied for the benefit of the surety." McConnell v. Scott, 15 Ohio, 403; Brandt, Sur. §§ 223, 224. The appellant, being the creditor, was a proper party to any bill filed by the surety regarding the indebtedness; and the court, having once assumed jurisdiction for any just cause, should proceed to do exact justice between the parties. The staying of the proceedings at law could not injure the appellant, and was not done for the purpose of delay, but to secure as credit payments made by the principal, who was endeavoring to secretly dispose of them, and get them beyond the reach of his sureties, and securing some of his sureties to the prejudice of others. If the sureties as well as the principal had been insolvent, the appellant would have been insisting that these orders, having once been taken up by the sheriff with public funds, were paid in the manner the law contemplates their payment, and therefore should be canceled. The sureties have the right to make the same claim, and the appellant has no reason to complain; on the contrary, it should have joined hands with the sureties, and endeavored to save them harmless, as far as possible, instead of lending its aid to sustain the wrongful designs of the defaulter.

M. V. Miller, the delinquent sheriff, does not appeal, but filed a brief, relying on the same errors substantially as the appellant. Having answered one, answers both, but, in addition, he adds: "It is insisted that the defendant Miller assigned for the benefit of his said sureties property more than amply sufficient to pay all of his indebtedness mentioned in said assignment, and especially his indebtedness to the state, county, and various boards of education of the various districts of the said county. If the plaintiff and the said trustee had gone on and sold the said property, and applied the proceeds thereof according to the stipulation of the said trust deed, without the costs of this suit, the proceeds would have been sufficient to pay said indebtedness." No evidence to show anything of this kind was before the commissioner, and therefore it is useless to make such allegations here. The court is governed by the matters shown in the record, and not by assertions made in the briefs, unsustained by evidence. There appears to have been a full and careful hearing of this cause in the circuit court, and the decree entered is fair and just to the appellant. It is therefore affirmed, with costs.

STURM v. CHALFANT et al.

Nov. 18, 1893.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE OF FRAUD.

1. J. C., an insolvent debtor, against whom litigation has been pending for years in the name of A. P. Sturm and others, being aware that an account is pending before a commissioner to ascertain the rents and profits due from said J. C. to said Sturm for a certain tract of land for which he is claiming a decree against said J. C., and on the day after said commissioner's report was returned and filed in the clerk's office, finding that over $4,000 was due from said J. C. to said Sturm, said J. C. acknowledges and delivers for record a deed for 127 acres of land to his son-in-law, in trust for a weak-minded son, which deed is dated nearly two years anterior to its acknowledgment and delivery for record, and leaves the grantor with insufficient means to pay his indebtedness, which deed purports to have been made in consideration of $4,000 cash in hand, but which the evidence shows was made in consideration of an account claimed by said son against his father for work done on the farm which was barred by the statute of limitations, and for the proceeds of cattle and sheep sold by said son, when the evidence fails to show he owned such stock, and it appears that several of the items charged in said account which is claimed to have been made out at the date of the deed in 1884 did not accrue, if they ever did, until some time thereafter, and when it is shown by the testimony of the wife of said son that he had no means with which to make the payment of the purchase money, and by other witnesses that he declared that his only means of paying for the land was out of the timber which had been expressly reserved in the deed by the grantor for the use of the farm, and by said son's own frequent declarations that, if he had $900 out of the land he had put into it, the land might go, these circumstances clearly indicate that the pretended consideration was fraudulent, and that said conveyance was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiff, Sturm.

2. Fraud may be deduced from deceptive assertions, and from incidents and circumstances evincing a fraudulent intent.

3. Fraud is to be legally inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case, when those facts and circumstances are of such a character as to lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that the conveyance was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud existing or future creditors.

4. The fact that the account for labor sought to be charged as a part of the consideration for the tract of land was barred by the statute of limitations at the date of the deed is a circumstance which may be weighed in determining the bona fides of the transaction.

Appeal from circuit court, Harrison county; J. M. Hagans, Judge.

Action in the nature of a creditors' bill by Asbury P. Sturm against John Chalfant, Jeremiah M. Chalfant, and Melville B. Bartlett, trustee. Plaintiff had decree, and defendant Jeremiah M. Chalfant appeals. Affirmed.

B. Wilson, (J. Philip Clifford and M. G. Sperry, of counsel,) for appellant. John Bassel, for appellee.

ENGLISH, P. On the first Monday in April, 1890, Asbury P. Sturm filed his bill in equity in the circuit court of Harrison county against John Chalfant, Jeremiah M. Chalfant, and Melville B. Bartlett, trustee, in which he alleged that on the 1st day of October, 1886, he obtained a judgment or decree in said court in the case of himself against Solomon S. Fleming, John Chalfant, and others, against said John Chalfant for the sum of $4,083.16, with interest thereon from said date and costs; that said sum was adjudged to him against said Chalfant on account of rents of two certain tracts of land of complainant held by said Chalfant from the year 1805 to the year 1885, inclusive, the suit in which said decree was rendered having been instituted by complainant in the year 1873; that no part of said decree has been paid by said Chalfant or by any one for him, the whole thereof remaining unsatisfied; that said Chalfant was insolvent, and had no other property than that therein mentioned to which complainant could resort for satisfaction of said decree; that on the 1st day of April, 1884, said John Chalfant, by deed of that date, conveyed to one Melville B. Bartlett, who was then and still is the son-in-law of said Chalfant, a tract of land containing 127 acres, lying on the waters of Robinson's run, in said county, in trust for the use and benefit of Jeremiah M. Chalfant, a son of said grantor, which conveyance was made by said John Chalfant with the intent on his part, and with the like intent upon the part of said Melville B. Bartlett and Jeremiah M. Chalfant, to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said John Chalfant, and especially the plaintiff; that while said deed upon its face recites that it was made in consideration of the sum of $4,000 in hand paid by said Jeremiah, it was utterly untrue, and that nothing was paid by him, for the reason that he had no money or means wherewith to make such a purchase; that said conveyance was wholly without consideration deemed valuable in law, and was made on the part of said John Chalfant and Jeremiah M. Chalfant to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said John,—and he prayed that said deed might be canceled as to the plaintiff's decree, and said land be sold to satisfy the same. The defendant Jeremiah M. Chalfant appeared at rules, and demurred to the plaintiff's bill, and on the 27th day of May, 1890, said demurrer was considered by the court and overruled, and thereupon the defendant Jeremiah M. Chalfant filed his separate answer to the plaintiff's bill, putting in issue the material allegations of the plaintiff's bill, denying that in the purchase of the 127-acre tract of land in the bill mentioned there was any intent on his part, or on the part of any one connected with the transaction, to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor of said John Chalfant, and claiming that there was no intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiff in the collection of his said decree. He also alleged that he paid to John Chalfant a full and adequate consideration for said land, amounting in the aggregate to $4,000 at least, as recited in said deed, which amount he claims he had been accumulating since he was 21 years of age. He also denied that he had any knowledge of any such intent on the part of any of his codefendants. The bill was taken for confessed as to the defendants John Chalfant and Melville B. Bartlett, trustee. Depositions were taken and filed by both plaintiff and defendants, and on the 28th day of January, 1892, a decree was rendered in the cause, holding the deed made by the defendant John Chalfant to said Bartlett as trustee for Jeremiah M. Chalfant, dated April 1, 1884, fraudulent as to the decree of the plaintiff against the said John Chalfant for $4,083.16, with interest from October 1, 1886; and it was decreed that as to said debt the said deed be set aside and annulled, and directed that, unless the said debt was paid to the plaintiff in 30 days, a commissioner thereby appointed should advertise and sell said 127-acre tract of land upon the terms therein prescribed; and from this decree the said Jeremiah M. Chalfant applied for and obtained this appeal.

The action of the circuit court in holding said deed of conveyance from John Chalfant to M. B. Bartlett, trustee, for Jeremiah M. Chalfant, to be fraudulent, and setting the same aside and decreeing it to be sold in satisfaction of plaintiff's decree, is assigned as error. Now, in order that we may seek satisfactorily the intent which actuated the defendant John Chalfant in making this conveyance, it is necessary that we should inquire into the business relations which existed between the parties anterior to the transaction, and to the circumstances which surrounded them about the time the conveyance was made. The allegation that the defendant John Chalfant was insolvent, and had no property other than the said 127 acres of land, is taken for confessed as to the defendants John Chalfant and M. B. Bartlett, and is not denied by Jeremiah M. Chalfant in his answer. When we look to the pleadings and exhibits filed therewith, it is apparent that the litigation between the plaintiff and defendant which resulted in the decree sought to be enforced in this case against the land conveyed as above stated by John Chalfant is not of recent origin. It appears that during the war, and while said Sturm was beyond the lines, judgments were rendered against him, and his lands were decreed to be sold in satisfaction thereof, and at the sales of said lands by special commissioners said John Chalfant became the purchaser, and remained in possession thereof for many years; and that on the 25th day of January, 1885, in the chancery cause of Sturm v. Fleming et al., a decree was rendered declaring void as to the plaintiff said judgments, and also the decrees under which said lands were sold, restoring said Sturm to the possession of said lands, and directing a commissioner to ascertain and report what amount, if any, had been paid upon said judgments out of the proceeds of the tract of land sold under the decree of said court in the case of Lucas against the plaintiff Sturm and others, together with any other matters that said commissioner might deem pertinent, or that might be required by the parties thereto. On the 4th day of January, 1886, said commissioner returned and filed in the clerk's office his report in pursuance of said decree, in which he ascertains, among other things, the amount due A. P. Sturm from John Chalfant to be $4,157.08; and when we refer to the deed made by John Chalfant to Melville B. Bartlett, trustee, for the use of the defendant Jeremiah M. Chalfant, a copy of which is filed with the defendant's answer, it appears that although said deed bears date on the 1st day of April, 1884, it was not acknowledged and admitted to record until the 5th day of January, 1886, the next day after said commissioner's report was returned and filed in the clerk's office. The said John Chalfant, in his answer to plaintiff's bill, claims that he considered it impossible that rents and profits could be recovered in that suit without a specific claim being made therefor, and that the result reached by the commissioner could not be reasonably anticipated by said John Chalfant. Be this, however, as it may, the result had been reached by the commissioner, and more than $4,000 had been ascertained to be due from said John Chalfant to A. P. Sturm. The report had been filed in the clerk's office, and said Chalfant, being a party to the suit, actively engaged in its defense, had the opportunity of knowing, and it must be presumed did know, the result of said commissioner's investigations before he acknowledged said deed on the 5th day of January, 1886, to his son-in-law Melville B. Bartlett, trustee, for his son Jeremiah M. Chalfant. The claim that said John Chalfant could not reasonably expect the result reached by the commissioner is sought to be supported by the fact that there was no specific prayer in the petition for the opening and rehearing of said decree, that the rents, issues, and profits of the tract of land sold under said former decree might be ascertained, and that the plaintiff might recover the amount when so ascertained from the said John Chalfant; but when we look to the concluding portion of said petition we find that said A. P. Sturm prayed that the decrees therein made and complained of might be set aside and reversed, and that restitution of said property or of the proceeds of the sale thereof be made, and for such other further and general relief as the nature of his cause required, and as to equity appertained, etc. And while said John Chalfant himself might not have known what results might have been reached under that and under a decree subsequently rendered in the cause in pursuance thereof, which, among other things, directed the commissioner to ascertain and report any other matters that the said commissioner might deem pertinent or that might be required by the parties thereto, yet the eminent counsel who represented him knew that in the case of Humphrey v. Foster, 13 Grat. 653, the court of appeals of Virginia held that "on a bill claiming a share of a tract of land, and asking for a partition and for general relief, the plaintiff's right to partition being established under the prayer for general relief, there may be a decree for an account of rents and profits;" and in the case of Pickens' Ex'rs v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 907, this court has recently announced the same doctrine by holding that the general rule is that if the facts be contained in the bill, though the specific relief asked for be refused, the proper relief which these facts call for under the law may be given under the prayer for general relief.

In searching, however, for the motive that actuated said John Chalfant, it is sufficient to notice the fact that the result was reached by the commissioner which charged him with an indebtedness to A. P. Sturm of over $4,000, and it is a coincidence which should have peculiar weight in determining the question presented for our consideration in this case, that, on the day following, said Chalfant should convey this valuable tract of land to his son-in-law in trust for his weak-minded son, leaving himself utterly insolvent; and, although he had other lands Solomon Chalfant states in his testimony they were insufficient to pay his debts. In determining the bona fides of this conveyance, let us next look to the testimony, and see whether the purchase money was paid by said Jeremiah Chalfant in the manner he states it was "in stock, in work, in money, like any other man would." The appellant, Jeremiah Chalfant, arrived at his majority in 1872. On the 12th day of March, 1879, he was married, and, according to the testimony of Solomon Chalfant, said Jeremiah moved by himself, and kept house and was doing business for himself. This statement of facts, if it be taken as true, left but seven years in which said Jeremiah Chalfant, by his labor at $20 per month, was to accumulate the sum of $3,162.77, the item charged in the account of said Jeremiah against said John Chalfant. Now, if it be conceded that he worked constantly for seven years at $20 per month, it is not reasonable to suppose that after deducting his expenses he saved more than half that sum, or $10 per month, or $120 per annum, which, with interest added, beginning with the end of each year until he ceased to labor, and then on the aggregate for five years, would only amount to about $1,300; and the fact that this account for labor was barred by the statute of limitations in 1884, when the deed is dated, may be weighed as a circumstance indicative of fraud in determining the bona fides of the transaction. When we look at the other items of the account, and examine the proof, it appears exceedingly indefinite. Solomon Chalfant says the first item is a cow and three heifers, $90.55. "I know that he had that stock, and that my father got them;" how, or for what consideration, he does not state. As to the next item, three three year old steers, $112.50, the same witness says, "I know father got the proceeds of these cattle;" and he makes the same statement as to one yearling steer, $20; one heifer, $25.25; one lot of sheep, $68.75; one lot of cattle, $103; 1 lot of sheep, $75. Now, all of these statements must be considered in connection with the fact that said Jeremiah Chalfant was living on his father's farm, and laboring for him by the day or month, and are not inconsistent with the fact that the stock spoken of was raised on the farm, and that John Chalfant was of right entitled to the proceeds. It is true, David Slocum, the father-in-law of said Jeremiah, states that said Jeremiah paid him $225 for his father, John Chalfant, which was in the shape of a note on said John Chalfant; but the same witness, when asked, "Have you any reason to believe that Jeremiah M. Chalfant had any money of amount to pay on land at all?" answered, "I don't think he had any considerable amount. I am pretty sure that he had not. I give this as my opinion." The same witness states that before this deed was made he went and looked at the land, and said John Chalfant proposed that, if he would buy half of the land for his daughter, (Jeremiah's wife,) he would give the other half to said Jeremiah; that said John gave an option to some one on the coal underlying it which defeated the trade; and said Slocum further states that about the time he was talking about trading for the land (and this was after Jeremiah's marriage with his daughter) he heard Jeremiah say that his father owed him about $600 for the work he had done, and heard him say that frequently. In connection with this testimony, when we turn to the testimony of Annette Chalfant, (the wife of said Jeremiah,) when asked to state what money or property said Jeremiah had at the time of their marriage, answered: "So far as money was concerned, he had none that I know of. He had two horses; he claimed two horses. After we were married awhile, his father gave him a cow. The other household goods we had to commence housekeeping were given me by my father, David Slocum, except a little that Sol. Chalfant let my husband have." She also stated that said Jeremiah paid some money on said land, but he did not pay any $4,000. All the money they had when they moved from Robinson's run onto that land was about $500. That they had considerable expenses for work and other things on the land, and she did not know just how much he did pay, but it was somewhere between two and six hundred dollars. She did not think the amount paid on the land exceeded $600, etc. That she heard her husband say that after he was 21 years of age he went to visit relations in Pennsylvania, and remained with them some time,—she thought, a year or two. She further states that after they moved upon said 127-acre tract he laid up no money; that he did not make more than his expenses; that his property was levied on for about $60 of taxes, and she had heard him say often that, if he had the four, five, or six hundred dollars he had in the land out of it, the land might go. In answer to the second question asked the witness Barton Drummond, he states that Jeremiah told him he had five or six hundred dollars in said land, and, if he had it out, the land might go. Again, the witness James B. Fowler states that he had a conversation with said Jeremiah in reference to removing the timber from the 127-acre tract of land, in which said Jeremiah told him that what he was to get for the timber was to help pay for the land, and that he expected to pay for the land from the profits on what he could get off of it. In that connection he understood Mr. Chalfant to say he had not paid a dollar on it; that his father-in-law was to pay about one-half of it,—and in the conversation he asked witness whether Mr. Sturm could sell his land, and informed him that Mr. Sturm was proceeding against his father to recover judgment. And again, the witness C. L. Crile stated, in answer to question 5, that said Jeremiah Chalfant told him that if he had the money out that he had paid into the place it might go; and, in answer to the sixth question, that he told him at the time he came there he had put $600 in it and his own work, and had paid some little more on it. Samson Harbert also testifies that he heard said Jeremiah Chalfant say to Melville Bartlett, "You know damn well I can't pay for the land unless I sell the timber," when said Bartlett had forbidden him from cutting the timber on the land.

Now, the question is whether these statements and admissions made by said Jeremiah Chalfant as to the amount he had paid on said tract of land can be reconciled with his statement made by him in answer to the second question asked him, as to whether he paid the consideration of $4,000 recited in the deed for said land, where he says, "I did pay the $4,000. I paid it in stock, in work, in money, like any other man would,"—and he filed with his answer a statement of the items showing how it had been paid. Among those items is found a judgment of C. J. Lang against John Chalfant, which Solomon H. Chalfant had at some time paid for John Chalfant, when it does not appear. At the foot of said account a memorandum is found, as follows: "Settled by deed for 127 acres of land dated April 1, 1884;" and a copy of a note which reads as follows: "Mannington, West Va., April 1, 1884. $1,304.78. One, two, three, and four — after date, in equal payments, I promise to pay to the order of S. H. Chalfant thirteen hundred and four seventy-eight hundredths dollars, with interest at 6 per cent. Value received. Negotiable and payable at the — Bank of —, W. Va. No. 172. Due —. [Signed] J. M. Chalfant." Now, although said account was made up and purports to have been settled as of April 1, 1884, by a deed of that date for said 127 acres of land, yet Solomon H. Chalfant, in answer to the fourth question, testifies that he did not intend to say that account showed the items at the 1st of April, 1884, but that it showed the items of account about the time the deed was made, because he knew that part of said account was paid after the 1st day of April, 1884. Which of said items were so paid he does not state, but it is apparent that on the 1st of April, 1884, an account was made up of items, a portion of which had never been paid, for the purpose of showing a fraudulent consideration for said 127-acre tract of land; and it is just as apparent that on the 5th day of January, 1886, this same false account was used in pretended settlement for the purchase money of said land. As to the C. J. Lang judgment, which forms one of the principal items of said account, it is difficult to reconcile the statement of Jeremiah Chalfant, when asked how he came to owe S. H. Chalfant for said judgment, when he says: "I borrowed it; I borrowed the money of him;" and again, in answer to the seventeenth question on cross-examination, in speaking of said Lang judgment, he replies: "I borrowed the money to pay that of my brother S. H. Chalfant, and gave him my note for it when I paid for this land, when I took possession;" and in answer to the next question he states that he got the money before he got the deed for said tract of land,—with the fact that the note above copied, which was exhibited with said Jeremiah Chalfant's deposition, for $1,304.78, the exact amount of the Lang judgment, was executed on April 1, 1884, to S. H. Chalfant, and when it appears from the statement of Solomon H. Chalfant, made in answer to question 27, that the last of said judgment, as he was inclined to think, was paid by witness in 1881, at John Gifford's sale on Mudlick; and, if this be true, it cannot be true, as stated by Jeremiah Chalfant, that he borrowed the money from his brother S. H. Chalfant, and paid it to C. J. Lang, or that he borrowed the money to pay said judgment within two or three months before the 1st of April, 1884, the date of the deed. It is apparent, then, that no part of said Lang judgment was paid by Jeremiah M. Chalfant, and while it may be regarded as a brotherly act on the part of said S. H. Chalfant, some three or four years after he paid said judgment for his father, (under what arrangement for reimbursement does not appear,) that he should hand over this judgment to his brother Jeremiah with its accrued interest, to enable him to pay the purchase money for this tract of land the next day after the commissioner had ascertained a liability in favor of A. P. Sturm, yet it cannot be regarded as honest, fair dealing with the creditor of John Chalfant, when taken in connection with the surrounding circumstances, and the repeated declarations of said Jeremiah that he only had about $600 in the land, and if he had that out it might go, and his further declaration that his only means of paying for the land was the sale of the timber. We can but regard this account, or the principal part of it, to have been manufactured for the occasion by his ingenious brother, S. H. Chalfant, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud said A. P. Sturm, a creditor of said John Chalfant, and to assist said John Chalfant in committing a fraud against said A. P. Sturm by making said conveyance to said trustee. The circumstances above detailed, and the question asked the witness J. B. Fowler as to whether A. P. Sturm could sell his land, and his statement to said Fowler that said Sturm was proceeding against his father to obtain a judgment, shows clearly that he had notice of, and was seeking to avoid, the Sturm debt. It is held by this court in the case of Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206, that, "where the facts and circumstances connected with a fraudulent conveyance necessarily establish complicity of the grantee in the fraudulent intent, it is not necessary by direct proof to show notice of such intent to the grantee." In the case of Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 88, (paragraph 9 of the syllabus,) this court held that "fraud is to be legally inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case, when those facts and circumstances are of such a character as to lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that the conveyance was made with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud existing or future creditors." So, also, in Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717, this court held that "the proposition that 'fraud must be proved and not presumed' is to be understood as only affirming that a contract, honest and lawful on its face, must be treated as such until it is shown to be otherwise by evidence, positive or circumstantial;" and also in the same case: "Fraud may be deduced from deceptive assertions, and from incidents and circumstances evincing a fraudulent intent." See, also, Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639, in which case this court held that "If an insolvent grantor, who is justly indebted to a creditor in a small amount, convey to him all his property, or the greater portion thereof, in satisfaction of his debt, for a nominal consideration falsely recited in the deed, and claimed by the grantee to have been in hand paid, equal in value to that of the property conveyed, but largely in excess of the debt actually due such creditor, and he accept the same, such deed is void as to the other creditors of the grantor." Now, when we apply these principles to the discordant and utterly irreconcilable statements made by the parties most intimately connected with the transactions, and take into consideration the near relationship of said parties, the effort to place considerable items in the account of Jeremiah Chalfant against his father in 1884, which S. H. Chalfant, who made out the account, admits did not exist until long afterwards, and combine these facts with the further fact that the circuit court, which was near to, and perhaps well acquainted with, the witnesses who testified and the parties to the transaction, has found that said deed was fraudulent as to the decree of plaintiff, A. P. Sturm, and when we further consider the manifest difficulty the evidence presents on its face to a reconciliation with honesty and fair dealing on the part of those concerned in the transactions complained of, we must conclude that the decree complained of was not erroneous in holding, as it did, said deed fraudulent as to the plaintiff's decree. The decree complained of is therefore affirmed, with costs.

CRUMLISH'S ADMR v. CENTRAL IMP. CO. et al.

Dec. 6, 1893.)

PAYMENT BY STRANGER — RIGHTS OF PAYOR — EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT — FOREIGN JUDGMENT — FOREIGN CORPORATIONS — RIGHTS OF OFFICERS — LAW OF PLACE.

1. A stranger, paying the debt of another without request, cannot sustain an action at law against such other unless he has in some way ratified such payment.

2. Such payment by a stranger, if accepted as such by the creditor, discharges the debt, so far as the creditor is concerned, and also as to the debtor, if he ratify it.

3. A stranger who pays a debt without request by the debtor, when his payment is not ratified by the debtor, may bring a suit in equity praying relief in the alternative; that is, that if the debtor do not ratify such payment the debt may be enforced in his favor, as its equitable assignee, or, if so ratified, that he be decreed repayment of the amount paid for the use of the debtor.

4. The stranger, when he pays the debt of another, may take an assignment of it from the creditor, and enforce the debt against the debtor; and if, when he pays, the creditor agrees to assign him the debt, though no assignment in writing be made, the stranger will be, in equity, regarded as the equitable assignee of the debt, and the transaction will be regarded equivalent to a purchase of the debt.

5. It is well settled that the judgment of a sister state must be accorded in this state the same faith and credit it has in the state where rendered.

6. When such judgment is sought to be enforced here, our courts may inquire into the jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment, and if it appear that the court had not jurisdiction the judgment will be held void here; otherwise, it is valid and binding in this state.

7. A judgment in a court of a sister state, without service of process in any manner, and without appearance, will be held void in this state.

8. Under the law of Pennsylvania, the president of a private corporation created by that state cannot recover from the corporation upon a quantum meruit for official services there rendered, in the absence of any by-law or resolution of the directors allowing compensation. Nor can one who is treasurer and secretary of the corporation, and a stockholder and director, recover on a quantum meruit for his official services without such by-law or resolution. The law of that state raises no promise on the part of the corporation in such cases, and the question whether, in such cases, there is an implied promise, depends on the law of that state.

9. The obligation of a supposed contract made and to be performed in another state is tested by its law.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county. Action by H. H. Crumlish's administrator against the Central Improvement Company. To a fund for the payment of defendant's creditors, B. K. Jamison & Co. and others filed claims; and, from the decree rendered, Jamison & Co. and others appeal. Affirmed in part.

Barton & Boyd, U. L. Boyce, Wm. M. Stewart, Jr., and Geo. Baylor, for appellants. Frank P. Clark, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. In a suit in equity in the circuit court of Jefferson county of H. H. Crumlish's administrator v. The Central Improvement Company there was a fund for payment of creditors of that company, and then for division among stockholders. A commissioner was directed to ascertain the debts having right to be paid out of the fund. Various demands were presented before the commissioner for audit as debts; and among them was a judgment in favor of B. K. Jamison & Co. against the Central Improvement Company, an account in favor of R. D. Barclay against same company, and an account in favor of John P. Green against same, which three demands having been disallowed by the commissioner and court, Jamison & Co. and Barclay and Green united in this appeal.

The Jamison Judgment.

A judgment was rendered in 1877 in the court of common pleas, No. 3, of the county of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of B. K. Jamison & Co. against the Central Improvement Company for $25,168.85 and costs, and afterwards, in 1890, upon a writ of scire facias upon this judgment, another judgment was rendered by the same court for $26,378.08 and costs. Jamison & Co. and U. L. Boyce and the Fidelity Insurance Trust & Safe-Deposit Company each claimed the right to said judgment before the commissioner; and the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, being a large owner of stock in the Central Improvement Company, pleaded payment. Jamison & Co. and Boyce having excepted to the report, and appealed, what we have to decide is whether they have any cause to complain of the refusal to allow them the judgment.

Jamison & Co., by process on said first judgment, had attached $250,000 of second mortgage bonds and $175,000 of income bonds of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, held in the hands of a third party for the benefit of the Central Improvement Company. The Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company desiring to make a contract for its completion, and make another mortgage to raise money to complete it, and desiring to cancel and retire the bonds so attached, Boyce, the vice president of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, opened negotiations with Jamison & Co. looking to securing those bonds, and Jamison & Co. expressed their willingness to take any step which would get their money advanced to the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company represented by said judgment. Boyce made an arrangement with E. W. Clark & Co., bankers,—who were financial agents of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, and wished to obtain said bonds for cancellation, out of the way of a new series,—to furnish the money. Thereupon, on July 12, 1879, Jamison & Co. and E. W. Clark & Co. made a written agreement providing that Jamison & Co. should transfer to Clark & Co. all their right, title, and interest to the bonds aforesaid, as also some others; that Jamison & Co. should proceed to get judgment upon their attachments, levy on said securities, and sell the same so as to pass title to the purchaser; that, if they should not be bid up to a figure above Jamison & Co.'s judgment, Jamison & Co. were to buy them at the sale, and transfer them to Clark & Co.; that "the said E. W. Clark & Co. are to pay B. K. Jamison & Co. the amount of their judgment against the Central Improvement Company, with interest and costs, the amount of said judgment being $25,168.85, with interest from July 10, 1877, the said payment to be made as follows: $10,000 in cash, and the balance in the notes of E. W. Clark & Co., drawn in equal amounts," etc. The said bonds were sold to Jamison & Co. under said attachments at $11,000, which was credited on the judgment, and Jamison & Co. transferred the bonds to Clark & Co., and received from them the $10,000 cash, and their notes in full payment of the amount of said judgment. By reason of said agreement the commissioner reports the judgment as paid "so far as claimant is concerned;" that is, Jamison & Co. The object of Jamison & Co. being only to get their money, and the language of the writing being, "the said E. W. Clark & Co. are to pay [note the word "pay"] B. K. Jamison & Co. the amount of their judgment," these facts lead me to the conclusion that the parties contemplated it as a payment, so far as Jamison & Co. were concerned. But this payment was made by a stranger, without request or ratification by the debtor, so far as appears. Does it satisfy the judgment? As it seems to me, the answer depends upon whether you mean as to the creditor or debtor. It remains a correct legal proposition, to the present, that one man who is under no obligation to pay the debt of another cannot, without his request, officiously pay that other's debt, and charge him with it. If he ratify such payment, the debt is discharged, and he becomes liable to the stranger for money paid to his use. If he refuse to ratify it, he dis-claims the payment, and the debt stands unpaid as to him, (the debtor.) In the one case the stranger would, at law, sue the debtor for money paid to his use; in the other, enforce the debt in the creditor's name for his use. If his payment is not ratified, he may go into equity, praying that if the debtor ratify it he may be decreed to repay him, or, if he do not ratify the payment, that the debt be treated as unpaid, as between him and the debtor, and that it be enforced in his favor, as an equitable assignee. Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625; Moore v. Ligon, 22 W. Va. 292; Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 133.

But how as to the creditor? When a stranger pays him the debt of a third party, without request of such third party, as in this case, can the creditor say the debt is yet unsolved, and enforce it against the debtor, as is attempted to be done by Jamison & Co.? Can he accept such payment, and say, because it was made by a stranger, it is no payment? Is his acceptance not an estoppel by conduct in pais, as to him? There has been a difference of opinion in this matter. The old English case of Grymes v. Blofield, Cro. Eliz. 541, (decided in Elizabeth's reign,) is the parent of the cases holding that even the creditor accepting payment from a stranger may repudiate, and still enforce his demand as unpaid. That case is said to have decided that a plea of accord and satisfaction by a stranger is not good, while Rolle, Abr. 471, (condition F.) says it was decided just the other way. Denman, C. J., questioned its authority in Thurman v. Wild, 39 E. C. L. 145. Opposite holding has been made in England in Hawshaw v. Rawlings, 1 Strange, 24. Its authority is questioned at the close of the opinion by Cresswell, J., in Jones v. Broadhurst, 67 E. C. L. 197, as contrary to an ancient decision in 86 Hen. VI., and against reason and justice. Parke, B., seemed to think it law in Simpson v. Eggington, 10 Exch. 845. It was followed in Edgcombe v. Rodd, 5 East, 294, and Stark v. Thompson, 3 T. B. Mon. 296. Lord Coke held the satisfaction good. Co. Litt. 206b, 207a. See 5 Rob. Pr. (New,) 884; 7 Rob. Pr. (New,) 548. The cases of Goodwin v. Cremer, 83 E. C. L. 757, and Kemp v. Balls, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 498, seem to hold that payment must be made by a third person as agent for and on account of debtor, with his assent or ratification. In New York, old cases held this doctrine. Glow v. Borst, 6 Johns. 37; Bleakley v. White, 4 Paige, 654. But later, in Wellington v. Kelly, 84 N. Y. 543, Andrews, J., said that the old cases were doubtful, but had not been overruled, but it was not necessary in that case to say whether it should longer be regarded as law, and the syllabus makes a quære on the point. It was held in Harrison v. Hicks, 1 Port. (Ala.) 423, that "payment of a debt, though made by one not a party to the contract, and though the assent of the debtor to the payment does not appear, is still the extinguishment of the demand." The opinion says that, as between the person paying and him for whose benefit it was paid, a question might arise whether it was voluntary, which would depend on circumstances of previous request, or subsequent, express or implied. This doctrine is sustained by Martin v. Quinn, 37 Cal. 55; Gray v. Herman, 75 Wis. 453, 44 N. W. 248; Cain v. Bryant, 12 Helsk. 45; Leavitt v. Morrow, 6 Ohio St. 71; Webster v. Wyser, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 184; Harvey v. Tama Co., 53 Iowa, 228, 5 N. W. 130. Bish. Cont. § 211, holds that, if payment "be accepted by creditor in discharge of debt, it has that effect." See 2 Whart. Cont. § 1008.

It seems utterly unjust, and repugnant to reason, that a creditor accepting payment from a stranger, of the third person's debt, should be allowed to maintain an action against the debtor pleading and thereby ratifying such payment, on the technical theory that he is a stranger to the contract. He has himself, for this purpose, allowed him to make himself a quasi party. He consents to treat him so, so far as payment is concerned. To regard the debt paid, so far as he is concerned, is but to hold him to the result of his own act. Shall he collect the debt again? Then, can the stranger recover back? What matters it to the creditor who pays? As the supreme courts of Wisconsin and Ohio, in cases above cited, said, this doctrine is against common sense and justice. It does not at all infringe the rule that one cannot at law, make another his debtor, without request to allow such payment to satisfy the debt as to the creditor; and this court, while recognizing the rule that one cannot officiously pay the debt of another, and sue him at law, unless he has ratified it, by allowing the stranger to go into equity and get repayment, makes the payment, in the eyes of a court of equity, operate to satisfy the debtor, and render the stranger a creditor of the debtor. Neely v. Jones, supra. I know that in Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, it is held that, "if a payment by a stranger is neither ratified nor authorized by the debtor, it will not be held to be a discharge of the debt;" but, though this point is general, that was a case of the stranger seeking to make the debtor repay, and the case and opinion intended to lay down the rule at law only as between the stranger paying and the debtor, not as between the creditor and debtor. So I hold that, when Jamison & Co. received the money for this judgment, it operated as a discharge as to them.

But it is said that such payment, though a payment, is inoperative, because, after it was made, a writ of scire facias issued to revive the judgment, and a judgment was rendered thereon that the plaintiffs recover their debt, and thus such payment amounts to nothing. This judgment is not, as with us, according to common law, a simple award of execution, but a judgment quod recuperet, as in an original action. Such a judgment would be void here by some authorities. 2 Bart. Law Pr. 1031; Lavell v. McCurdy, 77 Va. 763. I have entertained doubts whether it would be void, as distinguished from voidable, though I have not fully examined the subject. But in Pennsylvania a scire facias is a substitute for an action of debt, and the judgment is properly quod recuperet. Duff v. Wynkoop, 74 Pa. St. 300; 1 Black, Judgm. § 499. We must, under the United States constitution, give it the same faith and credit here which it has there. Black v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 780; Gilchrist v. Oil Land Co., 21 W. Va. 115; Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167. If it were a valid judgment, it would nullify the payment above spoken of, on familiar principles. Such would be its effect in Pennsylvania, and it is to its effect there that we look. Custer v. Detterer, 3 Watts & S. 28; McVeagh v. Little, 7 Pa. St. 279; Potter v. Hartnett, 148 Pa. St. 15, 23 Atl. 1007; Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481. But while a judgment of a sister state, if valid, is given here the same effect it has there, yet, consistently with this rule, we can look into its record to see whether it had jurisdiction of the defendant; and, looking into the record of this judgment, we find no service whatever of the scire facias, personal or by return of nihil, or any appearance, and therefore the judgment is void, as would be a judgment here, for that cause. Gilchrist v. Oil Land Co., 21 W. Va. 115; Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457; Knowles v. Gaslight, etc., Co., 19 Wall. 88; Guthrie v. Lowry, 84 Pa. St. 533; Steel v. Smith, 7 Watts & S. 447; Noble v. Oil Co., 79 Pa. St. 354; Story, Const. § 1297; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 548. This is a good reason for disallowing the judgment.

Argument is made that, in Pennsylvania, judgment upon two returns of nihil habet is good, and as effective as a return of scire facias. As I find no return whatever of the scire facias, I have not so closely examined this question as otherwise I would have done. There seems some authority for the proposition that two returns of nihil will sustain a judgment in personam. Compheer v. Anawalt, 2 Watts, 490. The cases cited by counsel (Warder v. Tainter, 4 Watts, 274; Taylor v. Young, 71 Pa. St. 85; Colley v. Latimer, 5 Serg. & R. 211; Edmonson v. Nichols, 22 Pa. St. 74; Chambers v. Carson, 2 Whart. 9; Hartman v. Ogborn, 54 Pa. St. 120; Allison v. Rankin, 7 Serg. & R. 269) were cases of scire facias sur mortgage, as to which the rule of judgment of foreclosure upon two nihils seems established in Pennsylvania. The practice of taking judgment on two returns of nihil is properly, perhaps, confined to scire facias upon a mortgage. The case of Compheer v. Anawalt, supra, says, in the opinion, that it is liable to abuse; and I notice, in the case of Custer v. Detterer, 3 Watts & S. 28, (decided only seven years after the former case,) the opinion says that, as a judgment on scire facias is a new judgment, two returns of nihil will not do. I should doubt as to personal judgments. But though such a judgment would be good in Pennsylvania, it does not follow that it would be good here, for the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Steel v. Smith, 7 Watts & S. 447, in an opinion delivered by the eminent Chief Justice Gibson, held that a judgment of Louisiana on attachment of property and summons served on one of the joint owners, which by the Louisiana law was good as to all defendants, was a nullity in the courts of Pennsylvania as to parties not served. The only Pennsylvania statute to which I have access provides that service of process on a corporation shall be on its president or other chief officer, cashier, treasurer, secretary, or chief clerk. No service of any kind appears here. For this reason the judgment was properly disallowed. No plea of nul tiel record was necessary. It is a chancery suit, and concerns the audit of debts on a reference before a master; and, when the judgment creditors presented the judgment, adverse interests could contest it on any legal ground without formal plea. I remark that it was not this scire facias judgment which was considered on the appeal reported in 33 W. Va. 761, 11 S. E. 58, but the original one. But let us suppose that the judgments were valid, and that, treating Clark & Co.'s payment simply as a payment, it would be cut off by the judgment so the payment could not now be pleaded. What then? Jamison & Co. are no longer its owners, but Clark & Co. are assignees of it, and they are not asking its allowance, but Jamison & Co. are claiming for their own use. When Clark & Co. paid it, the law implied that Jamison & Co. would assign it to them, and, without assignment actual, a court of equity treats them as its equitable owners. The case of Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, in point 4, clearly supports this position. Boyce's evidence, uncontradicted, is that Jamison & Co. in the agreement they made with him, promised to assign the judgment to him, and their attorney did transmit him a copy of the judgment. Now, if this evidence is not forbidden from consideration by the execution of the writing between Clark & Co. and Jamison & Co., then either Clark & Co. or Boyce have an express agreement to assign, tantamount to an assignment, and, though no actual assignment be made, equity regards it as an equitable assignment; and this is the letter of point 5 in Neely v. Jones, supra, and Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 135. It may be with some force said that, as between Jamison & Co. and Boyce, the assignment should go to Boyce, and then there would be no ground for saying that the oral agreement to assign would be excluded by the writing. In fact, Jamison & Co. admit in their petition for the appeal that they assigned it to Boyce; so this court ought not to decree it to them. Thus, I think, law excludes the allowance of this judgment to Jamison & Co., and this conclusion accords with the real justice of the case. Jamison & Co. only wanted the amount they advanced to the Central Improvement Company. They got it. They do not deny, but admit, they received all the company owed them, but they want now to hold it as collateral for a merely personal loan to Boyce.

And now as to U. L. Boyce's claim to said Jamison & Co.'s judgment. He has no title to it, to his own use. Any shadow of interest that may be vested in him was for other use than his own: First. He negotiated for the acquirement of it from Jamison & Co. for Clark & Co. as financial agents of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, whose vice president Boyce was at that very time, and in whose service and interest he acted touching this judgment. Clark & Co. paid for the judgment, and took the contract in their name. Boyce explicitly says as a witness, and in a letter to Doran, that he was to get assignment of it, and transfer it to the parties furnishing the money, and that Clark & Co. furnished the money. Never was a resulting trust more plainly established than that any show of technical right in Boyce was for the use of Clark & Co. And then, further, consider that Clark & Co. were agents of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, and Boyce its vice president. And that he was acting for it, he does not deny, but admits; and a receipt to his company for hotel bill on the trip to acquire the judgment confirms it.

Thus we conclude that neither Jamison & Co. nor Boyce have right to this judgment. It is urged by counsel that the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, in a certain answer, stated that a balance was due on this judgment, treating it thus as not paid. If it belonged to the Fidelity Company, under its mortgage, could the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, by this admission, prejudice the right of that company? It could not. But, if the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company owned it, it could say, with entire consistency with the fact that Clark & Co. had paid it as regards Jamison & Co., that a balance was due on it from the Central Improvement Company, as it had never paid it. As assignee, it could say that the Central Improvement Company yet owed a balance.

Barclay's and Green's Demands.

Barclay filed before the commissioner, and asked payment out of the fund, an account for $10,000, for services for 4 years and 1 month as president of the Central Improvement Company, and Green filed an account for $6,250 for 2½ years' services as treasurer and secretary. Both these gentlemen were stockholders and directors of the company. The commissioner rejected the claims. The Central Improvement Company is a Pennsylvania corporation, having its habitat and chief office there, and there the services were performed and were to be paid for, if at all; and, if any contract were implied by law to pay compensation for service of those officers of the corporation, it would be a Pennsylvania contract. Hence, the law of that state operates upon the case specially. We must therefore see whether the law of Pennsylvania would raise an implied contract to pay for such service. Klinck v. Price, 4 W. Va. 4; Stevens v. Brown, 20 W. Va. 450; Heflebower v. Detrich, 27 W. Va. 16. There was no express contract to pay for such services, and, if there can be any recovery therefor, it must be on the theory that the law raises an implied promise to pay for the service. I think the case of Kilpatrick v. Bridge Co., 49 Pa. St. 118, uncontrollably decides against the allowance of these accounts. It holds that "corporations are not liable on a quantum meruit for services performed by their officers. There must be an express contract for compensation, or there can be no recovery." In that case, Sersill claimed for service as president, and Kilpatrick as treasurer, as in this case, and the court held that they could not recover. The court said: "The salary or compensation of corporate officers is usually fixed by a by-law or by a resolution either of the directors or stockholders, but, where no salary has been fixed, none can be recovered. Corporate offices are usually filled by the chief promoters of the corporation, whose interests in the stock or in other incidental advantages is supposed to be a motive for executing the duties of the office without compensation, and this presumption prevails until overcome by an express prearrangement of salary. Hence, we held in Association v. Stonemetz, 29 Pa. St. 534, as a general principle, that a director of a corporation, elected to serve without compensation, could not recover in an action against the company for services rendered in that capacity, though a subsequent resolution of the board, agreeing to pay him for past services, was shown. * * * And the rule is just as applicable to presidents and treasurers and other officers as to directors. * * * It is well the law is so. Corporate officers have ample opportunities to adjust and fix their compensation before they render service, and no great mischief is likely to result from compelling them to do so. But if, on the other hand, actions are to be maintained by corporate officers for services, which, however faithful and valuable, were not rendered on the foot of an express contract, there would be no limitation to corporate liabilities, and stockholders would be devoured by officers." In the later case of Martindale v. Wilson-Cass Co., 134 Pa. St. 348, 19 Atl. 680, it is held: "The general rule on the subject of compensation to the directors of a private corporation is that they are not entitled to compensation for official services unless it is provided for in the corporate charter or by-laws. In the absence of such provision, a director or president of such corporation cannot recover pay for official services, when no agreement for compensation preceded them, no presumption of such agreement arising from their performance." A by-law of the Central Improvement Company provided that the directors "shall have power to appoint all other officers or agents of the company, and fix the compensation and define the duties of all their officers or agents," but the directors never fixed any compensation. This was a mere power, given to be exercised or not, as the directors might choose, and does not itself give compensation; and the very fact that the directors, having this power, never exercised it, negatives the idea that any compensation was intended. In re Bolt & Iron Co., 14 Ont. 211. So it is clear that, under the Pennsylvania law, these officers can recover nothing.

Though not necessary to go further, my examination has led me to the conclusion that the decisions in Pennsylvania reflect the true rule applicable nearly everywhere, in denying pay without express provision or contract, not only to the president, but a treasurer or secretary, when stockholders or directors. The authorities have led my mind to the conclusion that the law raises no implied promise to pay compensation to directors, president, or vice president of a private corporation, in the absence of provision in by-law or order of the directors. They are trustees charged with the funds, and cannot recover on a quantum meruit. Gridley v. Railroad Co., 71 Ill. 200; Cheeney v. Same, 68 Ill. 570; Association v. Meredith, 49 Md. 389; Bank v. Elliott, 55 Iowa, 104, 7 N. W. 470; Sawyer v. Bank, 6 Allen, 207; Railroad Co. v. Ketchum, 27 Conn. 180; Ogden v. Murray, 39 N. Y. 202; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 208. And that if the treasurer, secretary, or other executive officer be a stockholder or director, no such promise is raised by law in his favor; but, if not, then the law does raise such promise, and presume that pay was intended, from the fact of appointment, and he may get compensation. Smith v. Railroad Co., 102 N. Y. 190, 6 N. E. 397; Holder v. Railroad Co., 71 Ill. 106, 109; Cheeney v. Railroad Co., 68 Ill. 570; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 200; note to Grundy v. Coal Co., 23 Amer. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 616, 9 S. W. 414. Of course, I do not here speak of the mere employes of corporations, they being entitled to compensation. Therefore, so much of the decree of March 2, 1891, as rejects the claim of B. K. Jamison & Co. and U. L. Boyce to said judgment, and the said accounts of R. D. Barclay and John P. Green, is affirmed.

HAYS, Commissioner of School Lands, v. CAMDEN'S HEIRS et al.
Nov. 4, 1893.)

JURISDICTION OF INFANTS—ACTION BY COMMISSIONER OF SCHOOL LANDS.

A commissioner of school lands under chapter 105 of the Code (Ed. 1887) files his petition in the circuit court for the sale of certain lands as forfeited, and, in pursuance of the statute, mentions an infant as one of the claimants of said tracts of land, who appears by his guardian and next friend, and excepts to the proceeding on the ground, among others, that he should have had a guardian ad litem assigned him. Held error to enter any decree thereafter in the suit affecting his interest without having first appointed a guardian ad litem to such infant.

Appeal from circuit court, Gilmer county; V. S. Armstrong, Judge.

Action by Samuel A. Hays, commissioner of school lands, against Flora Camden and others. There was decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

William E. Lively, for appellants.

HOLT, J. This is a proceeding instituted in the circuit court of Gilmer county on the 1st day of May, 1890, under chapter 105 of the Code, (Ed. 1887,) by Samuel A. Hays, commissioner of school lands of said county, against defendants, Flora Camden and others, to ascertain whether certain lands were forfeited for nonentry, and, if forfeited, for the sale thereof. Such proceedings were had that on the 5th day of February, 1891, the court pronounced a decree in the cause holding certain tracts therein specified to be forfeited to the state, and directing their sale, and from this decree defendants, Flora Camden and others, obtained this appeal.

The first statute on the subject authorizing and directing such proceeding on the part of the commissioner of school lands is found in chapter 105 of the Code of 1868, which took effect on the 1st day of April, 1869. The present constitution took effect from and after the 12th day of August, 1872, and, as touching this subject, see article 13, Const. By the act of 18th November, 1873, chapter 105 of the Code was amended and re-enacted. In McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, it was held that proceedings under the act of 18th November, 1873, (chapter 134, Acts 1872-73,) were not judicial proceedings in the sense that they involved litigation between contesting parties, but were in their character administrative, being simply a mode prescribed by the state for the sale of lands which are her absolute property, and in the sale of which she alone is interested; and that the former owner, having no interest in the land or the proceeds of sale, is not entitled to be a party to the proceedings for the sale in the circuit court.

This led to the amendment and re-enactment of the law into the statute as found in chapter 105 of the Code of 1887, by the Act of 25th March, 1882. By this act it is made the duty of such commissioner to ascertain and report the status in reference to forfeiture of all lands in his county, and, in order to have the same determined judicially, it is made his duty to file his petition in the circuit court praying that the same may be sold for the benefit of the school fund, giving the court all the information he has as to location, quantity, probable value, etc., together with all the facts at his command in relation to the title, the claimant or claimants thereof, and their residence, if known, and, if not known, that fact shall be stated, stating when, how, and in whose name, and for what, it was forfeited to the state. Upon the filing of the petition the court shall direct a summons to be issued by the clerk against the claimants, if any, named in the petition, the person or persons in whose name the same was forfeited, and all unknown parties claiming the land, or any part of them, named in the petition, requiring them to appear before a commissioner in chancery of the court at a time and place to be named therein, and show cause, if any they can, why the said lands shall not be sold for the benefit of the school fund. The summons shall be served on each of the persons named therein if they can be found in the county, and as to such of them as cannot be found in the county, and such unknown parties, it shall be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in some newspaper printed in the county, and, if there be no such newspaper printed in the county, then in some newspaper of general circulation therein, etc.; and such publication and posting, when so made or done, shall be equivalent to the personal service of the said summons on all the parties named therein upon whom it has not been served personally, and on all the said unknown parties. The said court shall also, by a proper decree, refer the said petition to a commissioner in chancery thereof, with instructions to inquire into and report upon the matter therein contained, and such others as said court may think proper to direct, and particularly to inquire and report as to the amount of taxes and interest due and unpaid on each tract, etc. But said commissioner shall not proceed under said decree until the summons aforesaid shall have been served as required by the next preceding section, etc.; and as soon as his report is completed he shall file the same in the clerk's office of the circuit court, and the commissioner of school lands, and any other person interested therein, may file exceptions thereto at any time after such filing in the clerk's office, and before the hearing therein. If there be no exception to such report, or if there be exceptions thereto which are overruled, the court shall confirm the same, and decree a sale of the lands, or any part of them, therein mentioned, which are subject to sale for the benefit of the school fund, upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem right. When exceptions are filed to such report which are sustained in whole or in part, the same proceedings shall be had in the case as if it were a suit in chancery. The sale shall be made, conducted, and reported, and such proceedings shall be had therein, in all respects as if such sale had been under a decree in a suit in chancery, etc. Chapter 105 was again amended and re-enacted by the act of 12th March, 1891, (see Acts 1891, p. 281, and chapter 105, Code, Ed. 1891,) and this again was amended and re-enacted by act of 23d February, 1893, (see Acts 1893, p. 57,) which is the present law on the subject; but this proceeding was under chapter 105 in the Code of 1887. The circuit court, by decree entered on the 9th day of June, 1890, referred these matters to Commissioner O. C. McQuain, requiring the summons to be issued and served in pursuance of chapter 105 of the Code of 1887, the substance of which has already been given. The summons was issued on the 1st day of July, 1890, requiring the parties therein named to appear before Commissioner McQuain at the law office of Collins & McQuain, in the town of Glenville, on the 4th day of August, 1890. But it has on it no return of service of any kind or in any way. It does not appear to have gone into the hands of any one for service, or to have been published or posted. But the commissioner published his notice of the time and place of executing the order of reference. Under this notice the commissioner completed his report, which was filed in the clerk's office on the 30th day of August, 1890. On this report G. D. Camden, Flora Camden, and Sprigg D. Camden, by their attorney, indorsed various exceptions to said report on September 1, 1890, with various papers exhibited as part of such exceptions. On the 3d day of October, 1890, these defendants, by William E. Lively, Esq., their attorney, filed all these papers, naming them, a petition to redeem, etc., all of which were ordered to be noted as filed, including said exceptions to Commissioner McQuain's report.

"The defendants, G. D. Camden, Flora Camden, and Sprigg D. Camden, infant, by J. N. Camden, his guardian and next friend, appear to the petition filed against them by the commissioner aforesaid, and the order of the court requiring them to appear before a commissioner in chancery of said court, and except to the petition and report, to the order of the court, and all the proceedings had and taken in the above matter, as follows, to wit: Exception 1: As to the order of the court referring the matter to a commissioner in chancery, the report of S. A.

Hays, commissioner of school lands, should not have been referred to a commissioner in chancery, because it failed to show the local situation, quantity, probable value of each tract, lot, or parcel, and part of a tract, of land therein mentioned, together with all the facts at his command in relation to the title to the same, and to each tract, lot, part, or parcel thereof, the claimant or claimants thereof, and their residence, and stating, also, how and when and in whose name every such tract and parcel and part of a tract or lot was forfeited to the state. Exception 2: That no summons was ever issued by the clerk of the circuit court against the claimants of the lands named in the petition of the commissioner of school lands to appear before the commissioner in chancery of the court at a place and time therein named, to show cause why the said lands should not be sold for the benefit of the school fund, notwithstanding the said parties named in the petition are residents of the state of W. Va., and reside in Clarksburg, Harrison county, and in Parkersburg, Wood county, and well known to the commissioner of school lands. Exception 3: That no summons was served on each of the persons named therein, nor published at least once in each week for four successive weeks in some newspaper printed in the county of Gilmer, nor posted at the front door of the courthouse of Gilmer county, nor at some public place in each magisterial district in said county, as required by the statute. Exception 4: That the lands of the parties named in the petition are not, and never were, forfeited for the nonpayment of taxes thereon at any time, and especially the years claimed by the commissioner of school lands. Exception 5: That Minter Bailey, G. D. Camden, and R. P. Camden owned jointly and were seised in fee simple of large and valuable tracts of land situate on Sand Fork and its tributaries, in Lewis and Gilmer counties; that the larger and most valuable portions of these lands were situated in the county of Lewis, and were by them placed on the assessor's land books of Lewis county in the name of Camden, Bailey & Camden, and were properly assessed with taxes and levies thereon from the formation of the state of W. Va. in 1863, to 1890, inclusive. Exception 6: That they have paid all taxes, levies, and assessments against these lands for each and every year, and no part or parcel of the same have ever been returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon during the entire period of time alleged by the commissioner. [Note. In 1863 these tracts of land were on the assessor's land books in Lewis county in the name of Camden, Bailey & Camden, and remained thereon in their name until 1877, when partition of the lands was made, and each party was assessed separately with the lands allotted to them, that is to say, for the purposes of partition these large tracts of land were subdivided and laid off in small tracts, and the partition was made by dividing the number of small tracts of land for convenience sake, and to prevent any of the small tracts of land from being dropped from the assessor's books, or the assessor, from negligence, inattention, or mistake, omitting to place those numerous and great number of small tracts of land upon the land books, the parties, with the approval of the assessor, divided the whole number of all the large tracts combined into three parts, and placed on the land books in Lewis county the evidence of the fact as to their act.] Exception 7: That the large tracts of land on the assessor's books in Lewis county, as placed there in 1877, and down to the present time, include the several tracts of land reported by the commissioner of school lands for Gilmer county, and could have been ascertained by him by due diligence and examination therein. Exception 8: That the lands reported and mentioned in the petition, if forfeited at all, must have been forfeited in the name of Camden, Bailey and Camden from 1863 to 1877, inclusive, and from 1877 to 1890, inclusive, in the name of Flora Camden and Sprigg D. Camden, heirs at law of R. P. Camden, dec'd, and G. D. Camden. Exception 9: That Sprigg D. Camden is a minor under the age of 21 years, and should have had a guardian ad litem assigned him before taking proof or sending these proceedings to a commissioner in chancery to settle. None knew this better than the commissioner of school lands for Gilmer county. Exception 10: That the claim of the commissioner of school lands for Gilmer county, if any he has, (acting for and on behalf of the state of W. Va.,) for all the years preceding the five years before filing his petition, is barred by the statute of limitations, and is a stale demand, and should be so declared by a court of conscience and equity. Exception 11: That there is no evidence in the proceedings showing that the lands reported by the commissioner aforesaid are in Gilmer county, and are detached or separated from the large tracts of land belonging to R. P. Camden's heirs or G. D. Camden in Lewis county, but, on the contrary, the map and plat of the Camden, Bailey and Camden lands, which is asked to be read and inspected in connection with this exception, shows conclusively that the lands reported by the commissioner form a part of and help to make up the large tracts of land that are on, and have ever been on, the land books in Lewis county. Exception 12: That the tract of 72 acres, lot No. 222, reported by the commissioner of school lands, was long since sold to Marshall Wiant, of Gilmer county, by Wm. E. Lively, commissioner, appointed by this court in the chancery case of Sprigg D. Camden, by I. N. Camden, his next friend, against Flora

Camden and others, now pending and undetermined in this court, and asked to be inspected when this case is heard, and said Wiant has paid for said land, and been in possession thereof for a number of years, and should be a party to these proceedings. Exception 13: That lot No. 178, containing only 48 acres, instead of 77 a., as reported by the commissioner aforesaid, was sold several years ago to one Charles Collins, of Gilmer county, by said Lively, commissioner as aforesaid, in the chancery cause aforesaid, by a decree of this court as aforesaid, and said Collins is, and has been for a long time, in possession of said land, and should be a party to these proceedings; that it is the duty of the court to protect the purchasers of land, and remove from the same any cloud to the title, if by so doing it does not operate a great hardship and loss to others. Exception 14: That, if any of the Camden, Bailey and Camden lands are sought to be subjected to forfeiture, it was the duty of the commissioner of school lands to have the heirs of M. Bailey, dec'd, living in Lewis county, summoned before the commissioner in chancery, so as to give them an opportunity to defend themselves. Exception 15: The defendants first named except generally to all actions, orders, publications, reports, petitions, and all proceedings in this case not enumerated or set forth in the exceptions above. If the court should differ with the petitioners in relation to the matter and manner of forfeiture of their lands, then they ask and pray that they be permitted to redeem the same, and pay such sums of money as may be right and due from them on the same. G. D. Camden. Flora Camden. Sprigg D. Camden, by Wm. E. Lively, Atty."

On the 7th day of October, 1890, the cause came on to be heard on the report of Commissioner McQuain, the exceptions thereto, and the motion of G. D. Camden and others, supported by affidavit, for continuance; and Commissioner McQuain, without further notice, the parties agreeing thereto, was directed to ascertain and report certain other facts charging the omitted lands with taxes from the year 1869, down to and including the year 1890, and directing other parties to be brought in by summons; and in execution of this order of reference Commissioner McQuain filed his report No. 2 on 31st December, 1890, and Flora Camden and Sprigg Camden filed thereto the same exceptions they had filed to the original report, and John S. Withers, prosecuting attorney, filed exceptions on behalf of the state. On the 5th February, 1891, the cause came on again to be heard on the report of S. A. Hays, commissioner of school lands, filed 1st May, 1890, the report of Commissioner McQuain filed 30th August, 1890, and the evidence therein referred to and accompanying the same, the exceptions indorsed thereon by G. D. Camden, Flora Camden, and Sprigg D. Camden, by William E. Lively, Esq., attorney, and referred to, marked "Exhibit B" upon the report of Commissioner McQuain filed 31st December, 1890, the state's exception, and exception of Flora Camden and others, and was argued by counsel, upon consideration whereof the court held the following lots of Flora Camden and Sprigg D. Camden as forfeited and liable to be sold for the county and district taxes properly chargeable thereon and the costs of this proceeding, or its proportionate share, viz.: Lot No. 249, of 45 acres; lot No. 221, of 107 acres; lot No. 222, of 72 acres; lot No. 248, of 150 acres; lot No. 138, of 93 acres; lot No. 143, of 37½ acres; the residue of lots No. 178 and No. 182, of 48 acres,—and directed the sale thereof on the terms prescribed by the statute. The record in this case shows that these are parts of a large tract of land of 30,970 acres lying on the waters of the Sand Fork of the Little Kanawha river, for the most part in the county of Lewis, but several thousand acres in the county of Gilmer; that it was owned jointly by R. P. Camden, Minter Bailey, and G. D. Camden, who at an early day had it, for purposes of sale, laid off into lots ranging from 100 to 200 acres, and numbered. Of these they had sold quite a number, amounting to some 8,000 acres, leaving the rest unsold. Minter Bailey departed this life, and his children and heirs at law in 1869, in the circuit court of Lewis county, brought a suit in chancery against R. P. Camden and G. D. Camden for partition. At the May term, 1869, there was a decree for partition, and commissioners were appointed to make it. Under this the commissioners allotted and assigned a certain number of lots to defendant R. P. Camden, a certain number to Minter Bailey's heirs, the plaintiffs, and a certain number to G. D. Camden, and by decree of 13th November, 1869, the partition as reported was confirmed, and thenceforth the parties held their respective lots and parts in severalty. The record does not disclose that the heirs of Minter Bailey, deceased, have now or have had any interest, legal or equitable, in these lots of land, since the decree of partition in 1869, but, if they had, they could intervene and bring their rights before the court, for the summons is general as well as special. The constitution of 1872 (section 6, art. 13) made it the duty of every owner of land to have it entered on the land books of the county in which it, or a part of it, is situated, and cause himself to be charged with the taxes thereon, and pay the same; but if it contained less than 1,000 acres it was not thereby forfeited for omission, for the reason that small tracts are often left off by the fault of others than the owner, and without his fault or even knowledge; but tracts of 1,000 acres or more were forfeited for omission for five years or more, as therein prescribed. It was made the duty of various officers to see that all lands were properly charged. Section 39, c. 117, approved 9th April, 1873, (see Acts 1872-73, p. 330,) after repeating section 6 of article 18 of constitution of 1872, proceeds as follows: "And when for any five successive years after the passage of this act, the owner of any tract or lot of land, less in quantity than 1,000 acres, shall not have been charged on such books with state tax on said land, then by operation of law and without any proceedings therefor the land shall be forfeited and the title thereto vested in the state," etc., (see Act 1869; section 34, c. 31, Code 1868;) and the same provision was reenacted in section 39, c. 130, of the act of 24th March, 1882, (see Acts 1882, p. 387;) and the same law is found in section 39, c. 31, Code, (Ed. 1887,) p. 226; and this was the law under which these proceedings were instituted. These lands seem to lie wholly in the county of Gilmer, and have never been on the land books of that county, as they should have been, since the year 1869, when the partition of the large tract was made, and would seem, therefore, to be forfeited. The state tax and state school tax thereon having been paid in the county of Lewis, the court, in ascertaining the amount necessary to be paid to redeem them, did not charge these taxes, but only the Gilmer county and district taxes, and of this the adult appellant cannot complain; but she owns jointly with the infant, and no opinion is intended to be hereby given as to the forfeiture of the land of either. For the various statutes on the subject, see Hutchinson's Land Titles, especially chapter 7, p. 187. For proceedings under the act of 18th November, 1873, (Acts 1872-73, p. 449,) see McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561. For proceedings under the acts of 30th March, 1887, and 15th March, 1888, see Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214. The citation or summons directed to be issued in this proceeding under chapter 105 of Code of 1887, "to show cause, if any they can, why the said lands shall not be sold for the benefit of the school fund," is, in its substance and essential part, exactly like the writ of scire facias, like the rule to show cause in equity, or like the monition or citation in admiralty. In all courts it is judicial process, and although at common law a writ, yet it is also an original action, to which the defendant may plead; it is, in fact, our oldest original action. See Glanville, who wrote 1187, (see translation by Beames.) See, also, same thing in Bracton, who wrote in 1263, (see Master of Rolls' Ed. 1883.) The essential part of it is still used in all stages of a suit from mesne process at the commencement, through all intermediary stages and collateral proceedings, down to final fruition of the judgment or decree. The regular form of proceeding in this case would have been for the defendants named, or any intervener to have answered the summons or citation according to the practice in equity of answering or showing cause against orders or rules, such as rules against purchaser of land under decree, (see Sand. Eq. 558,) or rule against a party in possession to show cause why he should not turn over the possession of the land to the purchaser, etc. These parties did not appear until after Commissioner McQuain had completed and filed his report. On the 3d day of October, 1890, these parties, viz. G. D. Camden, Flora Camden, and Sprigg D. Camden, infant, by J. N. Camden, his guardian and next friend, appeared to the petition filed against them, and to the order of the court requiring them to appear before the commissioner in chancery of said court. In this answer to this summons to show cause, etc., they make 15 points of objection to the petition of S. A. Hays, commissioner of school lands, to the order of reference, the service of the summons, and to the report of Commissioner McQuain, concluding as follows: "If the court should differ with the petitioners in relation to the matter and manner of the forfeiture of their lands, then they ask and pray that they be permitted to redeem the same, and pay such sums of money as may be right and due from them on the same;" and with it they file as exhibits parts of the record of the suit of partition, a map of the land with all the subdivisions, 275 in number, showing quantity, location, to whom assigned, from which it appears that the lots in question lie wholly in the county of Gilmer; also, a certificate showing that all taxes have been paid in Lewis county from 1869 to date, (1891;) that Sprigg D. Camden is a minor under the age of 21 years, and should have had a guardian ad litem assigned before taking proof, etc.; and that none knew the infancy of said defendant better than the commissioner of school lands of Gilmer county."

This brings us to the only point in the case, as far as I can see. The whole scope and tenor of chapter 105 shows it to be a proceeding in chancery, as well as its express language, "the same proceedings shall be had as if it were a suit in chancery." Code 1887, c. 105, § 8. Under section 13, c. 125, Code 1887, it was the duty of the court to have appointed a guardian ad litem to the infant defendant, not because the court was selling the land of the infant, or of any strict construction in this case, but because the law requires it; and so it has been held in many cases, (see McDonald v. McDonald, 3 W. Va. 676; Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 199; Myers v. Myers, 6 W. Va. 369; Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1; Hart v. Hart, 31 W. Va. 688, 8 S. E. 562;) especially as the guardian, as next friend, appeared and suggested such infancy, and virtually asked such appointment. Under such circumstances it would have been done, and would be error not to do, in any court, as far as I know. See Ben. Adm. p. 421, rule 140, where the proceeding is in rem, in personam, or both, as in this case, in which court the pleadings are said to be simple and untechnical. Neither does this record show that the summons was ever served specially or generally on any party in any way, by copy delivered or published or posted. It is true that the record shows the publication of Commissioner McQuain's notice, but not of the summons; and section 6 of chapter 103 says: "But such commissioner [in chancery] shall not proceed under said decree until the summons aforesaid shall have been served as required by the next preceding section." This is also made ground of exception in the petition of defendants, among others, by the next friend of the infant; and although waived by the adults, as shown by the order of October 7, 1890, recommitting the report to Commissioner McQuain, it cannot be held to have been waived by the infant, who had no guardian ad litem. His guardian, as the next friend, brought him into court, and virtually petitioned the court to appoint a guardian ad litem to answer and show cause why the land claimed by him should not be sold for the benefit of the school fund. This the court failed to do, for some reason not stated. Such error in so fundamental a matter compels a reversal of the decree of 5th February, 1891, complained of.

CRIM v. TOWN OF PHILIPPI et al.

Nov. 4, 1893.)

ERRONEOUS TAXATION—INJUNCTION—ASSESSMENT.

1. Injunction is the proper remedy to prevent municipal officers from collecting taxes assessed against persons or property which the municipality has no legal right to tax. Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 667.

2. Under the assessment laws of this state, property, and the valuation thereof, as ascertained for municipal assessments, in all municipalities of less population than 10,000 inhabitants, should be identical with the property, and values thereof, ascertained for state, county, and district assessments.

Appeal from circuit court, Barbour county.

Action by Joseph N. B. Crim against the town of Philippi and others to restrain the collection of certain taxes. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the bill, and dissolving the preliminary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dayton & Dayton and William T. Ice, for appellant. J. Hop. Woods, for appellee.

DENT, J. On the 23d day of November, 1892, Joseph N. B. Crim presented his bill of complaint to the Honorable Jos. T. Hoke, judge of the circuit court of Barbour county, setting out that he was a resident of Elk district, and not a resident of the town of Philippi, in Philippi district, in said county; that notwithstanding this fact the municipal authorities of said town had caused him to be assessed, on the assessment books thereof, with two poll taxes, and notes, money, bonds, and choses in action to the amount of $100,000, and levied thereon taxes to the amount of $1,000; had caused a tax receipt to be issued therefor, and placed in the hands of the sergeant, who was proceeding to enforce collection thereof with all due diligence,—and praying an injunction. A temporary injunction was granted. The town and its sergeant appeared, demurred, and filed answers, and depositions were taken. On the 25th day of January, 1893, at Beverly, in Randolph county, on motion of the defendants, Judge Hoke entered a vacation order sustaining the demurrers to the bill, and dissolving the injunction, from which order this appeal was granted.

The only question now properly presented to this court is, did the circuit court judge do right in sustaining the demurrers? By them the allegations of the bill are admitted to be true, but the right of equitable remedy is denied because of plain, adequate legal remedy; that is, that, although the plaintiff and his property were wrongfully assessed and taxed by said town authorities, a court of equity would not interfere to prevent the consummation of the wrong, and confine the municipality within the limits of its taxing power, as prescribed by law, but that the victim of their oppression must suffer himself to be legally robbed, or apply to a court of law for redress of his grievances. This is clearly not the law, for it has been held by this court: "If municipal authorities tax persons or property not legally taxable, or if they exceed the limit prescribed by the statute conferring their power to tax, their action being ultra vires and void, equity has jurisdiction to grant relief." "No other forum can afford such prompt, complete, and adequate relief." The hand of the would-be spoiler is stayed before it seizes its intended booty. Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 671. Of course, it must clearly appear that the municipality is going beyond the line of its authority. The allegations of the bill, if true, plainly show this; and as the circuit court determined the case on demurrer, and not on its merits, this court, in accordance with its established practice, can look no further. It is well, however, that the limit of municipal authority to assess and tax property within its jurisdiction should be clearly defined and understood. Section 49, c. 29, Code, provides that money, credits, and investments shall be listed for taxation in the district where the person resides, and not elsewhere. Section 30, c. 47, as also the charter of the town, limits the right of taxation to personal property within the corporate limits, subject to state and county taxes. Section 100, c. 29, provides that taxes for county, district, and village purposes shall be levied only upon the values of property, ascertained for state purposes, except in cities of more than 10,000 inhabitants. These sections make all municipal assessments, with the exception named, both as to property and its value, subordinate to the assessment for state purposes; and properly so, because the municipality is but a fractional part of the state, and, if there is any property therein that ought to be taxed for municipal purposes, it also ought to be subject to state taxation; so that, if there is any error either as to property or persons, the correction should be first made in the state assessment, and the municipal assessment made to conform to it. This leads to uniformity, and prevents all such discrimination and litigation as we now have before the court; and the burden of tax litigation, if any there be, is taken off of the municipal, and placed on the county and state, authorities, where it properly belongs. The law affords ample remedies to any citizen or taxpayer to have the state assessment books properly corrected, so as to prevent any person or property escaping taxation, and not only that, but also provides a reward for the person informing on the taxpayer who makes a false and insufficient return of his property. We therefore conclude that the circuit judge erred in the order of the 25th January, 1893, in improperly sustaining the demurrer to the bill and dissolving the injunction; and the order is reversed, the demurrers are overruled, the injunction reinstated, and this cause is remanded to said circuit court to be further proceeded with in accordance to this opinion and the rules of equity.

WATSON v. TOWN OF FAIRMONT.

Nov. 11, 1893.)

TAXATION—PRIVATE BANK STOCK—NONRESIDENT HOLDER.

1. Under chapter 54, Acts 1875, shares of bank stock are only assessable to the holder thereof in the district where he resides, and then only in case they have not been included in the assessment of the capital of the bank in the district or municipality in which it does business.

2. If a municipality in which an incorporated bank does business neglects to assess the capital stock of such bank, as it has the legal right to do, it cannot assess a nonresident shareholder with the value of the shares held by him. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Marion county.

Action by Thomas F. Watson against the town of Fairmont to recover taxes paid under protest. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. F. Haymond and Lee P. Watson, (B. L. Butcher, of counsel,) for plaintiff in error. Jas. A. Haggerty and G. M. Alexander, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. In the years 1876, 1877, 1878, and 1879, Thomas F. Watson, a resident of Monongalia county, held 50 shares of stock in the Farmers' Bank of Fairmont, Marion county, of the par value of $5,000.

The capital stock of the bank not being assessed, he listed these shares of stock for taxation under sections 41, 49, c. 54, Acts 1875, in Monongalia county, in the district where he resided for the years aforesaid, and paid all taxes assessed thereon. For the same years, the county assessor of Marion county and the town assessor of Fairmont, having neglected to assess said bank with its capital stock in the manner provided by law, the town authorities of Fairmont assessed the said Watson with the said shares of stock, and compelled him, against his protest, to pay taxes thereon aggregating for the several years the sum of $82.50. On the 11th day of January, 1882, he brought suit before Thomas A. Fleming, a justice of the peace, for the amount of said taxes, and on the 7th day of February, 1882, recovered a judgment for the taxes and interest, then amounting to the sum of $99.37. The town appealed from this judgment, and on the 11th day of March, 1891, the circuit court reversed the judgment of the justice, and dismissed the action, at the plaintiff's costs, from which judgment of dismissal a writ of error was granted.

Chapter 54, § 41, Acts 1875, provides that "every person of full age and sound mind shall list for taxation the property belonging to him, including the shares held by him in any national or other bank in this or any other state, except where the same is listed under the provisions of section 64 of this chapter," etc. Section 49 provides that "every person required by law to list personal property shall list for taxation in the assessment district where he resides the money, credits and investments subject to taxation belonging to himself, or under his charge or control, whether the same or the evidence thereof be in or out of the state; but capital, money, and property, (except real estate,) employed in any trade or business, (other than agriculture,) belonging to a company, whether it be incorporated or not, or to an individual, shall be assessed for taxation in the assessment district where the principal office for transacting the financial concerns pertaining to such trade or business is located; or, if there be no such office, then in the district where the operations are carried on." Section 64 provides: "He [the assessor] shall ascertain from the proper officers or agents of all incorporated companies in his district, the actual value of the capital employed or invested by them in their trade or business, and enter the same in his personal property book." It is plain from these provisions that it was the unquestionable duty of both the county assessor of Marion and the town assessor of Fairmont to have assessed the capital stock of the bank, within the town where it did business; but, having neglected to do so, it became the duty of the shareholder, under the same sections, to list his property for taxation, including his shares in this bank, in the district of his residence. In the one case it would have been assessed to the bank as capital stock. In the other case it is assessed to the shareholder as an investment. If the assessors had done their duty under the law, the shareholder would have been relieved from listing his shares, and paying taxes thereon, in the district of his residence. But, by reason of their neglect of duty, he was compelled by law to take the course he did; and now, having done his legal duty, will the law permit this town assessor to assess him with his shares of stock because they are part of the capital of the bank? Certainly not, because that would make him liable to a double assessment, where he resides and where the business is carried on, because the law does not relieve him from being assessed on his individual shares in the district of his residence except in case the capital of the bank is assessed under said section 64; and, if he permits his individual shares to be assessed in any other district than the one in which he resides, he still must pay taxes there. As in this case he has already paid state, county, and district taxes, including road and poor levies, in the district of his residence, all of which he would have been relieved from, had the assessors discharged their legal duties as aforesaid. It was the law then, and is the law now, that the capital and personal property of a bank should be assessed to it, in its corporate capacity, in the district in which it does business. Bank of Bramwell v. County Court, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. 78. It is also the settled law of this state, both by decision and statute, "that money, credits, securities and investments follow the person." City of Wheeling v. Hawley, 18 W. Va. 476. It is self-evident that, if these shares could not be assessed by the county assessor for state and county purposes, they could not be assessed by the town authorities for municipal purposes. That which cannot be regarded in the county cannot be regarded in the town a fractional part of the county. The provisions of the statutory law are plain upon this question. See, also, the case of Crim v. Town of Philippi, 18 S. E. 466, (decided this term.) The conclusion, therefore, is that the town authorities illegally assessed and collected the taxes sued for in this case off of the plaintiff in error, and that the circuit court erred in holding otherwise, and reversing the judgment of the justice; and the judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, and this court, proceeding to render such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered, doth affirm the judgment of the justice, and doth render judgment in favor of the appellant, Thomas F. Watson, for the sum of $99.37, and the sum of $—, costs before the justice, aggregating the sum of $—, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum until payment, and his costs in this court and in the circuit court expended.

COOK v. DORSEY.

Nov. 11, 1893.)

EQUITABLE PLEADINGS—PARTIES—SUFFICIENCY OF,
HOW QUESTIONED—DEMURRER.

1. A bill in equity may in frame, as to parties, follow the chancery practice used before the enactment of section 37, c. 125, Code, or the form prescribed by that section, but it must do one or the other.

2. If the statutory form be used, persons named in the caption as plaintiff and defendant are such merely from being there named as such; but, if the statutory form be not used, the bill must formally, or in some plain, distinct way make parties plaintiff and defendant; otherwise, it is fatally defective, and a decree upon it would be null.

3. Such a defect in the bill, for want of parties to it, can be taken advantage of, without demurrer, on the hearing, or on appeal unless expressly waived in the lower court.

4. A decree, though null, may be reversed on appeal.

5. A demurrer need not specify causes of demurrer. The general form prescribed by section 28, c. 125, Code, is sufficient.

6. A demurrer may be incorporated in the answer.

7. Special demurrers are abolished by section 28, c. 125, Code.

8. Section 29, c. 125, Code, does not require causes of demurrer to be specified in a written demurrer; but, if none are assigned, it gives court right to ask an assignment of causes ore tenus or written, or, on overruling the demurrer, to state that none were assigned. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Marshall county.

Action by William F. Cook against Thomas J. Dorsey and others to enforce a deed of trust. There was decree for plaintiff, and defendant Dorsey appeals. Reversed.

John J. Jacob, for appellant. J. L. Parkinson and Ewing, Melvin & Riley, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. Suit in equity by Cook against Dorsey and others, decree therein, and appeal by Dorsey. Dorsey filed a written demurrer, and it was overruled. The appellant contends, among other points, that the bill made no parties plaintiff or defendant, and that there was error in overruling his demurrer, and decreeing relief upon such a bill.

A plaintiff in equity may adopt for his bill the frame prescribed by the general chancery practice, or that prescribed by section 37, c. 125, Code, as this statute ought to be construed as cumulative, intended to give an additional, simpler form, and not to destroy a frame of bill good before the statute; but he must conform to one or the other. By equity practice (outside this statute) the bill contained formal parts, one being for the name of the complainant, and it is essential that the complainant be here named. Bart. Ch. Pr. 258; Sand. Eq. 18; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 357; Story, Eq. Pl. § 28. It also contained a part for the prayer that process issue against the defendant to answer.

Here, strictly speaking, the defendant must be named, as it was a rule, commonly received as a test, that no one could be considered a defendant against whom, as one here named, process was not prayed. Story, Eq. Pl. § 44. "They only are parties defendant against whom process is prayed, or who are specifically named and described as defendants." 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 287, and note 4. But as, under the Virginia practice, process issued, not under the prayer, but before the bill was filed, and as section 5, c. 170, Code 1849, required summons to issue to begin a suit, the presence of this part of a bill, and the naming a person as a defendant in it, was not a test of whether he was a defendant; yet certain it is that somewhere, or in some way, in the bill he must be made a defendant, distinctly and clearly, by language not simply mentioning him in narration of facts, but as a person to be acted upon by decree, so as to make it a finality for and against him as an estoppel. Sand. Eq. 32. A prayer, not that process issue, but that certain persons be treated as defendants, and required to answer the bill, would certainly make them defendants. The bill in Virginia practice contained a part specially designed for naming defendants, and required them to be there named, and the prayer for process was that the defendants above named answer. Bart. Ch. Pr. 263. If the Code frame of bill be adopted, plaintiffs and defendants should be named in the caption, which makes them such without prayer for process, or prayer that they be treated as such. In some clear and sufficient way a bill must have parties plaintiff and defendant. A decree can go only on matters properly stated by allegation in the bill, and for or against parties made parties as to such matters by the bill; otherwise, it is no bill. In Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 135, it was held that when the name of the plaintiff is not stated in the bill, as required by chancery practice before the Code, or as authorized by the Code, it is bad on demurrer. So it must be as to a defendant. The case of Hank v. Wilson, 35 W. Va. 36, 13 S. E. 58, is very pointed authority to sustain our holding in this case. No matter that the process names certain parties as defendants. The bill must have parties, for it is the basis on which the structure of the suit rests, and on which the matters of the suit become res judicata. A person may be named in and served with process, yet is not a party unless named in the bill; and not only named in it, but there must be allegations relating to him showing why he is a party, what matters touch and concern him, involved and to be decreed upon in the suit. Chapman v. Railroad Co., 18 W. Va. 184; Moseley v. Cocke, 7 Leigh, 224; McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724; McNutt v. Trogden, 20 W. Va. 471, 2 S. E. 328; Shaffer v. Fetty, 30 W. Va. 248, 4 S. E. 278; Bland v. Stewart, 35 W.

Va. 518, 14 S. E. 215. And though a man be named in the bill simply in narration of its facts, and it contain matter touching him, and he is made a party in the process, yet, if he be not made a party to the bill, it would be bad, and the decree null. In other words, he must be a party to the process, a party to the bill, and the bill must allege matter touching him so far as it seeks to affect him. The observance of these fundamental rules is all-important in practice, as departure from them renders the decree not only erroneous, but generally void, as inspection of cases above cited will show. Though a decree be void, not simply erroneous, it may be reversed on appeal. McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 734, and cases cited.

This bill has no caption naming parties, and cannot be treated as filed under the Code provision. First, has it a "complainant," or "orator," as he was called in equity practice before the Code provision called him, as in common-law actions, "plaintiff?" By great liberality, perhaps, we may answer that the bill has a plaintiff. It begins, "Humbly complaining, your orator shows," not naming the orator; but the name of William F. Cook, by an attorney, is signed at the foot, and we may say that Cook is the orator. By technical practice he could not be so considered. Has it a defendant? There is no show of any portion of the bill stating names of defendants, nor of a prayer that process issue against any one, nor that any one be treated as a defendant, nor that any one be required to answer or be decreed to do anything. There is not even a hint, I may say, that of the eight persons, besides the plaintiff, named in the bill in the course of its narration, any one or all are to be held as defendants, except that in mentioning Dorsey the language is, in two instances, "the defendant Thomas J. Dorsey." Suppose we were to strain a point to say that made him a defendant; are the others to be? Which ones, —all, or only certain ones? Two deeds of trust were given to secure debts on the land sought to be sold under one of them. The trustees are named in the bill, but only in describing the deeds, not as defendants. The purchaser would get no title unless they be parties. The bill purports to be filed by one unnamed orator, and in its prayer asks relief for an oratrix. If not an inadvertence, who is she? This bill is plainly insufficient and uncertain. To sustain it we must go beyond reasonable liberality, and ignore rules of equity well settled, and which ought to be observed.

It is contended in argument that the demurrer is defective in not assigning causes of demurrer. Under equity practice, outside of statute, a demurrer must assign cause. "A demurrer will not be good if it merely says, generally, that the defendant demurs to the bill. It must express some cause of demurrer, either general or specific." 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 586; Story, Eq. Pl. 457;

Bart. Ch. Pr. 1174. But likely, as stated in Story, Eq. Pl. § 455, when the demurrer was general, for want of equity in the bill, it need only say that there is no equity in the bill, and only where it is special, directed to defects of form. Section 28, c. 125, Code, providing the form of a demurrer, has been construed as abolishing special demurrers and the necessity of giving causes of demurrer. Bart. Ch. Pr. 347; Smith v. Lloyd, 16 Grat. 310; Dunn v. Dunn, 26 Grat. 291; Jones v. Clark, 25 Grat. 642, (Syllabus, par. 9); Stewart v. Jackson, 8 W. Va. 29. These cases apply this statute to chancery cases, as I think it ought to be, notwithstanding its language. The case of Stewart v. Jackson, 8 W. Va. 29, justifies the practice of simply noting a demurrer in the order book. The answer may contain a demurrer, in the language of section 28, c. 125, Code, in which case it ought to be headed, "The demurrer and answer of." This is so, as a defendant may plead law and fact at the same time under statute; and the cases of Dunn v. Dunn, supra, and Bassett v. Cunningham, 7 Leigh, 402, are authority here. Bart. Ch. Pr. 385. While it might be thought that the provision in Code, § 29, c. 125, that, "if nothing be alleged by the demurrant in support of his demurrer, the court, if it overrule the same, shall state that fact in the order," and judgment shall not be reversed for that cause, would require a demurrer to specify cause, it does not; for that provision, if, as a remedial provision it be applied to chancery suits, necessarily presupposes that the written demurrer has not specified causes, and, besides, there is section 28, which authorizes such a general demurrer. The provision is probably intended to give the court right to ask a specification of grounds of demurrer ore tenus, or simply state the fact on record that no ground of demurrer was assigned. But, even without a demurrer, the bill is so defective that its infirmity could have been used to prevent a decree on a hearing, or to reverse the decree on appeal. Bart. Ch. Pr. 226, 349; Proctor v. Hill, 10 W. Va. 60; McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724.

As the necessary parties are not before the court, we will not consider other questions, but will simply reverse the decree, and remand the cause with leave to file an amended bill. McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 734.

STATE v. MINES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 4, 1893.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — RUNNING OF STATUTE AGAINST STATE — AMENDMENT AND REPEAL OF STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION.

1. Section 20, c. 35, Code 1868, abolished the common-law rule that no time runs against the state, and made the state's right subject to statutes of limitations, the same as individual rights.

2. The clause in section 19, c. 55, Acts 1875, "there shall be no limitation to proceedings on judgments on behalf of the state, or any claim due the state," did not wholly repeal section 20, c. 35, Code 1868, but only limited its operation by taking out of it judgments and money claims of the state; and when said clause was itself repealed by Act March 12, 1881, c. 13, such judgments and claims were again brought under section 20, c. 35, and made subject to statutes of limitations.

3. A subsequent statute, revising the whole subject-matter of a former one, and evidently intended as a substitute for it, though it contains no express words to that effect, must, on principles of law as well as in reason and common sense, operate a repeal of the former law. Herron v. Carson, 26 W. Va. 62.

4. When a statute which repealed a common-law rule is itself repealed, the common rule revives. So, by common law, when a statute which repealed a former statute is itself repealed, the former statute revives; but this rule of the common law is changed by section 10, c. 13, of the Code. Under that statute, repeal by implication is the same as express repeal.

5. A cardinal rule in interpreting statutes is to construe them as prospective in operation in every instance, except where the intent that they shall act retrospectively is expressed in clear and unambiguous terms, or such intent is necessarily implied from the language of the statute, which would be inoperative otherwise than retrospectively. In doubt, it should be resolved against, rather than in favor of, retrospective operation. Stewart v. Vandervort, 34 W. Va. 524, 12 S. E. 736.

6. Statutes of limitations are no exceptions to the rule that statutes are prima facie to be given only prospective operation.

7. When a statute is amended and re-enacted with the words, "so as to read as follows," or words of like effect, those parts of the re-enactment embraced in the former law are not considered as repealed and re-enacted, but as law all along continuously from their original enactment; but the new parts are considered as law for the first time from the commencement of the amended act.

8. Section 20, c. 35, Code, amended and re-enacted by chapter 18, Acts 1882, is retroactive upon judgments rendered in favor of the state before its re-enactment.

9. Section 20, c. 35, Code, is not invalid and void because chapter 18, Acts 1882, re-enacting it, is repugnant to the constitution, (article 6, § 30.)

10. When the principal object of an act of the legislature is expressed in the title, and the act embraces, along with such principal object, other incidental or auxiliary objects germane to the principal object, the act is not repugnant to section 30, art. 6, of the constitution, and is valid as to such principal and auxiliary or incidental object.

11. Generally, under said section, the language of the title should be construed in its most comprehensive and liberal sense favorable to the validity of the act, so as to bring the contents of the act within the title; and only where it is very manifest that the contents of the act are not within the title should the act, or any part of it, be deemed invalid.

Error to circuit court, Ohio county; Joseph R. Paull, Judge.

Action by the state of West Virginia against James M. Mines. Plaintiff had judgment. From a judgment quashing an execution issued plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Okey Johnson, for the State. John Bassel, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. This is a writ of error taken by the state to a judgment of the circuit court of Ohio county quashing an execution in favor of the state. Was the judgment barred by the statute of limitations when the execution issued? is the question of the case. The judgment was rendered in October, 1877; a second execution was returnable to January rules, 1879; and the next one—the one involved here—issued 19th November, 1891. The state contends that its judgment is protected by the maxim, “nullum tempus occurrit regi,”—no time runs against the king. Section 20, c. 35, of the Code of 1868, provided that “every statute of limitations, unless otherwise expressly provided, shall apply to the state, but as to claims heretofore accrued, the time shall be computed as commencing when this chapter takes effect.” This abolished the common-law rule that no time runs against the state. A difficult question here arises,—whether this provision of the Code applies to this judgment. If so, then it is barred by sections 10 and 11, c. 139, of the Code. In chapter 55, § 19, Acts 1875, is found the provision: “There shall be no limitation to proceedings on judgments on behalf of the state, or any claim due the state.” The act containing this clause is not a re-enactment of chapter 35, but an independent act, relating to the collection of taxes. It does not expressly repeal the section of the Code of 1868 above quoted. It is left standing; but, as there is a repugnancy between the two provisions, and the act of 1875 repeals so much of all acts as conflicts with it, we shall say that it is a partial repeal by clear implication of section 20, c. 35, of the Code of 1868,—that is, so far as that section would operate to bar judgments in favor of the state and claims due the state; that is, as I think, claims for money demands. But beyond this it did not repeal the said provision of the Code of 1868, making the state subject to every statute of limitations; but that provision would operate against the state in respect to other rights; for instance, her right to lands, or torts done to her property. It would be more accurate to say that the act of 1875 operated to make exceptions to section 20 of chapter 35 than to call it a repeal. And that the act of 1875 takes out of section 20 only judgments and debt claims is plain from the fact that the clause is found in an act entitled “An act providing for the collection of taxes,” and, as applicable to debt demands, it would be covered by the title, but, if extended to all causes of action in favor of the state, it would be ungermane to the principal object of the title, and void. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74. Afterwards, by act of March 12, 1881, (Acts 1881, c. 13,) the legislature amended and re-enacted chapter 30 of the Code, in relation to the collection of taxes; and, although it related to the same subject as the act of 1875, it left out that clause of the act of 1875 declaring that no statute of limitations should apply to judgments or claims due the state, and thus repealed it. Some question might be raised whether the act of 1881 did so repeal that clause, on the theory that the act of 1875 was not a re-enactment of chapter 30 of the Code, but an original act, so to speak; whereas the act of 1881 is a re-enactment of chapter 30 of the Code; and that, as the act of 1881 is silent as to the subject of limitations, and thus not containing anything in conflict with the limitation clause of the act of 1875, that clause should be held as continuing; and, as repeals by implication can only be allowed where there is plain repugnancy, and where both acts may stand and be executed, we should execute both so far as they do not antagonize. State v. Enoch, 26 W. Va. 253.

We ought to consider the said clause of the act of 1875 as not repealed by the act of 1881. But there is another mode of repeal of a statute not based only on repugnancy, and that is, where the later statute makes full and complete provision touching the subject common to both, and it is evident that the legislature intended to review the legislation on that subject, and that the later act should be deemed as full and complete provision upon the subject, the former statute is at an end. Herron v. Carson, 26 W. Va. 62. An inspection of the act of 1875 will show that, though not expressly an amendment and re-enactment of Code, c. 30, yet it was intended to be, and substantially and impliedly is such, especially as the act of 1875 expressly repealed chapter 30; and, as the act of 1881 is in terms an amendment and re-enactment of that chapter, so repealed by the act of 1875, viewing them as in pari materia, we are justified in the conclusion that the legislature, by the act of 1881, intended to wholly repeal the act of 1875. Though a later statute be not repugnant to a prior one in all respects, yet if it was clearly intended to take its place it repeals it. Suth. St. Const. §§ 154–156. Thus the clause of the act of 1875, providing that no limitation should bind the state as to judgments and claims, is repealed. The repealing act is itself repealed. Does this restore section 20 of chapter 35 of the Code? At common law it would. 1 Minor, Inst. 41; 1 Bl. Comm. 90; Suth. St. Const. § 168; End. Interp. St. § 475. But we have a canon or rule of construction in section 10, c. 13, of our Code, that “when a law which has repealed another, is itself repealed, the former law shall not be revived, without express words for the purpose.” Now, if this applies, the Code section is not restored, but the common-law rule that no time runs against the state, which said Code section annulled, would be brought into force again, under that principle of law that when a statute repealing the common law is itself repealed the common law is restored, as section 10, c. 13, Code, does not apply to statutes repealing common law, but only to statutes repealing statutes. 1 Minor, Inst. 41; Insurance Co. v. Barley, 16 Grat. 383, 384; Booth's Case, Id. 519, 529. But I do not think the statute last quoted applies. There has been question whether that statute applies to cases where the repeal of one statute by another is not express, but only by implication; but as a repeal, though only by construction or implication, is just as much a repeal as when express,—just as much the will of the legislature that the older law shall cease,—I think there is no reason why the statute does not apply to repeals by implication as to express repeals. So it has been held on similar statutes. End. Interp. St. § 476; Milne v. Huber, 3 McLean, 212; Stirman v. State, 21 Tex. 734. See, also, Phillips' Case, 19 Grat. 485.

Now, as I remarked above, section 20 of chapter 35 of the Code was broad and comprehensive, applying every statute of limitation against the state. The act of 1875 only changed or modified it to a certain extent,—that is, prevented its operation as to judgments and claims of the state, leaving it in all other respects operative; simply made an exception to the generality of the operation of the statute; and when that act was itself repealed, and the exception or limitation was no longer in force, said section 20 operates free of that exception. It was only a partial abrogation of section 20. It would have been different had it been a total abrogation. To hold otherwise we should say that the common-law rule that time could not bar the state applied as to judgments and claims for debt, but as to all other grounds of action time would bar. Authority will sustain the position here taken. The old English statute of Gloucester gave costs to plaintiffs recovering damages. Later acts provided they should not recover costs except on a judge's order. The later acts were repealed, and it was held that the statute of Gloucester still operated and gave costs, though Lord Brougham's Act, (13 & 14 Vict.) providing that where an act repealing in whole or part a former act is itself repealed, the last repeal does not revive the former act, without words to that effect, was in force. And a case pointedly apt to this case, supported by good reasoning, is Smith v. Hoyt, 14 Wis. 252, holding, upon a similar statute to ours, that "where an act, or part of an act, is repealed, it is not revived by a subsequent repeal of the repealing act. But where a statute merely excepts a particular class of cases from the provisions of a previously existing general law, which continues to be in force, the repeal of the excepting statute operates to bring such cases again under the general law." The old act gave defendants 20 days in which to answer; later acts gave defendants in foreclosure suits 90 days; and, the later acts being repealed, the court applied the old act, and said: "Where the statute creating the exception is repealed, the general statute, which was in force all the time, would then be applicable to all cases according to its terms. And this would be no violation of the rule of construction before referred to, that the repeal of a repealing act should not revive the act repealed. The act of 1858 was equivalent to a proviso to the general rule that it should not be applicable to foreclosure defendants. But if a proviso creating an exception to the general terms of a statute should be repealed, courts would be bound afterwards to give effect to it according to those general terms, as though the proviso had never existed; and this could not be said to revive a repealed statute. The rule against this relates to absolute repeals, not to cases where a statute is left in force, and all that is done in the way of repeal is to except certain cases from its operation. In such cases the statute does not need to be revived, for it remains in force; and, the exception being taken away, the statute is afterwards to be applied without the exception." And since writing the above I find the case of McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134, the principle of construction in which supports this view. One act—a general one—declared that no dwelling house should be invaded in condemnation of land for railroads; another later special act declared that a railroad company might, in gorges and other specified places, construct its road by or through dwelling houses. It was held that the later statute was only a qualification or exception to the former, and the prohibition against taking dwelling houses would apply to all places except the particular places specified in the second act and an express repeal of the qualifying act will restore the prohibition in the general statute to its original force, and it will then operate as though the qualifying statute had never existed. So that we may say that section 20, c. 35, was never repealed by the act of 1875, but that the act of 1875 simply qualified or made an exception to it; and thus section 10 of chapter 13 does not hinder the operation of section 20 of chapter 35 on the repeal of the act of 1875. Thus I come to the conclusion that when in 1881 the act of 1875 was repealed, section 20 of chapter 35 of the Code at once applied to this judgment, and the statutory bar of 10 years began to run against it on 12th March, 1881, and had fully run when, on 19th November, 1891, this execution issued. It is very apparent that section 20 of chapter 35 was intended to operate on all judgments, whether prior or subsequent; for it makes special provision as to prior judgments.

There is another reason for holding the judgment barred. An act of February 9, 1882, (chapter 13, Code 1891, p. 261,) amended and re-enacted section 20 of chapter 35 of the Code, making an unqualified repeal of the common-law rule that no time runs against the state, in the language, "Every statute of limitations, unless otherwise expressly provided shall apply to the state." Is the section as so amended retroactive upon antecedent judgments? A review of the subject confirms my opinion that the point of the syllabus we adopted in Stewart v. Vandervort, 34 W. Va. 524, 12 S. E. 736, that statutes are prima facie to have no retrospective effect, is correct. Authorities in support of that point are vast in volume, and from all quarters. I refer to the discussion of the subject of the in that case, and cite the following additional Virginia and West Virginia cases asserting or conceding it for convenience of reference: Elliot v. Lyell, 3 Call, 268; Warder v. Arell, 2 Wash. (Va.) 282; Com. v. Hewitt, 2 Hen. & M. 181; Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 109; Williams v. Lewis, 5 Leigh, 686; McCance v. Taylor, 10 Grat. 580; Duval v. Malone, 14 Grat. 24; Price v. Harrison, 31 Grat. 114; Crigler v. Alexander, 33 Grat. 674; Ryans' Case, 80 Va. 385; Campbell v. Fire-Brick, etc., Co., 75 Va. 291; Robertson v. Gillenwaters, 85 Va. 116, 7 S. E. 371; Tennant v. Brookover, 12 W. Va. 343; Hoge v. Brookover, 28 W. Va. 804; Thornburg v. Thornburg, 18 W. Va. 526. Nor will it do to say that, on the theory that statutes of limitation concern the remedy, they are construed retrospectively. They are not purely remedial statutes, affording remedy or touching simply remedial process or procedure. In Duval v. Malone, 14 Grat. 24, is found a strong case to repel that contention. A statute, by language broad enough to include antecedent indemnifying bonds, enacted a limitation on indemnifying bonds, and it was held to limit suits only on bonds taken after the act. Without defining a remedial statute, I can assert upon authority that statutes of limitation are no exception to the rule that statutes are prima facie future in operation. Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104; Duval v. Malone, 14 Grat. 24; 7 Wait, Act. & Def. 228; Wade, Retro. Laws, § 48; State v. Pinckney, 22 S. C. 484; Ward v. Kilts, 12 Wend. 137; Garrett v. Beaumont, 24 Miss. 377; End. Interp. St. §§ 279, 284, 287. It is a concession in Spang v. Robinson, 24 W. Va., at page 339. As retrospective force given to statutes is contrary to the general principles of construction and of justice, I have been much inclined to the opinion that this section should not be made an exception to the rule; but I am compelled to the conclusion that it must be so treated. When we reflect that section 11, c. 139, of the Code, at the very time of the act of 1882, subjected all judgments, past or future, to its bar by its very terms; and when we reflect that with knowledge that the section applied to prior judgments the legislature applied that section to state judgments by the strong, broad language, "every statute of limitation, unless otherwise expressly provided, shall apply to the state," without qualifying or otherwise providing; and when we reflect further that section 11, c. 139, as it had been provided that no execution on judgments should issue after 10 years, expressly excepted state judgments, and the same legislature afterwards amended that section by striking out that exception of the state judgments, without any reservation as to prior judgments, thus harmonizing this section 11 with their amendment of section 20, c. 35,—we are almost inevitably forced to the opinion that it intended to bring state judgments to just the same rule as that governing judgments of individuals. Was the legislature oblivious to the fact that the citizen's judgment, no matter when rendered, fell under the ban of that section? Did it forget so common, so important a statute as that limiting judgments? Add to this the further fact that this section 20, as it was in the first edition of the Code of 1868, had the provision that as to state judgments existing at its adoption past time should not be computed, but only that running after the commencement of the Code, whereas in the re-enactment of the section in 1882 that provision is left out, and that this is the only change, this strengthens us in the conviction that it was intended to bring state judgments within the retroaction of section 11, c. 139. It was, in effect, an amendment of that section, bringing state judgments under it. Why should they not be? If you give peace and repose to a debtor against a private judgment, why not against a public one? Repose is a main principle calling for statutes of limitations. It is to be preferred, if consistent with fair construction, to give the act such application as will grant peace to a debtor against whom a judgment was had in October, 1877, and who had not been called on by execution to pay for almost 13 years,—until November, 1891.

However, the question whether the act of 1882, taken alone, is retroactive, while it may be in some cases important, and calling upon us for decision, is not important in the present case, as the judgment is barred anyhow, regardless of that question. Section 20, c. 35, placing the state under statutes of limitation, operated upon all causes of action from 1st April, 1869, except that judgments and money demands were excepted out of it by the act of 1875; and, this being repealed in 1881, such judgments and claims again fell under section 20. So from April 1, 1869, down to the present the statute of limitations operated upon the state, not merely from its re-enactment in 1882, except for a few years, as to judgments and debt claims taken out of it by the act of 1875, and again put under it by its repeal. The re-enactment of 1882 made no new law. Where a law is amended and re-enacted the portions of the amended sections which are simply repeated from the old law are not considered as repealed and re-enacted, but as law continuously from their first enactment by the old act, and not born of the re-enactment; while the new or changed portions are law for the first time from the re-enactment. Price v. Harrison, 31 Grat. 122; Ely v. Holton, 15 N. Y. 595. That it is within the power of the legislature to enact a retroactive statute of limitations, unless it cut off all remedy at once, without leaving a reasonable time for the enforcement of the right, is conceded, and clear on abundant authority. Cooley, Const. Lim. 465, 466. In this instance nearly seven years' time was left after the act of 1882 before the judgment would be barred,—surely more than a reasonable time,—and for that matter the state could at once cut off its own remedy. That section 11, c. 139, Code, does act upon prior judgments is clear both from its words and from Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588; Shipley v. Pew, 23 W. Va. 487; and Spang v. Robinson, 24 W. Va. 327. We think this holding is not inconsistent with Stewart v. Vandervort, 34 W. Va. 524, 12 S. E. 736. Section 20 of chapter 35, treated as an original act passed in 1882, would thus retroact and count against the judgment time from January, 1879, to November 19, 1891, and bar it.

But it is stoutly claimed that the act of 1882 is unconstitutional. If so, section 20, c. 35, would remain as it was in the Code of 1868, unaffected by the act of 1882; and as it certainly designed to cover all state judgments, it would, for reasons above given, operate against this judgment from 12th March, 1881, and bar it. It is not claimed that its original enactment as part of the Code was unconstitutional, but only its re-enactment in 1882. But we do not think the act of 1882 unconstitutional. It is said to be so on two grounds. One is that it embraces the general object of limitations to all suits of the state,—an object not expressed in the title, contrary to section 30, art. 6, of the constitution, that no act "shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in the title." The title of the act is, "An act to amend and re-enact chapter thirty-five of the Code of West Virginia, concerning the recovery of claims due the State." If we so held, it would be like an earthquake in the legislation of the state, overthrowing many, very many, provisions found in our Code incorporated into it by acts amending and re-enacting a large number of its chapters through the long period from its original enactment in 1868. We should be more than usually cautious in reaching a conclusion fraught with such disastrous results consequentially flowing from it. We must in every case presume an act constitutional, and in doubt hold it so. Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 562. And in Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147, 2 Sup. Ct. 391, touching the same point, the syllabus is: "The conflict between the constitution and a statute must be palpable to justify the judiciary in disregarding the latter upon the sole ground that it embraces more than one object, or that, if there be but one, it is not sufficiently expressed in the title." Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74, holds that "the most liberal construction favorable to the validity of legislation which the language of these provisions admits should be adopted." The point of the objection is that the title of the act says that its object is the collection of claims due the state, whereas its body contains another, a second distinct object, and that not expressed in the title, a statute of limitations against the state; and that, too, not merely a limitation against money claims, but also as to suits to recover land of the state or any other action it could bring. This is true, and yet does not render it void. The title of the act says that it is to amend and re-enact chapter 35 of the Code. That chapter contained this section. But the object is further defined to be the recovery of moneys due the state. The act makes detailed provisions for suits, sales under executions, sale of land and debts of the state by the auditor, and other provisions touching the recovery of moneys due the state, and in section 20 provides limitations as to state suits. This is not foreign, but pertinent and germane, to the general object and purpose of the act; an incident fairly connected with the main or general purpose of the act, and not another separate object. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74, discusses this subject, and lays down these principles: That "when the principal object of an act is expressed in the title, and the act embraces with such principal object other auxiliary objects, the act, if not otherwise objectionable, is valid, not only as to the principal, but likewise as to the auxiliary objects;" and that generally the language of the title should be construed in its most comprehensive sense. Cooley, Const. Lim. 172, properly states the law to be that "the general purpose of this provision is accomplished when a law has but one general object, which is fairly indicated by its title. To require every end and means necessary or convenient for the accomplishment of this general object to be provided for by a separate act relating to that alone would not only be unreasonable, but would actually render legislation impossible. The generality of a title is therefore no objection to it, so long as it is not made a cover to legislation incongruous in itself, and which by no fair intentment can be considered as having a necessary or proper connection." "None of the provisions of a statute will be held unconstitutional when they all relate, directly or indirectly, to the same subject, have a natural connection, and are not foreign to the subject expressed in the title." Suth. St. Const. § 85. The title need not be a detail or index or abstract of the contents of the act. It may include numerous provisions reasonably indicated by the title. Mont-

Now, would it not be going very far beyond the purpose, design, and safety contemplated by the clause of the constitution in hand to say that in an act entitled an act "concerning the recovery of claims due the state," and giving remedies by suits and executions, a statute of limitations as to the state may not be incorporated without rendering it open to the objection that it embraces two different objects, or that one of them is not expressed in its title. Giving remedies, may it not limit them? Is it not cognate and kindred to the subject? I shall refer to the opinion and authorities cited in Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612, for a full discussion of the subject, without further discussion of it here. I will add that in Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. 311, it is held that "a statute of limitations may be inserted in a tax law for the purpose of aiding and assisting in the collection of taxes." "A subject expressed in the title includes all subsidiary details, which are means for carrying into effect the object or purpose of the act disclosed in that subject." Suth. St. Const. § 9. This is an amendatory act, and in Suth. St. Const. § 101, the law is stated to be that "the constitutional requirement under discussion, as applied to acts of this character, when they contain matter which might appropriately have been incorporated in the original act under its title, is satisfied generally if the amendatory or supplemental act identifies the original act by its title, and declares the purpose to amend or supplement it. Under such a title alterations by excision, addition, or substitution may be made." It cannot be doubted that under the title of the act passed in 1868, establishing a code of laws, it was valid to insert the limitation section 20 in chapter 35. The act of 1882 expresses in its title that it is to amend chapter 35 of the Code, relating to recovery of money due the state; and thus informed every one that it was that particular chapter of the act adopting a Code, which already contained this limitation section 20, that was to be amended and re-enacted. The numerous authorities cited by Sutherland seem to support his text, and it is supported by the opinion by Judge Dent in State v. County Court, 37 W. Va. 811, 17 S. E. 379. The only question, if question there can be, is as to its application to such an act as our Code act. If I entertained any doubt in this matter it would arise from the fact that section 20 provides limitations for not only suits for moneys due the state, but other suits also. But can any one say that it was not competent and proper to insert this with all this scope in the Code act? And being properly in the Code act, can any one say that it could not, in the re-enactment of the chapter, be again included with the same scope? If so, then it must be narrowed so as to limit suits for only moneys due the state, and limitation of other suits be made the subject of an original act; for it could not be put in this act, even by specifying the subject of limitations in the title, as it would make the act contain two different objects. This would give a very technical and inconvenient construction to the constitution. Further, I am of opinion that section 20, in all its scope, is constitutional. But let us suppose that, so far as it subjects suits for moneys due the state to limitations, it is sheltered under its title as dealing with a subject germane to the principal subject of the act, but as to actions for other causes it would be invalid. Must we overthrow the entire section? True, the section is in itself a unit and indivisible, but not so in its application to the subjects to which it applies. Our constitution says that when any object embraced in an act is not expressed in the title, the act shall be void only as to the unexpressed object. And the general law is that if the part expressed in the title is not so intimately connected with that part which is unexpressed as to prevent the former from standing and being executed, it shall stand and have operation. Cooley, Const. Lim. 148. It would seem to further the purpose of our constitution, and not be going too far, to say that section 20 would be applied in all proceedings for recovery of moneys due the state, and be abortive as to other actions; and this is an execution to recover money on a judgment. Shall we split the section to overthrow it wholly or to support it in part?

The second respect in which the section is said to be unconstitutional is stated thus in the brief: "But, if section 20 of chapter 35 is to be considered as an amendment to the various limitation statutes as such, it is clearly unconstitutional," because of the provision of the constitution that "no law shall be revived or amended by reference to its title only, but the law revived, or the section amended, shall be inserted at large in the new act." The proposition of counsel above given is guarded and conditional. The conclusion of unconstitutionality would be correct were the premise or hypothesis sound; but it is not, since the section is not to be considered an amendment to all the numerous statutes of limitations, in a legal point of view, for the purposes of the clause of the constitution quoted. It simply, by general enactment, makes the state's rights subject to them. It does not amend or change them, making them different from what they were, but merely brings new matters within the pale of their operation. The act sets out in full detail chapter 35 as it is re-enacted, including this section, so there can be no objection on that score, and I do not understand that there is. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. BROOKOVER et al.

Nov. 4, 1893.)

EXECUTION—ISSUANCE TWO YEARS AFTER JUDGMENT.

1. An execution issued upon a judgment after two years from its rendition without an order of court allowing its issuance is properly quashed.

2. Balance of syllabus same as in State v. Mines, 18 S. E. 470.

Error to circuit court, Ohio county; Joseph R. Paull, Judge.

Action by the state of West Virginia against A. P. Brookover and others. There was judgment for plaintiff, and from an order quashing the execution, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Okey Johnson, for the State. Ewing, Melvin & Riley, and Jas. W. Ewing, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. The circuit court of Ohio county quashed an execution in favor of the state against Brookover and others, and the state obtained this writ of error. The judgment dates of 22d of January, 1878, and no execution issued until the one quashed, which dates 23d November, 1891, and it was issued without any order of court allowing it, though more than 13 years from the date of judgment had passed without execution. Section 10, c. 139, Code, required notice and order of court to issue the execution, and for this reason it was rightly quashed. In other respects the same legal principles which control the decision this day made in the case of State v. Mines, 18 S. E. 470, control this case, and lead us to an affirmance of the judgment.

ARNOLD v. LEWIS COUNTY COURT.

Nov. 4, 1893.)

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE'S COURT—PRACTICE—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. A final decision on a writ of certiorari is reviewable on writ of error from this court, according to the rules of law and practice in other cases.

2. When the plaintiff appeals, the amount claimed in his action generally determines the amount in controversy on the question of jurisdiction in the appellate court, although the judgment may be for less, or for the defendant.

3. Where a record and judgment of a justice is removed and returned to the circuit court on writ of certiorari issued under chapter 110 of the Code, (see Ed. 1891,) it is the duty of the clerk, upon receiving it, to file and docket the case in the same manner that other cases are docketed, and upon the hearing the circuit court should review such judgment of the justice upon the merits, determine all questions arising on the law and the evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice may require; and it is error in the court to have the case tried by a jury without having first reviewed such judgment.

4. Where the petition for and the writ of certiorari to the judgment of a justice show that it was not applied for within 10 days after the judgment was entered, it should not be granted, unless good cause be shown why the writ was not applied for within 10 days; and, if so issued after the time without such showing, it should be quashed as improvidently awarded.

Error to circuit court, Lewis county; Henry Brannon, Judge.

Action by George J. Arnold against the county court of Lewis county. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Linn & Withers, for plaintiff in error.
Louis Bennett, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. On 9th October, 1888, George J. Arnold brought suit before a justice against the county court of Lewis county for $300, damages for injury to his property, viz. 12 head of cattle, sustained by him by reason of a certain public highway, viz. a bridge, being out of repair. The case was tried by a jury, who found for plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $100. Four bills of exception were taken by defendant during the trial, and defendant moved the two justices to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial; but the motion was overruled, and judgment rendered for plaintiff for $100, with interest from the 8th day of November, 1888, (the date of the judgment,) until paid, and costs. The defendant excepted, and had the evidence certified and made part of the record. On the 31st day of December, 1888, the judge of the circuit court of Lewis county awarded defendant a writ of certiorari to remove into the circuit court for review the record and proceedings in the cause. The writ was issued on the 7th day of February, 1889. On March 7, 1889, the defendant, George J. Arnold, appeared in court, and filed certain exceptions to the transcript and other evidence, and moved the court to dismiss the cause for insufficiency of the record and of the evidence; but the court, without passing directly on the motion, or in any way reviewing the judgment, but overruling it, if at all, by implication, and without setting aside the judgment of the justice, retained the cause as if it had been originally brought therein, called and impaneled a jury of six, who were elected and sworn to try the matter in difference, as prescribed by section 169, c. 50, Code, and, the jury having found for defendant, judgment was rendered thereon, from which plaintiff has obtained this writ of error.

The contention is made, on behalf of defendant in error, that this court has no jurisdiction; that the amount in controversy is but $100, which must be taken as of the date of the judgment given by the justice. The constitution (article 8, § 3) says: "It [the court of appeals] shall have appellate jurisdiction in civil cases where the matter in controversy exclusive of costs is of greater value or amount than one hundred dollars;" plainly showing, by excluding costs, that interest is not to be excluded. The statute (chapter 131, § 18) says: "Every judgment except where it is otherwise provided by law shall bear interest from the date thereof, whether it be so stated in the judgment or not;" thus making interest an inseparable incident of the principal sum adjudged. The judgment for $100 was rendered by the justice on the 8th day of November, 1888, and by its own terms bears interest from date. That the constitution means that in this instance interest on the principal shall be included in determining the jurisdictional amount is further shown by section 12 of the same article, which says that "the circuit court shall have original and general jurisdiction of all matters at law where the amount in controversy exclusive of interest exceeds fifty dollars;"—each clause as a context to the other, thus showing that when interest is to be excluded it says so, and therefore, when silent, the interest is to be included as an inseparable part of the sum in ascertaining the amount in controversy in reference to jurisdiction. See, also, article 3, § 13, Const. So that the value actually in controversy, principal and interest, at the given time, whatever that time may be, determines the question of jurisdiction in this case. This was $300 as to plaintiff in the trial before the justice, and was the same amount, as this record shows, on the trial de novo in the circuit court. But plaintiff did not complain of the amount found by the jury in the trial before the justice, nor did he put himself in condition to complain in this court of the finding of the jury in the circuit court if he had desired to do so. On the point of including interest, see Wilson v. Sparkman, 17 Fla. 871; Skillman v. Lachman, 23 Cal. 198. In Stratton v. Society, (1827,) 6 Rand. (Va.) 22, Judge Carr says: "We feel no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court. The interest is unquestionably a part of the matter in controversy." See Gage v. Crockett, 27 Grat. 735; Campbell v. Smith, 32 Grat. 288; Harman v. City of Lynchburg, 33 Grat. 37. When the judgment was rendered before the justice for plaintiff for the sum of $100, with interest from November 8, 1888, the date of the judgment, the plaintiff had a right to complain, for he had laid his damages for injury to his cattle caused by the breaking down of the county bridge at $300. and the jury and the justice only gave him one-third of that; but the matter in controversy, in dispute, for which the suit was brought, contested by defendant, about which witnesses were examined, the matter in difference which the jury was sworn to try, was $300, from the standpoint of the plaintiff, (see Lee v. Watson, 1 Wall. 337;) yet plaintiff chose to abide by the verdict, and relinquish the balance of his claim, rather than prolong the controversy. But the defendant was dissatisfied with the judgment, which he could have paid at once, and he could not increase it beyond $100 by waiting for the interest to run. When it was tried de novo by a jury in the circuit court on the same pleadings,—plaintiff's claim for $300, and defendant's plea that there was no damage,—and the jury found for defendant, and judgment was entered on it, $300 was prima facie, from plaintiff's standpoint, the amount in controversy; but he did not put himself in condition to claim it to that extent, but he did put himself on record as claiming $100 thereof, with interest from 8th November to that date. That is what he did claim in the circuit court, as matter of fact shown by the record, and that is what he then on the trial de novo lost, if the judgment stands. He in effect moved the court to dismiss the cause, or to hear it on the merits on the writ of review, and give him a judgment for the $100 and interest. By his motion to dismiss the writ of review for insufficiency of evidence to warrant the setting aside of the judgment below he brought his claim of what he was entitled to distinctly to the attention of the court; and it then became the duty of the court, if not of its own motion, to take up the record of the writ of certiorari, review the judgment of the justice upon the merits, determine all questions arising on the law and the evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice might require. If this had been done, it would have appeared that the writ of certiorari ought to have been dismissed as improvidently awarded; for it was not applied for until December 31, 1888, 52 days after the date of the judgment, and no cause of any kind was assigned or shown for the delay. Plaintiff had the right to have the cause heard and determined by the court on the writ of certiorari in review, as the awarding of the writ does not ipso facto set aside the judgment, and leave it to be tried de novo as if it were an appeal proper from the judgment of the justice. This was an error of law apparent on the record, having no relation to the trial by the jury. But it would answer no useful purpose to remand the cause for further proceedings in the circuit court when the record shows that it ought to be dismissed as improvidently awarded. It is well known that, so far as this writ of review applies to this particular class of cases, it is intended to cure and supplement chapter 50, as far as it can be done, in allowing appeals after trial by jury before a justice. In Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517, with us a leading case on the remedy by certiorari, it was held that "in cases where the party has permitted the time for appeal to expire, certiorari will not issue for relief unless upon a special showing unmingled with any blame or negligence on the part of such party." See Long v. Railway Co., 25 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. 1010; Bee v. Seaman, 36

W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. 173, both cases arising under the statute as it now is, in which this analogy furnished by the time allowed for appeal was applied. To keep chapter 50, (the Code of the justice,) and matters relating to it alone, as a consistent whole as near as can be, is so important as the dictate of general convenience that it ought not to be disregarded without some good reason. The cases cited above require that the judgment complained of be reversed, and that the writ be quashed as improvidently awarded.

JONES v. SINGER MANUF'G CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 4, 1893.)

ASSUMPSIT ON CONTRACT—PLEADINGS—HARMLESS ERROR—REVIEW.

1. Where an action of assumpsit is brought on an entire contract under seal, in which the covenants are dependent, and the pleader sets forth the contract in a special count, it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to aver his readiness and willingness to perform the condition precedent contained in the contract, but he must go further and show a sufficient legal excuse for his nonperformance.

2. The admission of irrelevant testimony, if it be of such a character that it could not possibly prejudice the opposite party, before the jury, is not ground for granting a new trial.

3. A new trial, asked on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, ought to be granted only in a case of plain deviation from right and justice, not in a doubtful case, merely because the court, if on the jury, would have given a different verdict.

4. Where a motion for a new trial is made on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the motion is denied, the opinion of the court which tried the cause is on such point entitled to great respect in the appellate court, and the appellate court will grant such new trial only in case of a plain deviation from right and justice.

Error to circuit court, Ohio county.

Action on a contract by F. P. Jones against the Singer Manufacturing Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Henry M. Russell, for plaintiff in error.
John J. Jacob, for defendant in error.

ENGLISH, P. This was an action of assumpsit brought by F. P. Jones against the Singer Manufacturing Company, in the circuit court of Ohio county, on the 27th day of February, 1890. The plaintiff was an employe of the defendant, engaged in the business of selling and leasing sewing machines, under several successive contracts, in writing, dated, respectively, the 1st day of March, 1886, the 6th day of December, 1886, the 1st day of October, 1888, the 12th day of November, 1888, and the 15th day of February, 1889. Each of these contracts, except the last-named one, bound the plaintiff to devote his entire time and attention exclusively to the business of the defendant in selling and leasing machines and machine supplies, and collecting the proceeds, and in carrying out the instructions of defendant. The contract of February 15, 1889, appears to have been a modification of the former agreements, and provided that the plaintiff should devote a part of his time and attention exclusively to collecting the accounts of the defendant from time to time intrusted to him by the said defendant, and to selling the sewing machines and sewing-machine supplies made and furnished by said defendant, and none other, and in all respects to faithfully carry out the instructions of defendant. The contracts of March and December, 1886, were designated as "F. contracts," and the contracts of October and November, 1888, were designated as "E. contracts." The declaration, which was demurred to by the plaintiff in error, purports to set forth specifically the covenants contained in these several contracts, and the common counts are added. The demurrer was overruled, and the action of the court in overruling said demurrer is assigned as error. In support of the demurrer, the plaintiff in error cites the case of Kern v. Ziegler, 13 W. Va. 707, and contends that, the covenants sued on being dependent, it was not sufficient for the plaintiff to aver that he was ready and willing to perform his part under the contract, but he should have alleged an offer to do so. Now, we must concede at once if the plaintiff, in his declaration, had contented himself with averring that he was ready and willing to perform his part under the contract, after reciting the terms of the contract, the action of the court in overruling the demurrer could not have been sustained; but the pleader went further in this court, and, after averring that 'the plaintiff was at all times ready and willing to perform his part of said contracts, he avers that the defendant, contriving to injure and defraud the plaintiff in the premises, unjustly and wrongfully refused to permit him to collect the money so coming due to it under the written leases aforesaid, and thereby prevented him from collecting and paying over the money which became due and payable to the defendant under said written leases, but that the defendant wrongfully and unjustly collected and received on the written leases aforesaid, given to it for sewing machines made and furnished by it, and sold and leased by the plaintiff in the collecting districts allotted to him, and so sold and leased by him in the period extending from March 1, 1886, to the 1st day of October, 1888, etc. The covenants in this case must be regarded as dependent, and in the case of Roach v. Dickinsons, 9 Grat. 154, in which case the covenants were dependent, it was held that the averment that the plaintiff was ready and willing to execute and deliver a deed was not sufficient;

that being an action of covenant to recover the purchase money for a piece of land. Also, in the case of Clark v. Franklin, 7 Leigh, 1, Tucker, P., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Nothing is more true than that where a contract is entire, and the covenants are dependent, the plaintiff is in general obliged to aver and prove a complete performance of all that was to be done and performed on his part before he is entitled to demand payment from the other party. But to this well-established rule there is the equally well-established exception that, where the defendant has prevented a performance by the plaintiff on his part, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should aver or prove a complete performance to entitle him to his action. He may recover without doing so, and it is sufficient to show a readiness to perform, and that he was hindered by the defendant." In the case of Kern v. Zeigler, 13 W. Va. 708, although it was held, in the fourth point of the syllabus, that "it is not sufficient in such a case to allege that the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform," yet, in the fifth point of the syllabus of the same case, it was held that where it appeared that the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform his part of the contract after setting forth what was required of him, but that he was prevented by the action of the defendant, the count was good. The plaintiff, in the count under consideration, having set forth all that he was required to do under these successive contracts, which were in some respects modifications of the preceding ones, and having averred his readiness and willingness to comply with said requirements, and having further set forth that he was prevented from so doing by the action of the defendant, we think he has thereby shown a sufficient legal excuse for not performing the covenants required of him, and that the pleader, in framing said count, has brought himself within the rule laid down in the case of Kern v. Zeigler, supra.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error contends that this count is defective, because it fails to allege that the plaintiff had been continuously in the employment of the defendant under the agreement of March 1, 1886, and that the collections were made by the defendant while the plaintiff was in its employment under that agreement, when it affirmatively appears that after the 15th day of February, 1889, the plaintiff was in the employment under another agreement, inconsistent with that of March 1, 1886, providing that the plaintiff should devote a part of his time to the service of the defendant. Now, the claim asserted by the plaintiff in this case is for commissions on sales made and leases taken by him during the period extending from March 1, 1886, to October 1, 1888, and it is true that the sixth clause of the contract of March 1, 1886, provides that the employe shall not be entitled to any commission on money received by the employe after the termination of his employment under this agreement, whether from sales or leases made by said employe during such employment or otherwise. The third clause of the contract of December 6, 1886, paragraph b, however, provides for a commission of 25 per cent. (payable weekly and during the employment only) on such moneys collected by said employe, and paid over to the employer, in payment for sewing machines sold or leased by said employe under this agreement and under the agreement of March 1, 1886, within the collection district allotted to him; showing that it was clearly the intention of the contracting parties to place the contract of December 6, 1886, upon the same footing, so far as compensation in the way of commissions was concerned, and to modify said first-named contract so as to continue the plaintiff in the employment of the defendant, and entitle him to commissions, no matter which contract the sales or leases were made under. The parties, by subsequent agreements in writing, had the unquestionable right to make modifications in the original contract; and, although the first contract provided that the compensation was to be paid for certain specified services under that contract, there was nothing to prevent them from doing as they did,—modify said contract so as to allow the plaintiff commissions for services rendered under the subsequent agreement. And when we refer to the eighth clause of the contract of December 6, 1886, we find it provided that the employe should not be entitled to any commission on moneys received by the employer, after the termination of his employment, on sales or leases made under that agreement. This modification would surely entitle the employe to receive commissions for his services, no matter whether he devoted a portion or the whole of his time to the business, so long as he continued in the defendant's employment.

The declaration avers that the plaintiff devoted his entire time and attention exclusively to the collection of all accounts intrusted to him by the defendant, and to selling the sewing machines and sewing-machine supplies made and furnished by the defendant from the 1st day of March, 1886, until the 15th day of February, 1889; and from the 15th day of February, 1889, until and upon the day of the commencement of this suit he had devoted a part of his time and attention to the same purpose, etc.; so that during the period he claims compensation for, to wit, from March 1, 1886, to October 1, 1888, the averment is made that he was in the continuous and exclusive employment of the plaintiff under said first-named contract and its modifications, and we cannot see that the plaintiff's right to recover can be prejudiced or precluded by the fact that, by a subsequent modification of the contract which relates to a period for which the plaintiff asserts no claim for compensation, he was to devote only a portion of his time to the defendant's service.

It is further contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the contract of March 1, 1886, contained a provision that the defendant might, at its option, increase or decrease the number of accounts intrusted to the employe for collection, without otherwise affecting the terms of the agreement, and the employe should forfeit all claims to any commissions on payments on any account after it had been withdrawn from him. This clause, however, was inserted for the benefit of the plaintiff in error; and, if it was entitled to any reduction in commissions by reason of its having withdrawn accounts, etc., from the plaintiff, this is a matter of defense, which might have been set up by the defendant. This court has held in the case of James v. Adams, 8 W. Va. 568, that, "in actions founded on special contracts, the declaration should state the entire consideration and the entire act to be done in virtue of such consideration." Also, in the case of Davisson v. Ford, 23 W. Va. 618, it was held that, "in framing the declaration on a special contract, it is necessary to set out the whole consideration on which is based the defendant's promise, and it must at the trial be proved as stated, or the plaintiff must fail, because of the variance." In the count under consideration the pleader has, as we think, complied with this requirement.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error also contends that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover anything, it was not the contract commissions, but the actual pecuniary loss to him arising from the defendant's act. This would have been at best (as he claims) the difference between the commissions contracted for and the expense which the plaintiff would have incurred in collecting the claims. We cannot, however, see what the defendant had to do with the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in making the collections. If the accounts were collected, the plaintiff, under the contract, was entitled to the commissions, no matter what it may have cost him to make such collections. 2 Suth. Dam. p. 440, under the head of "Hiring for Fixed Wages," states the law as follows: "Where the contract is express, and fixes the amount of compensation on performance, that stipulated compensation is the measure of damages, whether the action is brought on the contract or in general assumpsit." And in the case of Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 1, (second point of syllabus,) the court holds that, "while a special contract remains executory the plaintiff must sue upon it. When it has been fully executed according to its terms, and nothing remains to be done but the payment of the price, he may sue either on it or in indebitatus assumpsit relying in the last case upon the common counts, and in either case the contract will determine the rights of the parties." We also find that in Sedgwick on Measure of Damages (page 390, note 1) it is said that "where an agent employed for an agreed commission to sell land finds a purchaser at the stipulated price, but the principal declines to sell, and revokes the agent's authority, the law implies a contract on the part of the principal to pay what is reasonable, and it seems the measure of damages would be the whole commission;" citing Prickett v. Badger, 1 C. B. (N. S.) 296; Moses v. Bierling, 31 N. Y. 462; Doty v. Miller, 43 Barb. 529. In view of these authorities, we are of opinion that the plaintiff has committed no error in setting forth his cause of action, and the court committed no error in overruling the defendant's demurrer.

The next error assigned and relied on by the plaintiff in error is claimed to be in the action of the circuit court in admitting certain evidence upon the trial of the case to the jury, against the defendant's objections; and counsel for the plaintiff in error, in his brief, calls attention to the following questions as objectionable, and which he contends should have been excluded, to wit: "During that time, [meaning from March 1, 1886, to February, 1889,] state how far your services had been satisfactory to the company." Again, the question was asked: "In that conversation, [meaning one had with a certain Mr. Gee at the depot,] what was said by you indicating that you had released in any way or canceled your old contract in regard to these collections?" As to the first question objected to, we can but regard it as legitimate. The plea interposed was non assumpsit. An effort was being made to show that the plaintiff had not complied with the terms of his contract, and in response to this the plaintiff, as we think, was properly allowed to show that the manner in which he had performed the services had been satisfactory, or that no complaint had ever been made as to the way in which they were rendered. An averment is contained in the declaration that the plaintiff did devote his entire time from March 1, 1886, to February 15, 1889, to the service of the defendant in collecting accounts and selling machines; and, although it might be regarded that testimony showing a part of his time subsequent to that date was irrelevant to some extent, yet we cannot perceive that the defendant was injured by evidence tending to show that services were performed by the plaintiff subsequent to that date which were acceptable to the defendant, and, if the court committed an error in admitting the same, it must be regarded as a harmless error. And, even if the evidence referred to must be regarded as irrelevant, this court has held, in the case of Huffman v. Alderson's Admr., 9 W. Va. 616, that "the admission by the court of irrelevant testimony, if it be of such a character that it could not possibly prejudice the opposite party before the jury, is not good ground for granting a new trial." Looking at the entire evidence which was before the jury, our conclusion is that the court committed no error in refusing to exclude the plaintiff's evidence from the jury.

The refusal of the court to give certain instructions is assigned as error by the defendant. Said instructions were three in number, and read as follows: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that in February, 1889, the plaintiff notified the defendant that he, the plaintiff, would not thereafter devote his entire time to the service of the defendant, but would devote a part of his time to other business, this, in the absence of other explanatory circumstances, would constitute a termination, at the pleasure of the plaintiff, of the contracts of March and December, 1886, and October and November, 1888, and thereafter the said contracts could only be continued in force by the consent of both parties." (2) "If the jury believe that in February, 1889, the plaintiff terminated at his pleasure the contracts of March and December, 1886, and of October and November, 1888, or any of them, then the plaintiff had no right under said contracts, or any of them, to continue, without the consent of the defendant, to make collections thereafter of amounts remaining unpaid on sales or leases made by the plaintiff under such contract or contracts so terminated, or to recover from the defendant commissions on collections of such amounts thereafter made by it." (3) "If the jury believe from the evidence that prior to the making of the contract of February, 1889, there was a dispute or controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant whether the plaintiff should thereafter be permitted to make collections and receive commissions on sales or leases made under the contracts of 1886 and of October and November, 1888, and if they further believe from the evidence that the contract of February, 1889, was entered into by the parties for the purpose and with the intention of settling that dispute, then the jury should find for the defendant." The first of these instructions was calculated to mislead the jury, and the court committed no error in rejecting it. The contract of February, 1889, was a modification of the former contracts in some respects. It allowed the plaintiff to devote only a portion instead of his entire time to the service of the defendant. It did not provide for a cessation of plaintiff's employment, but, on the contrary, provided for a continuance of it under the modifications therein set forth. Both parties agreed that plaintiff might devote a portion of his time to the service of defendant. The consent of the defendant was given to this modification. Therefore the instruction was well calculated to mislead the jury, by instructing them that if they believed that in February, 1889, the plaintiff terminated at his pleasure the contracts of March and December, 1886, and of October and November, 1888, or any of them, then the plaintiff had no right under said contracts, or any of them, to continue, without the consent of the defendant, to make collections thereafter of amounts remaining unpaid on sales or leases made by the plaintiff under such contract or contracts so terminated, or to recover from the defendant commissions on collections of such amounts thereafter made by it; and said instructions should have been rejected for the further reason that there is no evidence tending to prove the facts therein recited. Instruction No. 2 was properly rejected, because there was no evidence before the jury tending to prove the facts therein stated. Instruction No. 3 was also properly rejected, for the reason that if the contract of February, 1889, was made to settle a dispute between the plaintiff and defendant, (and there is no proper testimony to show that such was the fact,) yet the contract must speak for itself, and it cannot be added to by parol testimony; and, even if it was made to settle a dispute, we can see no reason why, for that reason, the jury should find for the defendant.

It is also assigned as error that the court refused to exclude the plaintiff's evidence from the consideration of the jury, and also claimed that the court erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial, and rendering a judgment upon the verdict. These assignments may be considered together, as they both depend upon the character and weight of the testimony. In the case of Miller v. Insurance Co., 12 W. Va. 116, this court held that a new trial, asked on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, ought to be granted only in a case of plain deviation from right and justice, not in a doubtful case, merely because the court, if on the jury, would have given a different verdict. See, also, State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 759, 15 S. E. 991. See, also, State v. Hunter, 37 W. Va. 744, 17 S. E. 307, where it was held that where a motion for a new trial is made on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the motion is denied, the opinion of the court which tried the cause is on such point entitled to great respect in the appellate court, and the appellate court in such case will grant such new trial only in the case of a plain deviation from right and justice. There is some conflict in the testimony upon the questions of fact. The jury found the issue for the plaintiff, and the court below refused to disturb the verdict, after having seen the witnesses and heard them testify. Applying the principles of law above quoted to the facts proven, we cannot say that the finding of the jury was a deviation from right and justice, and for these reasons the judgment complained of must be affirmed, with costs.

BARNES SAFE & LOCK CO. v. BLOCH BROS. TOBACCO CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 4, 1893.)

SALE THROUGH AGENT — WHEN TITLE PASSES — RIGHTS OF SELLER AS AGAINST AGENT'S CRED-ITORS.

1. If a contract of agency is entered into, and the principal agrees to furnish to the agent on consignment certain manufactured articles, at a stipulated price, to be paid for when sold, such articles, when so furnished, remain the property of the principal until sold to a bona fide purchaser, and they cannot be executed and sold to pay the debts of the agent, and, if so sold, the purchaser gets no title to any such articles as against such principal.

2. The agent's right to a lien for commission and expenditures is one personal to himself, not transferable, and he alone has the right to take advantage of it.

Error to circuit court, Ohio county.

Action in detinue by the Barnes Safe & Lock Company against the Bloch Bros. Tobacco Company. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by DENT, J.:

On the 21st day of April, 1890, the Barnes Safe & Lock Company entered into a written contract of agency with the Globe Contract Company as follows, to wit: "Articles of agreement between the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa., composed of Thomas Barnes, of the first part, and the Globe Contract Company, of Wheeling, W. Va., a corporation of the state of West Virginia, of the second part, witnesseth, that, for and in consideration of the party of the second part assuming the agency for the manufactures of the party of the first part in the territory hereinafter mentioned, the party of the first part hereby agrees that the party of the second part shall have the privilege of selling their fire and burglar proof safes, vault doors, etc., in the city of Wheeling, W. Va.; also throughout the state of West Virginia; also in Green, Fayette, and Washington counties, in the state of Pennsylvania; and also in Belmont, Jefferson, and Columbiana counties, in the state of Ohio,—the state of West Va. and Belmont, Jefferson, and Columbiana counties, Ohio, to be considered as exclusive territory of the party of the second part, but Green, Fayette, and Washington counties, in the state of Pennsylvania, to be considered as open territory; and the party of the first part shall credit the party of the second part with the regular discounts as hereinafter set forth upon all work shipped into the exclusive territory before mentioned during the continuance of this agreement, whether the orders therefor shall come through the party of the second part or otherwise. The party of the first part further agrees that on all safes or other work sold by the party of the first part from the date hereof to the Westinghouse interests of Pittsburgh, Pa., the party of the second part is to be credited with one-half the amount received over the discounts hereinafter set forth, less the cost of delivering the safes on upper floors, no charge to be made party of the second part by party of the first on safes delivered to the Westinghouse interests on the ground floors in Pittsburgh only. The party of the first part grants to the party of the second part the following discounts from their regular price list, copy of which is hereto attached and made part hereof, viz.: From the prices mentioned in pages nine, eleven, and thirteen, seventy per cent., and fifteen per cent. off, and the same discounts from any other prices named in said price list, except that the burglar-proof part of any combination, fire, and burglar proof safes shall be calculated at ten cents per pound of actual weight, and except, further, that four tumbler iron-case locks for burglar-proof work shall be charged for extra, at twelve dollars each; four tumbler brass-case locks for burglar-proof work shall be charged for extra, at fourteen dollars each; and end-gear burglar-proof locks shall also be charged for extra. The party of the first part further agrees to furnish the party of the second part with a stock of safes on consignment, said safes to be paid for to the party of the first part when sold by party of the second part, and all safes, etc., sold direct by party of the second part, to be paid for to party of the first part in thirty days, by New York draft. The party of the first part also agrees to paint the name, 'The Globe Contract Co., Genl. Agts., Wheeling, W. Va.,' beneath their own name, 'The Barnes Safe & Lock Co.,' on all safes and other work shipped under this agreement into the territory of the party of the second part. It is understood that all prices given in price list are f. o. b. cars at Pittsburgh, Pa. In consideration of the foregoing, the party of the second part hereby agrees to assume the agency for the manufactures of the party of the first part in the territory herein named, and agrees to work said territory with diligence during the continuance of this agreement. This agreement may be terminated by either party's giving to the other thirty days' written notice of their intention of so doing, and at the end of thirty days this agreement shall be considered as canceled. In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto attached their hands and seals, this — day of —, 1890; the terms of this agreement, however, to have effect as if agreement were dated April 21st, 1890. Barnes Safe & Lock Co. [Seal.] Thomas Barnes. Witness: John H. Newell. Attest: John M. Sweeney, Secy. Globe Contract Co. W. D. Updegraff, Prest. F. R. Stewart, Genl. Mgr." This agency was continued until the 3d day of November, 1890, when the Barnes Safe & Lock Company sent the Globe Contract Company the following notice of the cancellation of the agency, to wit: "Barnes Safe and Lock Company, (Successors to Thomas Barnes & Burke & Barnes,) Manufacturers of Improved Fire and Burglar Proof Safes, Vault Doors, and Bank Locks. 124, 126, 127, 129, and 131 Third Ave., between Wood and Smithfield Streets. (Dictated.) Pittsburgh, Pa., Nov. 3rd, 1890. The Globe Contract Co., Wheeling, W. Va.—Gentlemen: We hereby notify you in writing that the contract that exists between us under date of April 21st, 1890, is canceled, according to the terms of the said contract. Please send us statement by return mail of the safes that you now have on hand; also, at the same time, send us N. Y. draft for the safes you have already sold from those we have sent you from time to time; also please advise us what you intend doing about the safes you have left. We thought, in making this contract with you, that you would be able to do us some good work. We are sorry that this step has to be taken, but under the circumstances, and in justice to our interests in the territory we laid aside for you, we hereby notify you that the said contract is canceled. Yours, truly, Barnes Safe & Lock Co. Jno. H. Newell,"—to which the following reply was sent: "The Globe Contract Company, Wheeling, W. Va. Electrical and Mechanical Engineering and Contracting Plans and Estimates Furnished on Application. Wheeling, W. Va., Nov. 7, 1890. Barnes Safe & Lock Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.—Gentlemen: Yours of 3d inst. to hand, and contents noted. We will prepare statement of sales and safes on hand, and in mean time will expect statement from you of work sold in the territory held by us of which we have had no statement as yet, though we have asked for it repeatedly, and, while we have kept an account of such as came to our knowledge, we naturally reason that we have not all of it on our books. Please attend to this at once, and on receipt of same we will submit our statement. As to safes in stock, you are the party to decide as to them, since you wish to discontinue the agency. They will be at your disposal at any time after we have adjusted matters as outlined above. Very respectfully, etc., Globe Contract Co. F. R. Stewart, Genl. Mgr." Thus matters were allowed to rest between them until the 9th day of July, 1891. The safe in controversy, being one of the safes consigned to the Globe Contract Company under the agreement aforesaid, was levied on and sold by an execution creditor as the property of the Globe Contract Company, and the defendant in error, Bloch Bros. Tobacco Company, became the purchaser thereof. The purchasers then wrote the following letter to the Barnes Safe & Lock Company: "The Bloch Bros. Tobacco Co., Wheeling, W. Va. Wheeling, W. Va., July 17, 1891. Barnes Safe & Lock Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.: We purchased the other day, at constable sale, one of your safes that was owned by the Globe Contract Co., which company failed. The safe was never used.

It is a burglar chest safe, No. 30,255. We purchased the same to put in our vault, and, upon measuring the same, find it is about 3 inches too wide. The object of this letter is to inquire if we could not exchange this safe for another one of such a size that we could get in our vault. An early answer will oblige yours, truly, The Bloch Bros. Tobacco Co." Thereupon the safe company immediately brought an action of detinue for the safe, or the value thereof,—$200,—before Justice George Arkle, who, on the 12th day of October, 1891, rendered judgment for the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant company appealed to the circuit court of Ohio county, and on the 13th day of February, 1892, the circuit court, neither party requiring a jury, heard the evidence, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff then applied for and obtained a writ of error, bringing the controversy before this court.

DENT, J., (after stating the facts.) The counsel for the defendant maintains that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed, because: (1) The safe had been sold by the plaintiff to the Globe Contract Company. (2) If that were not so, and the safe was in the hands of the Globe Contract Company as plaintiff's agents, the latter had a lien for the general balance due them, and the plaintiff, not having paid that balance, cannot recover. (3) The plaintiff stood by and saw the safe sold as property of the Globe Contract Company without making any claim. (4) The Globe Contract Company, a trader, not having complied with the provisions of section 13, c. 100, of the Code, this safe, acquired and used in its business, was liable for its debts. (5) If the contract was as claimed by plaintiff, it was an attempt to sell goods, reserving the title, and such reservation is void, under section 3, c. 74, of the Code.

On an examination of many decisions relating to contracts of this kind, we find them apparently contradictory and hard to reconcile; some holding that goods delivered under similar contracts are mere bailments for the purpose of sale; others, that they are sales with reservation of title, and therefore void, under the usual recording acts, as to creditors. But from all the general rule is deducible that the court must determine, from the wording of the contract itself and the circumstances surrounding it, the true intention of the parties in making it; and if the contract was entered into in the form of an agency contract, for the purpose of evading the statute requiring all reservations of title to be recorded, then it should be held void as to creditors. Such was the determination of the court in the case of Chickering v. Bastress, 130 Ill. 206, 22 N. E. 542.

But/where there is no attempt at evasion, but the contract is one of pure agency, providing for a consignment of goods to be paid for, at a fixed price, out of the proceeds of the goods when sold, this is a bailment for sale, and not a sale with reservation of title, and the title remains in the consignor until the goods are sold to a bona fide purchaser for value. Walker v. Butterick, 103 Mass. 238; Plow Co. v. Porter, 82 Mo. 23; Middleton v. Stone, 111 Pa. St. 589, 4 Atl. 523; Dando v. Foulds, 105 Pa. St. 74. "Ordinarily, if goods are 'consigned' for sale, it is a bailment, and not a sale to the consignee. The goods do not become his property or liable for his debts," "even though consigned on a del credere commission." And the fact that the goods consigned were invoiced at a stated price does not itself constitute the transaction a sale, unless the terms of the consignment be such as to make the consignee, when the goods are sold, the purchaser and principal debtor for the goods. Benj. Sales, (6th Ed.) p. 7; also, 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 340. Applying these principles to this case, we find that the contract entered into was one of pure agency, without any attempt or thought of evading the statutory law relating to the recordation of instruments when sales are made reserving the title, but a consignment of safes was made to the Globe Contract Company, as such agent, and not in any sense a purchaser, to have on hand to sell for the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, whenever a purchaser could be secured on not exceeding thirty days' time. If no sales were made, then there was no purchaser, and the safes could only be returned to the consignor. If a sale was made, the title passed, not through the consignee, but direct from the consignor to the purchaser; and the price passed through the hands of the consignee to the consignor, after deducting all over a given amount to pay commissions and expenses. It is true that the consignee could have become the purchaser of any of the safes, at any time it might wish to do so, by accounting for or paying the fixed price according to the contract to the consignor; and, when the consignor gave notice of cancellation, it gave the opportunity to the consignee to become the purchaser of any unsold safes, but this the consignee refused to do, but notified the consignor that the safes were at its disposal as soon as the accounts between them were properly adjusted. The consignor may have been guilty of some negligence in not taking steps at once after the cancellation of the contract to recover possession of the safes, but not so as to divest it of its title, as it was waiting for the statement from its agent. And there is no sufficient evidence to show that it stood by and saw the safe sold as the property of the Globe Contract Company without making claim. On the contrary, the proof clearly shows that it had no knowledge of the levy or sale until the letter written it by the defendant in this case, informing it of the purchase, and wanting to trade it for a different sized safe.

It is hardly worth while to notice the fourth proposition of defendant's counsel,—that the Globe Contract Company was a "trader," within the provisions of section 13, c. 100, of the Code,—because the Globe Contract Company did not do business as a trader with the addition of the words "factor," "agent," and "company," or "& Co.," within the meaning and contemplation of the statute, but it was doing business in its corporate name, and, while transacting other business, it undertook to act as an agent for the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, which fact was plainly painted on every safe handled by it as such agents. This, being a bailment, and not a sale with reservation of title, as heretofore determined, does not come under the provisions of section 3, c. 74, of the Code. To sustain the position taken by the defendant, his counsel quotes the law virtually as set out in syllabus 1, Chickering v. Bastress, 130 Ill. 208, 22 N. E. 542: "(1) Contract—Whether a Sale or Mere Bailment. Where the identical thing delivered is to be restored in the same or an altered form, the contract is one of bailment; but when there is no obligation to restore the specific article, and the person receiving it is at liberty to return another thing of equal value, he becomes a debtor to make a return, and the title to the property is changed,—it is a sale." The same law is laid down in Benjamin on Sales, (6th Ed. p. 5,) in these words: "On the other hand, it is now well settled that if the contract clearly contemplates, either by express provision or by established usage of the business, that the identical thing received will not be returned, but only its equivalent, either in the same form received, or in some manufactured condition, or else paid for in money, at the option of the receiver, the transaction is a sale or exchange. The title passes immediately on delivery, and the risk is on the receiver." This law, while it holds good as to certain kinds of bailments, has no application whatever to that class of bailments known as "consignments for sale," and was therefore improperly applied in the Illinois case above referred to. To so apply it is to do away with all bailments with power to sell, because there is no obligation in such case to restore the specific article, but only the value thereof in money, after a sale is made by the factor or consignee, or, in case no sale is made, then to restore the specific article; and the law quoted above from the fifth page of Benjamin on Sales would be directly in conflict with the law quoted from the seventh page of the same work, but to give the construction given in this opinion is to render both pages harmonious.

The only other point urged by the defendant's counsel is the one on which the circuit court, from the briefs, appears to have decided this case, and that is that the appellant was not entitled to recover possession of the safe in controversy, because the Globe Contract Company had a lien on it for unsettled commissions. It nowhere appears that such is the true state of affairs. Accounts appear to be unsettled, but which way the balance will fall is not made evident. Neither is the Globe Contract Company claiming any such lien. If it had one, it was personal to itself, and was waived when it permitted the safe to be taken from its custody, and it cannot be asserted by a third party. "None but the factor himself can set up this privilege against the owner. It is a personal privilege, and cannot be transferred, nor can the question upon it arise between any but the principal and the factor." 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 339; Holly v. Huggeford, 8 Pick. 73. The constable in this case levied on the safe by direction of the general manager, and apparently the only secured creditor of the Globe Contract Company, then wholly insolvent. This is no protection to the officer, nor to the purchaser who bought at the sale, because the doctrine caveat emptor applies in such cases with full force, and the inscription on the safe, "The Barnes Safe & Lock Co.," "The Globe Contract Co., Genl. Agts., Wheeling, W. Va.," was sufficient to put any reasonable man on his guard, especially as it was a new safe that has never been used; and it can hardly be doubted that such shrewd business men as compose the defendant were not fully informed as to the true state of the title to the safe, and purchased it as a matter of pure speculation. If not so informed, it was their own fault, as they knew where to find the owners of the safe. But whether they were or not does not alter the law of this case. "Persons dealing with factors concerning goods intrusted to them are charged with notice of the extent and limitations upon their powers; and if they deal with them as if they were acting for themselves, or as if they were dealing with their own property, such persons do so at their peril that such is the fact, or that the factor has special authority from the owner, or that, by the well-established and recognized usage and customs of trade in that line, the factor is authorized to deal with and dispose of the goods in the manner proposed. If the transaction is brought in question by the owner of the goods, the burden of proving the factor's authority is upon the party dealing with him." Kauffman v. Beasley, 54 Tex. 563; Story, Ag. § 225. There is no pretense or claim in this case that the Globe Contract Company, through its general manager, was authorized by the Barnes Safe & Lock Company to turn this safe over to the constable, to be sold and applied on the debts of the Globe Contract Company, and he, in so doing, acted wrongfully towards the true owners of the safe and the purchaser at the sale, but could not thereby deprive the true owners of their title, nor confer any title on the purchaser, because he was exceeding the authority conferred by the agency. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and judgment is rendered for the appellant, the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, for the safe in question, or, in lieu thereof, the sum of $125, the agreed value, with interest thereon until paid, and his costs in this and the circuit court and before the justice of the peace expended.

HOLSBERRY et al. v. POLING et al.

Nov. 11, 1893.)

CONTRIBUTION BETWEEN SURETIES — PARTIES — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — PLEADINGS — DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES.

1. Where a suit in equity is brought by one or more sureties against their cosureties to compel contribution, and a tract of land is sought to be sold as the property of one of said cosureties, which is claimed by the wife of said cosurety as having been purchased and paid for by her, although the title remains in her vendor, it is error to decree a sale of said tract of land so claimed by said wife without making said vendor a party to the suit.

2. In a suit of this character, when the bill alleges the insolvency of a cosurety, who is dead, and such allegation is not denied, but admitted, the heirs at law of such dead cosurety are not necessary parties to the suit.

3. Where mention of the land sought to be subjected as the property of said cosurety as fraudulently conveyed to his wife gives no description or clue of identity, except the naming of the county in which it lies, and there is nothing in the proceedings that renders it more certain, it is too indefinite to authorize any legal proceeding to subject the same.

Appeal from circuit court, Barbour county.

Action by William Holsberry and others against Perry F. Poling and others. From the decree rendered, defendant Poling and others appeal. Reversed.

J. Hop. Woods, for appellants. W. T. Ice and M. Peck, for appellees.

ENGLISH, P. One Jacob Hudkins, in the month of October, 1876, was elected sheriff of Barbour county, W. Va., for the term of four years, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1877, and on the 8th of December, 1876, he executed two bonds as such sheriff, one in the penalty of $20,000, and the other in the penalty of $40,000, with William Holsberry, Daniel Felton, J. W. Robinson, A. T. Crim, P. F. Poling, W. K. S. Stalnaker, Elam T. Poling, Andrew Valentine, and others, as his sureties. Some time during the year 1877, some of said sureties became dissatisfied, and declined to act further as such, and the county court of said county required said Hudkins to execute new bonds, which he did on the 3d day of December, 1877, in like penalties with said first-named bonds, with William Holsberry, J. W. Robinson, Daniel Felton, A. T. Crim, P. F. Poling, W. K. S. Stalnaker, Elam T.

Poling, Elliott Stalnaker, and Andrew Valentine as his sureties. The said sheriff defaulted and became insolvent, and left the state, owing large sums of money to the state of West Virginia, the county of Barbour, and to various persons, for which his said sureties were made liable. In January, 1882, the state of West Virginia brought suit upon the official bond of said Jacob Hudkins against him and his sureties, and process was issued therein, and executed on the said Hudkins and his said sureties in January, 1882, and on the 28th day of April, 1883, a judgment was rendered against A. Valentine, A. T. Crim, P. F. Poling, W. Holsberry, W. K. S. Stalnaker, D. Felton, and J. W. Robinson for the sum of $2,450.50, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent., and costs, which judgment was docketed in the judgment lien docket in the clerk's office of the county court of Barbour county. On the 13th day of March, 1882, a judgment was recovered in the name of the state of West Virginia, for the use of L. C. Elliott, against said Hudkins and his sureties upon his said bonds, for the sum of $377.30 and costs. On the 14th day of July, 1888, the state of West Virginia, for the use of Barbour county, recovered a judgment against said sureties upon said bonds for the sum of $618.21 and costs; and on the 22d day of October, 1888, James E. Heatherly, sheriff of Barbour county, recovered judgment upon said official bonds against said sureties for the sum of $608.75 and costs. Andrew Valentine died, leaving his widow, Rachel Valentine, and the following named infant children, surviving him, to wit, Sarah Valentine, Carry Belle Valentine, and E. Valentine. Said William Holsberry, Daniel Felton, A. T. Crim, and Jacob Robinson, having paid off the greater part of said judgments, filed their bill at June rules, 1889, in the circuit court of Barbour county, against Perry F. Poling and Elizabeth Poling, his wife, Leonard C. Bowman, William K. S. Stalnaker, and Martha Stalnaker, his wife, Elam T. Poling, Elliott Stalnaker, Jacob Hudkins, William H. H. Shaffer, William B. Poling, Shelton L. Reger, special commissioner, Warwick Hutton, administrator of Andrew Valentine, deceased, A. J. Valentine, Sarah E. Valentine, Carry Belle Valentine, and Rachel Valentine, claiming and alleging that they were entitled to be substituted to the benefit of the liens and judgment so paid by them, and to have contribution from their said cosecurities on the official bonds aforesaid, to the extent of their pro rata share of said liabilities as such cosecurities. Said bill, among other things, alleged that the said Andrew Valentine, then deceased, was the owner of valuable lands in Barbour county at the time he became surety upon said bonds, and even up to the time of said Hudkins' default; that he sold said lands, and with the proceeds purchased two valuable tracts of land in Randolph county, W. Va., which he procured to be deeded to his wife, the defendant Rachel Valentine, who was then the owner thereof; that said shuffling of property from the name of the said Andrew Valentine into the hands and name of his wife, the said Rachel Valentine, was done to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiffs from obtaining contribution from him, and that the said lands were liable, in the hands of Rachel Valentine, for his, the said Andrew's, proportion of the debts aforesaid. The plaintiffs were thus seeking to follow the proceeds of the lands alleged to have been sold in the county of Barbour by the said Andrew Valentine, and subject said lands in the county of Randolph, which they alleged had been purchased with said proceeds, to sale, to obtain contribution for the amounts they had paid as his cosecurities. In order that this might be done, the infant children of said Andrew Valentine were regarded as necessary parties, and made parties by the bill. The plaintiffs, by their bill, were demanding the sale of real estate, which they alleged was purchased with the money of their deceased father. It is true the defendant Rachel Valentine files her answer to this portion of the bill, denying in positive terms the allegations of the bill; and while she admits that her deceased husband owned real estate in Barbour county after he became one of the sureties of said Hudkins, which was sold, and the proceeds invested in land in Randolph county, yet she alleges that said land was sold under a deed of trust to pay debts of her husband, and that none of it was ever deeded to her or owned by her at any time, but claims that she owned some land in Randolph county, which was purchased with her own money, and she further alleges that her husband died intestate and insolvent. This answer was replied to generally. There is no proof of the insolvency of said Andrew Valentine, and there is no proof that the lands in the county of Randolph held by said Rachel Valentine were purchased with her own money, as alleged in her answer. In this case the administrator of the estate of Andrew Valentine was before the court, and the infant heirs at law were also made parties defendant, but the administrator failed to answer the bill, and the infant defendants were not represented by a guardian ad litem. Said bill further alleged that the defendant Perry F. Poling, after the execution of summons upon him in the action upon said bonds, to wit, on the 2d day of March, 1882, sold his farm of 200 acres of valuable land to the defendant Leonard C. Bowman for the sum of $2,000, and that said land was sold with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said Perry F. Poling, and especially to hinder, delay, and defraud the state of West Virginia, and all who might ever have the right to sue upon said official bonds of the said Hudkins, sheriff as aforesaid, and that he did so for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding plaintiffs from recovering from said Perry F. Poling his just and equitable part of said indebtedness aforesaid. Answers were filed by L. C. Bowman, Perry F. Poling, and Elizabeth Poling, putting in issue the allegations of the bill with reference to the fraudulent conveyance of the lands of said Poling to said Bowman.

Numerous depositions were taken in the case, and on the 20th day of February, 1891, a decree was rendered in the cause directing a commissioner therein named to ascertain and report the aggregate amounts to which the plaintiffs were entitled by way of contribution from the defendant Perry F. Poling, as one of the sureties of Jacob Hudkins, on his official bond as such sheriff, what payments had been made by plaintiffs, or what liabilities had been incurred by them, or either of them, as sureties on said bonds, for which they were entitled to contribution from said Perry F. Poling, etc., but required no report from said commissioner as to the alleged fraudulent conveyance made by Andrew Valentine, nor as to the amount he or his estate was liable to contribute towards the payment of said judgments, or to reimburse the plaintiffs for the amounts paid thereon by them. In compliance with the requirements of this decree, a report was made by a commissioner, ascertaining the amount said Perry F. Poling was liable for, leaving out of consideration any liability on the part of said Andrew Valentine, and finding that the tract of 153 acres described as containing 200 acres, which was conveyed by said Poling and wife to L. C. Bowman, was liable to the satisfaction of one-fifth of said judgment debts. This report was excepted to by the defendant Poling and wife and L. C. Bowman because no examination or finding was made touching the real estate of Andrew Valentine, deceased, or of the defendant William K. S. Stalnaker, as charged in the plaintiffs' bill, as to its liability and contribution to the debts found by the commissioner to be due to the plaintiffs from the defendant Poling, and because the allegations of plaintiffs' bill were taken for confessed as to the liability of said Valentine and Stalnaker for contribution, yet the report found and fixed the whole liability upon the defendant Perry F. Poling, without settling the rights and equities of the plaintiffs against said real estate of said Valentine and Stalnaker. These exceptions were overruled, said commissioner's report was confirmed, and a sale of the land conveyed by Poling and wife to L. C. Bowman was directed to be made, by commissioners therein appointed, to satisfy the liability of said P. F. Poling, thus ascertained; and from this decree the defendants P. F. Poling and wife and L. C. Bowman obtained this appeal.

It is assigned as error by the appellants that the court entered a decree of sale of the land sold by said Poling to Bowman before an inquiry had been made into the alleged liability of said Andrew Valentine and W. K. S. Stalnaker, and the alleged fraudulent transactions on their part. It is, however, distinctly alleged in the bill that said Andrew Valentine and W. K. S. Stalnaker were insolvent, and the allegations of the bill with reference to the fraudulent sales and purchases made by said Valentine in the name of his wife neither designate the kind of land sold by him, its amount or locality, except that it was situated in Barbour county. Neither does it describe in any manner the land purchased by him in the name of his wife in Randolph county, and the same is true with reference to the allegations of the bill in reference to the sales alleged to have been made by said Stalnaker, only, in making said allegations, it does not state in what county the lands sold by him were located. It simply alleges that he was the owner of valuable real estate at the time he became surety upon said bonds, and at the default of said Hudkins he suffered a chancery suit to be brought against him for certain pretended debts, in which suit his lands were sold, and his wife became the purchaser, and divided the same into small farms, and sold them out at a large profit, and that he and his wife have left the state, and are insolvent. These allegations are not regarded as sufficient, either as to said Valentine or Stalnaker, to authorize the court to take any definite action. It is impossible to tell what lands were sold by Valentine, or what lands he purchased with the proceeds; and, as to said Stalnaker, looking to the allegations of the bill, we cannot know what lands he owned, by whom they were subjected, or where they were located, and the court could take no definite action under said allegation. It was, however, alleged, and not denied, that both of these parties were insolvent, and in the case of Bruce v. Bickerton, 18 W. Va. 343, (third point of syllabus,) it has been held that, "in a suit in equity for contribution, it is not necessary to make parties to the suit the personal representatives of insolvent deceased cosureties, for whom the plaintiff has been compelled to pay money as cosurety." See, also, Montague's Ex'r v. Turpin's Adm'r, 8 Grat. 453, where it was held that "where two or three obligors in a bond are dead, or insolvent, and there is no personal representative of either of them, the obligee, coming into equity to enforce the payment of the debt against the personal representative of the other obligor, is not bound to have personal representatives of the deceased insolvent obligors appointed, and make them parties." Barton, in his Chancery Practice, (vol. 1, p. 217,) lays down the rule thus: "Where one surety sued another for contribution, it was held that the executor of a third surety, who was dead, ought to be a party, although he died insolvent; but the general rule is that if, in such cases, the principal is clearly insolvent, and the fact of insolvency is proved, he need not be a party," citing 1 Daniel, Ch. Pr. pp. 270, 271, where the author says: "And it seems from this circumstance, and also from the case of Lawson v. Wright, 1 Cox, 275, that if the principal is clearly insolvent, and can be proved to be so, (as by his taking advantage of an act for the relief of insolvent debtors,) he need not be a party to the suit." See, also, Story, Eq. Pl. § 169, and authorities there cited. And, as we have seen, in a suit for contribution by one or more of the sureties of a joint and several bond against his cosureties, the representative of a deceased insolvent cosurety is not a necessary party.

The sale of said 14-acre tract mentioned and described in the bill as having been purchased from Adam Harsh, the title of which yet remains in said Adam Harsh, from whom it was purchased without first bringing said Adam Harsh before the court as a party to the suit, is also assigned as error; and although counsel for appellees, in their brief, seem disposed to pass it over as a harmless error, we must regard it differently. The general principle is that the party holding the legal title must be brought before the court before a sale can be made under its decree, and the title passed to a purchaser. It has so been held where the legal title is outstanding in a trustee. See the cases Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 657, (fifth point syllabus.) In the case of Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 562, Judge Green, in delivering the opinion of the court, quotes from Story's Equity Pleading, (section 72,) as follows, (in speaking of necessary parties:) "One of these is a principle admitted in all courts upon questions affecting the suitor's person and liberty, as well as property, namely, that the rights of no man shall be finally decided in a court of justice unless he himself was present, or at least unless he has had a full opportunity to appear and vindicate his rights. Another is that, when a decision is made upon any particular subject, the rights of all persons whose interests are immediately connected with that decision, and affected by it, shall be provided for, as far as they reasonably may." Adam Harsh, for some reason, has seen proper to retain the title to said 14-acre tract of land; and he has not been afforded an opportunity, in this suit, of saying why he does so. When parties purchase and pay for land, it is not usual for the purchaser to allow the legal title to remain in the vendor, and, if we are left to conjecture, we must say he has some good reason for so doing; but, be that as it may, he holds the legal title to the tract of land. It was error to decree the sale of it, without bringing him before the court. See, also, Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 653, 11 S. E. 68.

The appellant Bowman alleges that it was error to sell his land, and at the same time sell for the same debt the 14 acres claimed by plaintiffs to have been bought with money paid by him to Perry F. Poling in the purchase of the 200 acres and the 8½ acres. As to this assignment of error, there is no allegation in the bill that said 14 acres of land were purchased by Elizabeth Poling with money derived from her husband or from said Bowman as part of the purchase money for said 200 and 8½ acre tracts of land. The deposition of Elizabeth Poling shows that she paid the purchase money for said 14 acres in stock; that she raised grain on her brother-in-law's land, and traded it for stock, which she paid on the land; so that, so far as the allegations and proofs go, there is no foundation for said exception. As we are of opinion that there was error in decreeing the sale of said 14 acres of land in the absence of Adam Harsh, we deem it unnecessary, at present, to discuss the testimony as to the manner in which said 14 acres of land were paid for, and by whom, as there will, no doubt, be additional testimony, when the cause is remanded, and the proper parties are brought before the court. I will, however, say that if it is then made to appear that said 14-acre tract and 44-acre tract were purchased by said Elizabeth Poling with money obtained from her husband, derived either from the sale of said 208¼ acres or otherwise, said 14-acre tract and 44-acre tract should be sold, as the property of Perry F. Poling, before said 208¼-acre tract is subjected to sale.

As to the error assigned in finding the sum of $630, with interest, since March 2, 1882, the commissioner's report was made for the purpose of assisting the court in ascertaining the liabilities of the defendants, and the court had the right to take the information thus derived, and modify the report so as to reach the result sought to be ascertained; but, as the report will have to be recommitteed, it will be of no benefit to discuss it, as it now stands.

As to the error based upon the fact that no guardian ad litem was appointed for the infant children of Andrew Valentine, deceased, our conclusion is that, said Andrew Valentine being confessedly insolvent, his heirs were not necessary parties. Neither was it necessary that they should appear by guardian ad litem. And as to the sixth error assigned, to the action of the court in entering a decree of sale until the liability of said Andrew Valentine and W. K. S. Stalnaker, and the fraudulent conveyance made by them, had been inquired into, we conclude that such inquiry was unnecessary, on account of the insolvency of the said parties.

As to the seventh error assigned, to wit, in the court's reserving the consideration of the sale of said 44 acres because of the pendency of said suit of Heatherly v. Poling, we cannot see that the appellants are prejudiced by said action. The decree complained of is reversed, and the cause remanded.

TYGART'S VAL. BANK v. TOWN OF PHILIPPI et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1893.)

ILLEGAL TAXATION — RESTRAINING COLLECTION — REMOVING CLOUD ON TITLE — EQUITY JURISDIC-TION.

1. If a municipal corporation, in taxing property, acts ultra vires by taxing property which it has the right to tax, beyond the limit fixed by the organic law conferring the power to tax, a court of equity will, on a bill filed by the owner of the property so illegally or excessively taxed, enjoin the collection of the taxes illegally assessed.

2. A court of equity has jurisdiction in such a case to remove a cloud from the title of real estate where the property assessed is partly of that character. It also has jurisdiction to restrain the collection of such taxes so illegitimately assessed because the action of the municipal corporation was ultra vires.

Appeal from circuit court, Barbour county.

Action by the Tygart's Valley Bank against the town of Philippi and others to restrain the collection of certain taxes. There was decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dayton & Dayton and William T. Lee, for appellant. J. Hop. Woods, for appellees.

ENGLISH, P. This was a suit in equity, brought by the Tygart's Valley Bank, a corporation formed under the laws of the state of West Virginia, against the town of Philippi, a municipal corporation under the laws of this state, in the circuit court of Barbour county, seeking to restrain and enjoin the defendant from the collection of $145, which is the residue of a tax ticket of $605.75, which the plaintiff claims the defendant exceeded its legal powers in assessing against its real and personal estate, which was assessed the same year for state, county, and district purposes at $46,075. The bill alleges, in substance, that the plaintiff is a duly-chartered corporation under the laws of the state of West Virginia, and engaged in a general banking business in said town of Philippi; that said town is a municipal corporation under the laws of the state of less than 10,000 inhabitants; that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of a lot within the limits of said municipal corporation, upon which stands a two-story brick building, in which its general banking business is conducted; that said banking building and lot upon which the same is situated is assessed for the year 1892 for state, county, and district taxation purposes at the value of $1,075, and the said plaintiff is further assessed for state, county, and district purposes as and for its personal property and value of its stocks, bonds, etc., for the same year upon a valuation of $45,000, making a total valuation of $46,075 taxable property within the limits of said municipal corporation assessable and subject to taxation as shown by the assessor's books of said county, and as regularly assessed for state, county, and district purposes as aforesaid; that both by the general law of this state governing cities, towns, and villages of less than 10,000 inhabitants, as also by a distinct ordinance of said municipal corporation, the town of Philippi, it is expressly provided that all tax levies for the purposes of said municipal corporation should be made upon values assessed for state and county purposes, and not otherwise; that, notwithstanding these plain provisions of the law of the state and the ordinances of the said town, the said defendant corporation, acting by and through its town council, on the — day of —, 1892, appointed the defendant John H. Daniels assessor for said town, and the said Daniels, utterly disregarding said law and his duty in the premises, and wholly ignoring the assessment for state and county purposes, assessed the real property of the plaintiff at $1,075 and the personal property, stocks, bonds, etc., of plaintiff at $59,500, or a total assessment of $60,575 upon the real and personal property of plaintiff, being an excess of $14,500 over the assessment made for county and state purposes; and the said municipal corporation subsequently, upon said illegal assessment made by said Daniels, levied a tax against the said plaintiff for municipal purposes of $1 upon the $100 of said value and assessment ascertained by said town assessor Daniels, and caused a tax bill for the sum of $605.75 to be made out and placed in the hands of the said John H. Daniels, whom they had also appointed tax collector, for collection; and that the said Daniels had not only demanded payment thereof, but had been actively engaged in seeking to enforce collection. Plaintiff also alleged that under the organic law of the state said municipal corporation was prevented from levying a higher rate than $1 on the $100 of values ascertained for state and county purposes, and by the same laws of the state all assessments, fines, and penalties imposed by the authorities of such municipal corporations were expressly made liens upon the real estate, and as such liens have priority over all other liens except the liens for taxes due the state, county, and district; and plaintiff charged that the illegal levy so made and based upon the illegal assessment aforesaid constituted a lien upon the real estate of the plaintiff situated within the limits of said municipal corporation. Plaintiff further alleged that, recognizing the right of said defendant corporation to levy a rate of one dollar upon the hundred upon the values ascertained for state and county purposes, the plaintiff, on the 17th day of December, 1892, before the institution of this suit, tendered to the said John H. Daniels, through its agent and cashier, the sum of $460.75, the amount of $1 on $46,075, the value of the real and personal estate as as-essed against it for state and county purposes, which tender was made by said plaintiff to be in full of the assessment for the said year 1892, due from it to the said corporation; that the said John H. Daniels, when said tender was made, refused to accept the same as being in full of said assessment and levy, but unlawfully seized upon the same, stated it should be credited upon said tax bill, and was seeking to collect the remainder of said bill, to wit, the sum of $145, from the plaintiff. The plaintiff also charged that the remaining portion of said tax bill was wholly illegal, null, and void, but that the same constituted a cloud upon the title of the said plaintiff's real estate, and the plaintiff prayed that the defendants might be enjoined from collecting the remaining $145 of said tax bill until the matters therein set forth might be inquired of, and that they might be perpetually enjoined and restrained from its collection, and the cloud thereof on the title to plaintiff's said real estate be wholly removed, etc. The defendants filed a demurrer to the plaintiff's bill, and also filed their answers, putting in issue the material allegations of said bill, and gave notice of a motion to dissolve said injunction in vacation, which motion having been heard on the 28th day of January, 1893, the demurrer to said bill was sustained, the injunction was dissolved, and from this decree the plaintiff applied for and obtained this appeal.

The first error assigned and relied on by the appellant is the action of the court in sustaining said demurrer to the plaintiff's bill. Looking merely to the form of the bill, we find it in all respects conforms to the statute as prescribed in section 37 of chapter 125 of the Code. It is however, contended by counsel for the appellees that the demurrer should have been sustained for want of equitable jurisdiction. Now, it is charged in the bill that both by the general law of this state governing cities, towns, and villages of less than 10,000 inhabitants, as also by ordinance of said municipal corporation, (the town of Philippi,) it is expressly provided that all tax levies for the purposes of said municipal corporation shall be made upon values assessed for state and county purposes; and if this allegation was not for the purpose of considering the demurrer to be regarded as true, when we turn to the statute (section 100 of chapter 29 of the Code) we find it expressly provided that "taxes for county, district, city, town and village purposes shall be levied only upon the values of property ascertained for state purposes, provided this section shall not apply to taxes for city purposes in cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants;" and it is distinctly alleged in the bill that said town of Philippi is a municipal corporation under the laws of the state of West Virginia, of less than 10,000 inhabitants. It is also alleged that the real estate of the appellant for the year 1892 was assessed for state, county, and district purposes at the value of $1,075, and its personal property and value of its stocks, bonds, etc., for the same year upon a valuation of $45,000, making a total valuation of $46,075 taxable property within the limits of said municipal corporation assessable and subject to taxation as shown by the assessor's books of said county, and as regularly assessed for state, county, and district purposes, as aforesaid; and notwithstanding these facts the assessor of said municipal corporation assessed the real property of the appellant at $1,075, and the personal property, stocks, bonds, etc., at $59,500, making a total assessment upon the real and personal property of appellant of $60,575 being an excess of $14,500 over the assessment made for state and county purposes; and said municipal corporation levied a tax of $1 upon the $100 valuation thus assessed and placed in the hands of its collector, who was seeking to enforce its collection. By section 36 of chapter 47 of the Code, "there shall be a lien on real estate within such city, town or village for the city, town or village taxes assessed thereon and for all other assessments, fines and penalties assessed or imposed upon the owners thereof by the authorities of such city, town or village from the time the same are so assessed or imposed which shall have priority over all other liens, except the lien for taxes due the state, county and district and may be enforced by the council in the same manner now provided by law for the enforcement of the lien for county taxes or in such other manner as the council may by ordinance prescribe." The plaintiff, in his bill, alleges that the amount of said tax bill in excess of $460.75, to wit, the sum of $145, is wholly illegal, null, and void, but that the same constitutes a cloud upon the title of the said plaintiff's real estate. The question, then, for our consideration is whether equity has jurisdiction by way of injunction under this state of facts to restrain the collection of said sum of $145, which is in excess of the amount with which said property was legally chargeable. In the case of City of Richmond v. Crenshaw, 76 Va. 936, it was held (second point of syllabus) that "by a long course of decisions it has been settled that the remedy against the attempt to coerce the payment of an illegal tax is by injunction." Can there be any question as to the fact that the tax is illegal which said municipal corporation sought to enforce the payment of, as set forth in the pleadings in this case? There can be but one answer to this question. It was a tax levied in contravention of the plain provisions of the statute. Said town transcended its powers by levying its rate beyond the limit prescribed by law. Dillon (2 Mun. Corp. § 922) says: "Upon a survey of decisions in Great Britain and the United States, while they exhibit some diversity of opinion, it seems to us, in view of the nature of municipal powers, the danger of abuse, the necessity for prompt remedy on the part of those most interested in the proper administration of municipal affairs, to wit, the taxable inhabitants, that the following conclusions rest upon sound reason, and have also the support of the decided preponderance of judicial authority:

(1) The proper parties may resort to equity, and equity will, in the absence of restrictive legislation, entertain jurisdiction of their suit against municipal corporations and their officers, when these are acting ultra vires, or assuming or exercising a power over the property of the citizen, or over corporate property or funds which the law does not confer upon them, and where such acts affect injuriously the property owner or the taxable inhabitant." Pomeroy, in his valuable work on Equity Jurisprudence, (volume 1, [2d Ed.] § 260,) in treating of this question, says: "In a large number of the states the rule has been settled in well-considered and often-repeated adjudications by courts of the highest character for ability and learning that a suit in equity will be sustained when brought by any number of taxpayers joined as coplaintiffs, or by one taxpayer suing for himself and all others similarly situated, or sometimes even by a single taxpayer suing on his own account, to enjoin the enforcement and collection, and to set aside and annul any and every kind of tax or assessment laid by county, town, or city authorities, either for general or special purposes, whether it be entirely personal in its nature and liability or whether it be made a lien on the property of each taxpayer, whenever such tax is illegal. * * * In the face of every sort of objection urged against a judicial interference with the governmental and executive function of taxation, these courts have uniformly held that the legal remedy of the individual taxpayer against an illegal tax either by action for damages, or perhaps by certiorari, was wholly inadequate; and that to restrict him to such imperfect remedy would in most instances be a substantial denial of justice which conclusion is, in my opinion, unquestionably true."

It is claimed by the appellant in its bill that the taxes illegally assessed upon its land created a cloud thereon, and that this fact would confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity. This position, however, is earnestly controverted by counsel for the appellee. This, however, is no longer an open question in this state, as we find that this court held in the case of Powell v. City of Parkersburg, 28 W. Va. 698, "that, as taxes assessed on real estate without any lawful authority create a cloud upon the title thereof, a court of equity will for that cause alone entertain a bill to remove the cloud by perpetually enjoining the collection of such illegal taxes." The only question, then, is whether said sum of $145 was illegally assessed against the appellant's property. If so, it creates a lien upon the real estate, and is expressly so declared to be by statute whether it was assessed upon the value of the realty or personality, and, as we have seen, constitutes a cloud upon the title, which alone would confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity. So, also, in the case of Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 667, this court held in the third point of the syllabus, that "if a municipal corporation erroneously or illegally taxes property which it has the power to tax in a proper manner, the remedy for such error must be sought generally in a court of law; but if it acts ultra vires, by taxing property not subject to taxation, or taxes property which it may tax beyond the limit fixed by the organic law conferring the power to tax, a court of equity will, on a bill filed by the owner of the property so illegally or excessively taxed, enjoin the collection of such taxes." In the case we are considering said municipal corporation taxed property which it might tax beyond the limit fixed by law conferring upon it the power to tax, and under the authority just cited a court of equity would enjoin the collection of such taxes. Snyder, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Christie v. Malden, supra, says: "The distinction established and recognized by the decisions between the cases, in which equity will and in which it will not take jurisdiction, is well defined by Lord Cottenham in Frewin v. Lewis, 4 Mylne & C. 249, 255. He says: 'So long as the public functionaries strictly confine themselves within the exercise of those duties which are confided to them by law, this [chancery] court will not interfere * * * to see whether any regulation they make is good or bad, but if they are departing from that power which the law has vested in them, if they are assuming to themselves a power over property which the law does not give them, this court no longer treats them as acting under the authority of their commission, but treats them, whether they be a corporation or individuals, merely as persons dealing with property without legal authority. While the court avoids interfering with what they do while keeping within the limits of their jurisdiction, it takes care to confine them within those limits; if they go beyond the line of their authority, and infringe or violate the rights of others, they become, like all other individuals, amenable to the jurisdiction of this court by injunction.'" See 2 High, Inj. § 1241; Carter v. City of Chicago, 57 Ill. 288. In the case before us the allegations made in the bill in the light of the authorities I have cited in my opinion clearly confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity to restrain the collection of the taxes improperly assessed, for the reason that the act of making such assessment was ultra vires, and for the further reason that such assessment cast a cloud upon the appellant's title to said real estate which it had a right to come into a court of equity to have removed. We are therefore of opinion that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to plaintiff's bill, and in dissolving said injunction. The decree complained of must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded, with costs to the appellant.

YORK v. FREE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 25, 1893.)

APPEAL FROM JUSTICE COURT—DOCKET ENTRY.

Action before a justice by York against Bert Free. An entry on the docket reads: "1891, April 4th, H. H. Free appeared and filed bond with Frank Burt as security, and asks that an appeal be granted to the circuit court of Marion county. Bond approved, and appeal granted. J. F. Christy, Justice." The appeal bond recites the appeal as asked by Bert Free. The appeal is to be regarded as taken by Bert Free, not H. H. Free.

Error to circuit court, Marion county.

Action by James York against Bert Free. From a judgment dismissing an appeal from a justice's court, defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. B. Fleming, for plaintiff in error. C. Powell, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. In an action before a justice by York against Bert Free judgment was rendered, and an appeal taken. In the circuit court Free moved the court to allow an amendment of the transcript from the justice's docket to cure a mistake in it, and the appellee objected to the amendment, and moved the court to dismiss the appeal as improvidently awarded, and the court refused to allow the amendment, and dismissed the appeal as improvidently awarded, and Free obtained this writ of error. The alleged defect in the justice's record made the ground for dismissal of the appeal is that the appeal was not taken by Bert Free but by H. H. Free. Of course, no one but a party can take an appeal; but is this appeal to be regarded as one taken by H. H. Free? That depends partly on this entry in the justice's docket, found in regular order of entries in the case under the proper title of the action: "1891, April 4th, H. H. Free appeared and filed bond with Frank Burt as security, and asks that an appeal be granted to the circuit court of Marion county. Bond approved, and appeal granted. J. F. Christy, Justice." Take this entry alone. Properly construed, it shows an appeal by Bert Free. A suitor in a justice's court may appear by agent. The motion was not to dismiss the appeal because of want of authority of H. H. Free to act for Bert Free. We must presume such authority after an appeal has been perfected. We construe the entry as showing an appearance by H. H. Free for Bert Free as his agent, and asking an appeal, not for himself, a stranger to the cause, but for Bert Free, a party; not for York, as he had no occasion to appeal, having obtained judgment for the full amount of his demand, but for Bert Free, the one—the only one—against whom that judgment was rendered. The courts say that proceedings before justices must be dealt with with liberality in order to support and make them reach the ends of justice. Section 180, c. 50, Code, specially provides as to the docket that, "so far as the entries in the docket are concerned the form shall be regarded as immaterial, if the truth be stated so as to be intelligible." Now, why construe this entry so as to make it do the absurd thing of granting an appeal to an utter stranger, when it does not say so, and it is consistent with its language to construe it as intended to grant an appeal to the only party to whom it could be properly granted? If the entry says a party appears and asks an appeal, we take it that he asks it for himself, he being a party; but when he is not a party, that inference is unreasonable; and if we make inference we adopt the reasonable one,—that he is seeking an appeal as agent for one who is a party. When this entry says "appeal granted," and does not say expressly to whom, shall we not say it is granted to a party to the record, rather than a stranger, who could not, under any circumstances, appeal, especially as there are but two parties only one of whom could appeal? The entry says, "Bond approved, and appeal granted." When once an appeal bond is accepted and approved, an appeal is in being, and the justice's further action in sending up a transcript from his docket and the papers is only ministerial; and, as there was only one party who could appeal, the approval of the bond gave only him an appeal. Go a step further. Bert Free, in the circuit court, appeared in this appeal as appellant, and moved to correct the supposed mistake. His affidavit in support of the motion, and H. H. Free's also, show that he was made agent to ask the appeal. He thus ratified the act of H. H. Free as his agent, and adopted the appeal as his, and he would be estopped and bound by judgment on the appeal, and the circuit court should have further entertained the appeal as his. Go still a step further. The appeal bond recites the action and judgment before the justice, and that Bert Free desired an appeal. This bond is part of the record. It ought to be looked to as well as the docket. Read with it, if the docket could be regarded uncertain, the bond makes certain who is appellant. The bond's not being signed by Bert Free makes no difference, as a stranger may give it. I do not think it was at all necessary to amend the transcript from the justice's docket. We must therefore reverse the order of dismissal, overrule the motion to dismiss, and remand, with direction to the circuit court to proceed with the appeal according to law.

BLUESTONE COAL CO. v. BELL et al.
Nov. 22, 1893.)

MINING LEASE—ABANDONMENT—COLLATERAL CONTRACT—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—LACHES.

1. Where a lease is executed to a party, of all coal, timber, and mineral privileges on a certain tract of land, for the term of 99 years thence ensuing, the lessee agreeing to pay 10 cents per ton for the coal mined and shipped therefrom, and for all such timber as said lessee may think merchantable, which may be cut, shipped, sawed, or moved from said leased premises, 50 cents per 1,000 square feet of lumber of inch thickness, and a proportionate sum for other thicknesses, or 25 cents per tree, at the discretion of said lessees or their assigns, no time being fixed for the commencement of operations, the lessor has a right to presume that said operations will be commenced in a reasonable time.

2. If nothing has been done under said contract for the period of 17 years from the date of the contract, the lessor has a right to presume the contract has been abandoned, and said lessee or his assigns cannot, after having been guilty of such laches, restrain said lessor from cutting and using the timber on said land by enjoining him from cutting and removing the same.

3. Where it is made apparent that said lease was entered into under a mutual mistake as to the existence of a workable vein of coal in said land, and that said timber contract was induced by the belief that such coal did so exist, and to aid the lessee in his mining operations, said contract should be rescinded, not only as to the coal, but as to the timber.

4. In order that a party may have specific performance of a contract, he must not be in default, but must show himself to have been ready, eager, prompt, and desirous of maintaining his rights. The rule of laches is more strictly applied in cases of this character than in ordinary suits for accounts, etc.

Appeal from circuit court, Mercer county; R. C. McLaugherty, Judge.

Action by the Bluestone Coal Company against David Bell and Ralph Shrader to restrain defendants from cutting and removing timber from certain land. There was a decree for plaintiff, and defendant Bell appeals. Reversed.

A. C. Davidson and Okey Johnson, for appellant. J. S. Clark and A. W. Reynolds, for appellee.

ENGLISH, P. On the 28th day of March, 1872, David Bell, of Mercer county, entered into a written agreement with Eli Bailey, Harrison W. Straley, David E. Johnston, and Isalah Bee, whereby he demised and leased unto them, their personal representatives and assigns, all coal, timber, and mineral rights and privileges whatsoever contained on, in, and beneath the surface of all and every part, portion, and acre of his, the said David Bell's, farm lands, ground, property, and possessions, lying and being in the county of Mercer, W. Va., on the waters of the Bluestone, adjoining James Bell, Green Belcher, and Calties, and others, and containing 150 acres, be the same more or less, to have and to hold the same from the date of said agreement, for the period of 99 years thence ensuing; and the said Bailey, Straley, Johnston, and Bee, their personal representatives and assigns, agreed to well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the said David Bell, the lessor thereof, during the said term, period, and space mentioned, for and in consideration of said demise, a rent of 10 cents per ton of 2,240 pounds for each and every ton of coal and minerals mined and shipped therefrom; and, for all such timber as the lessees might think merchantable, they agreed to pay or cause to be paid to the said David Bell, his personal representatives or assigns, when the same was shipped, cut, sawed, or moved from said leased premises, at the rate of 50 cents per 1,000 square feet of lumber of inch thickness, or a proportionate sum for other thicknesses, or 25 cents per tree, at the discretion of the lessees, their personal representatives, etc.; and the said Bailey, Straley, Johnston, and Bee, their personal representatives, successors, and assigns, might and should have and enjoy full and free access, ingress, and egress into, or beneath, and over said lands, for the purpose of opening, mining, and shipping the coal and other minerals thereon and therein, and for the cutting, sawing, and removing lumber, and to build and erect the necessary buildings and machinery to operate and work the same, with undisturbed right of way for all necessary roadways to and from their or his said mines, timbers, and works; and the further consideration of one dollar to him in hand paid by the said Bailey, Straley, Johnston, and Bee, the receipt whereof was thereby acknowledged by the said David Bell, the same to be binding upon his heirs, administrators, successors, and assigns, which agreement was acknowledged by the parties thereto, and was admitted to record in the recorder's office of Mercer county on the 23d day of September, 1872. By successive transfers at different dates, the said lease came into the hands of the Bluestone Coal Company, the appellee, on the 30th day of June, 1884, and some time in the year 1890 said Bluestone Coal Company filed its bill in the circuit court of Mercer county against said David Bell and Ralph Strader, setting forth therein the terms of said agreement, and the various transfers thereof, and alleging that under said lease it had the exclusive privilege of cutting, manufacturing, and using the timber on the said land during the said term of 99 years, and that said David Bell, and those claiming under him, had nothing whatever to do with the timber growing upon said leased premises, and had no more right to interfere with the same, in any manner whatever, than they would have if the plaintiff was the absolute owner of the said leased premises in fee simple, until after the said period of 99 years. Said plaintiff further alleged that the said David Bell had entered into some sort of an arrangement with the defendant Shrader, under which they were cutting, manufacturing, and destroying the timber upon the said leased premises, and that the said timber was not being cut, manufactured, and destroyed as aforesaid for farming and building purposes on the said leased premises; that it was the owner of a large area of coal lands in the immediate vicinity of the said leased tract of land and premises, and was then extensively engaged in mining coal from the said lands; that, in order to enable it to carry on its said mining operations, it was necessary to use in the said mines a large amount of timber; that the timber in the vicinity of its said mines was rapidly being used up, and that, in order to be able to continue its business of mining, it will be obliged to continue the use of large quantities of timber, and that, in order to meet the said necessity for timber, it was of great importance to it that the timber on said leased premises should be preserved to meet the future demands aforesaid for timber; that if the said Bell was permitted to cut, manufacture, and destroy the timber from said leased premises, and plaintiff was forced to resort to its action for damages against said Bell, the present market value of the timber would be nothing to compare with the special value of the said timber to the plaintiff for the purposes aforesaid; that the value of said timber to the plaintiff was many times its present market value; and that if the defendants were permitted to cut, manufacture, and destroy the said timber, it would be compelled in the future to supply the place of the said timber by buying and shipping timber from a great distance, at ruinous freight rates, and that it would be irreparably damaged thereby. And plaintiff charged, upon information and belief, that, unless the defendants were restrained by a court of equity from so doing, they would cut, manufacture, and destroy all of the timber upon the said leased premises, and it would suffer irreparable damage thereby; and plaintiff prayed that said David Bell and Ralph Shrader, and all other persons, their employes, servants, agents, etc., be restrained by injunction from cutting, manufacturing, or in any manner interfering with or destroying, the timber on the said leased premises, during the said term of 99 years, and for general relief. This bill was sworn to on the 27th day of June, 1889, and an injunction was awarded on the 1st day of July, 1889, by the judge of said circuit court in vacation, restraining said Ralph Shrader and David Bell, their agents and servants, from cutting, sawing, or removing from the 150 acres of land in the bill and Exhibit A described the timber growing thereon, except for farming and building purposes needed by said David Bell personally on said land, until the further order of said circuit court, or a judge in vacation.

answer was replied to generally. In his answer the said David Bell admitted the execution of the paper exhibited with plaintiff's bill, which he avers was miscalled a lease, and alleges that in fact said paper, though such in form, was not in legal effect a lease, but that it was a mere optional contract, speculative in its character, entered into on the part of said Bailey and others for purely speculative purposes, and for a long number of years it had been abandoned, and was only sought to be revived by David E. Johnston and H. W. Straley and their associates after new events and developments, not contemplated when the paper was executed, made it desirable on their part to do so. That said paper was executed in 1872, when it was expected to secure the construction of a railroad from Hinton, up New river, to Bluestone; thence up Bluestone; the parties, at the time said paper was executed, asserting, and the defendant believing, that he had coal on his land, and that said railroad would be built within the then short period of five years from the date of said paper. That the scheme of constructing said railroad never materialized, and the whole matter, and all so-called contracts of every kind entered into on these facts, were completely abandoned. That some years afterwards the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company went to work in good faith to build a railroad to Bluestone, to develop its immense coal fields lying north of the Bluestone river, and gave evidence of business and wonderful development by building a mining town and opening mines at what is now Pocahontas. That defendant's land happened to lie south of Bluestone river, where it is considered by all parties there is no coal; and said Straley and Johnston did not buy the defendant's coal land, as they did that of others lying north of Bluestone river, but went to work deliberately to speculate on said old paper, by assigning it to the Bluestone Coal Company, in violation of right and justice. That the real consideration which induced the defendant to execute said paper was the representations relied on and believed: (1) That said railroad up Bluestone would be built in five years; (2) that defendant's land contained valuable and extensive coal veins, which said Bailey and others would proceed promptly to work, and pay defendant large sums for his royalty of 10 cents per ton, as per stipulations in the paper; (3) in view of the above benefits, defendant agreed also to part with his timber at the nominal price named; (4) there was no other consideration whatever, either actual or nominal, which induced the execution of said paper. The one dollar named was in fact not paid. That nothing had ever been done by any of the parties toward carrying out the real contract. In fact, its performance was impossible at the very time of its execution; the real subject-matter and substantial inducement to the contract being the supposed existence of valuable coal veins on said lands, when none such in fact existed; so that, by the mutual mistake of all parties concerned, they went through the form of contracting about a supposed subject-matter that had no existence, and the supposed existence of which was the real and only inducement to the so-called contract. That, as to the timber, defendant never would have entered into any such agreement to sell his timber at the nominal prices named, had he for a moment thought that he was dealing about the timber alone, and that in view of these facts, the said Bailey, Johnston, and others having done absolutely nothing towards carrying out said contract on their part, the real inducement to the contract, namely, the existence thereon of coal, having failed, and the timber of defendant having become valuable from other causes, for which the said Bailey, Johnston, and others are in no wise responsible, to now allow the pretensions of the bill would be most unjust, inequitable, and unreasonable,—in fact, in violation of common justice and equity. The defendant also claimed that the plaintiff could not occupy the favored position of purchaser for value without notice, for the obvious reason that all purchasers are held to have notice of all facts, where the information they have would lead to inquiry; that the plaintiff knew or ought to have known that nothing had been done under said paper to vest any rights whatever; that the plaintiff well knew that there was no coal on said land before it became the purchaser thereof, if a purchaser at all for value; that it well knew from the face of the paper the character of the agreement, and could have ascertained the real facts by applying to the defendant, and that David E. Johnston and H. W. Straley acted as the agents of the plaintiff in making said contract, and thus had actual knowledge of all the real facts; that said paper of March, 1872, is, in legal effect, virtually nothing but a contract at will, which, of course, must be at the will of both parties, and the failure of said Bailey and others to do anything under the contract for the long time named above, and the actual abandonment thereof, as above set forth, was equivalent to—in fact, was—an exercise of their will, which terminated and put an end to the so-called contract; that the plaintiffs had notice, in contemplation of law, of all this, and were bound by it; that the plaintiff avers in its bill that it is operating extensive coal operations on its lands north of Bluestone river, which is true, but the bill is discreetly silent as to any intention on the part of plaintiff to ever do any mining on defendant's land; that this is no oversight, for they or it well knew that there was no coal on defendant's land, but wants defendant's timber for its mining purposes; and he denies plaintiff's right to it. Defendant further alleges that, in the usual course of husbandry, he has had a portion of his land cleared, and the timber thereon deadened, and, in order to save it, he sold the timber, as he had a right to do, to his codefendant, Shrader; that the land upon which he sold his timber to Shrader is the best land on his farm, which he was clearing for agricultural purposes, and, if he cannot be permitted to clear up and cultivate his farm for agricultural purposes, he will be forced to move off, and abandon his home, and turn it over to plaintiff; that before the execution of said so-called "contract" the said Bailey and others represented to him that, in the event the railroad up Bluestone river was not built in the period of five years from the execution of said lease, the said paper or lease was to be void, and not binding on any one, and defendant charged that said representations were the only inducements that led to the execution of said paper on the 28th of March, 1872, especially on the part of defendant; that said paper constitutes a cloud on his title, which a court of equity would remove, and that it would be just and right for a court of equity to declare said paper or so-called "contract" null and void, and that the same be canceled and delivered to him, and he prays that it may be so declared, and for general relief. The plaintiff filed a special replication to said answer, denying all of the matters therein alleged, constituting a claim for affirmative relief. Some depositions were taken in the cause, and on the 26th day of December, 1890, a decree was rendered in the cause, failing to pass on the demurrer, perpetuating the injunction as to the defendants, Ralph Shrader and David Bell, perpetually enjoining them from cutting, sawing, and removing from the 150 acres of land in the bill described the timber growing thereon, except for farming and building purposes needed by said David Bell, and refusing to grant the affirmative relief prayed for by said David Bell in his answer; and from this decree this appeal was obtained.

As nothing is said about the demurrer in the decree complained of, it must be presumed that counsel for the defendant did not insist upon it in the court below; and, whether it was or not, if the plaintiff, or those under whom it claims, have not, by some laches or neglect on their part, failed to comply with the terms of the agreement set forth in the bill, in a reasonable time, the allegations therein contained must be regarded as sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to be heard in a court of equity. Now, then, if we turn our attention to the attitude of the parties at the time said agreement was made, and say that, at the time they were treating in regard to this 150 acres of land, both parties were ignorant of the fact that the land contained no vein of coal, yet a casual glance over the agreement discloses the fact that the coal underlying the land was to be mined and removed, and the timber was to be cut, sawed, or moved from said leased premises at the rate of 50 cents per 1,000 square feet of lumber of inch thickness, or a proportionate sum for other thicknesses, or 25 cents per tree, at the discretion of the lessees, their personal representatives and assigns, etc., to be paid for when the same was shipped, cut, sawed, or moved from said leased premises, —an exceedingly low price for timber, and a price which it is difficult to believe a man would receive for his timber, unless he was to be compensated in some other manner for parting with it at this low price; and what man, in his sober senses, would agree that his timber should be cut and shipped at this low price, and at any time the lessee might think proper, so it was within the period of 99 years, unless such agreement was coupled with another contract, as this one was, from which he could reasonably expect to derive some profit? The defendant Bell, in his answer, says the real subject-matter and substantial inducement to the contract was the supposed existence of valuable coal veins on said lands, when none such in fact existed; so that, by the mutual mistake of all parties concerned, they went through the foolish form of contracting about a subject-matter that had no existence, and the supposed existence of which (viz. the coal) was the real and only inducement to the so-called contract, and that he never would have entered into any such agreement to sell his timber at the nominal prices named, had he for a moment thought that he was dealing about the timber alone. And the fact that the agreement, on its face, shows that it contemplated the mining and removal of coal from the land at 10 cents per ton shows that the agreement was made under a mutual mistake, as the defendant Bell was selling something he did not own, and the lessee was thereby purchasing something he could not get. David Bell, whose testimony is taken in the cause, states that, at the time said contract was entered into, he was of opinion that there were valuable coal deposits on said tract, and that he would not have contracted to sell his timber at the prices he did, if he had known there was no coal in said land, and that he agreed to these prices in order that they should have the timber for mining purposes; and I. A. Welch, another witness, who is an expert in reference to coal formations, and has had experience in the Flat Top region, in the vicinity of this land, states that there is no vein of coal, of any value, in this land. This evidence shows clearly that there was a mutual mistake as to the coal, which was the most important inducement to the contract, and but for which said Bell says he would never have executed it. The further fact is disclosed by the testimony, that, in order to transport the timber from this land to the lands of the plaintiff, the Bluestone river would have to be crossed; and it would have to be carried several miles by rail; and the witness Welch further states, when asked whether the timber on the land referred to in the plaintiff's bill will have a special value to the plaintiff or its successors or assigns, says that, "at the present time, he cannot think the timber on the tract in question can be turned to any valuable account; that, after the timber is exhausted from the land in coal, it may then be valuable for mine ties and props." In view of this testimony, which is uncontradicted, it is difficult to perceive how the plaintiff could suffer irreparable damage by failing to get it. Even if there was no mistake in the parties, in entering into the contract, would it be in accordance with the rules of equity, under the circumstances surrounding this case, where a mutual mistake has led the parties to contract in regard to a subject which has no existence, to specifically enforce the contract as to another subject, which never would have found any place in such contract, had it not been regarded as an ancillary concomitant to the remaining portion of the agreement with reference to mining and removing the coal? We can conceive of nothing more inequitable than the enforcement, specifically, of a contract for timber, originating as this one did, and so closely allied with a contract for the coal which was supposed to lie beneath it that it might well be regarded as forming an entire contract, which should not be enforced by piecemeal in a court of equity.

The general principles governing cases of this character are laid down in 15 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 628, as follows: "In order that a mistake may come within the cognizance of a court of equity, it must be shown to be —First, material, or the moving cause of the complaining party's action; second, mutual, or shared in by both parties to the transaction; third, unintentional; and, fourth, free from negligence." It would be difficult to use language which would more accurately describe the mutual mistake which was made by the contracting parties with reference to the coal supposed to underlie this land, which acted as the moving cause and inducement to the contract for the timber. In the absence of the coal, the evidence shows there would have been no contract for the timber. This was the foundation on which the timber contract rested, and, the foundation having no real existence, the superstructure must fall. Kerr on Fraud & Mistake, at page 405, says: "The jurisdiction of equity over mistake is exercised much more liberally where the mistake is in matter of fact than where it is in matter of law. The admission of ignorance of fact as a ground of relief is not attended with those inconveniences which seem to be the reason for rejecting ignorance of law as a valid excuse," etc. And again, in a note on page 410, we find it is said that "nothing is more clear than the doctrine that a contract founded in a mutual mistake of the facts constituting the very basis or essence of it will avoid it." See Irick v. Fultons' Ex'r, 3 Gratt. 193. But if this agreement was not entered into by reason of mutual mistake, but was induced by representations made by the parties with whom he contracted in regard to the construction of a railroad up the Bluestone within a short period and as to the veins of coal underlying said Bell's land, if these representations had no foundation in fact, and induced the contract in reference to the timber and coal, if these representations are to be considered as material, and it is shown that they were relied on by said Bell, it is ground for a rescission of the contract, in equity. This doctrine is found in the case of Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. 713, (first point of syllabus,) where "false representations of material facts constituting inducement to contract, and on which a party has a right to rely, is ground for rescission in a court of equity. Matter of opinion may amount to affirmation, and be inducement to contract, and will be ground for rescission, especially where parties deal not on equal terms. An affirmant has, or is presumed to have, means of information not equally open to the other party." See, also, Linhart v. Foreman's Adm'r, 77 Va. 540, (first point of syllabus,) where it is held that "a false representation of a material fact constituting an inducement to the contract, on which the purchaser had a right to rely, is ground for the rescission of the contract by a court of equity, although the party making the misrepresentation was ignorant as to whether it was true or false; and the real inquiry is not whether the vendor knew the representation to be false, but whether the purchaser believed it to be true, and was misled by it into the contract. In such case, whether the false representation was innocently or willfully made, the effect is the same on the purchaser." See, also, Lowe v. Trundle, 78 Va. 63; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §868.

The next question I shall consider is whether the party seeking relief from the court, and those under whom it claims by assignment, have shown that diligence which would entitle them to relief in a court of equity, even if the contract was not the result of mutual mistake, or of misrepresentation either willfully or innocently made, upon which the defendant acted. In making this agreement to lease the coal mentioned therein, and to let the lessor have the timber to aid in its safe and economic mining, it is presumed that said David Bell expected to receive some returns in the shape of royalty during his natural lifetime; and, although the agreement provides that the lease is to continue for 99 years, the law contemplates that operations shall be commenced in a reasonable time, in order that the lessor may enjoy his royalty, and the lessee the coal; otherwise, the presumption arises that the lessee has abandoned his rights thereunder. In this case, it was evidently contemplated that the timber should be used about the mining operations. It was not, however, intended that the mining operations could be postponed for 70, 80, or 90 years, until prices and circumstances changed,—until it was ascertained that no coal existed under the land,—and still allow the lessor to claim the timber at a nominal price. But, if operations were not commenced in a reasonable time, the defendant Bell had the right to treat the whole contract as abandoned. In the case of Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 409, 2 S. E. 713, the court, in speaking of this subject, says: "The lease was for a term of twenty years. Yet, looking to its nature and object, it cannot be contended that the lessees had the option to work or not to work the ore mines for an indefinite time, and thus convert what was designed to yield a handsome daily income to the lessors into a mere barren incumbrance on his land,—a cloud on his title,—an incubus and a manacle, which would oppress him, and destroy the marketable value of his land. No lease of land for a rent for a return to the landlord out of the land which passes can be construed to be intended to enable the tenant merely to hold the lease for the purposes of speculation, without doing and performing in connection therewith what the lease contemplated. Such a construction would, indeed, make all such contracts a snare for the entrapment and injury of the unwary landlord." "A man buying and paying for land may do with it as he likes, but a tenant to whom land passes for a specific purpose has no discretion. He must perform what he has stipulated to do, and if he has obtained the lease by misrepresentation and fraud the lessor may have it rescinded in equity." And in the case of Cowan v. Iron Co., 83 Va. 547, 3 S. E. 120, it appears that an agreement was made in June, 1880, between said Cowan and said Radford Iron Company for the sale of all the ores, minerals, etc., underlying a certain tract of land owned by said Cowan. Said company had the right to enter at any time from and after the date of the contract, with workmen, etc., to mine and remove the ore. In the summer and fall of 1880, the said company, in pursuance of its provisions, entered upon the said land, and removed a small quantity of ore,—some 200 tons,—and paid to said Cowan 15 cents per ton therefor, and after that did nothing further; and in January, 1884, a bill was filed by Cowan to have a rescission of said contract. The circuit court dismissed the plaintiff's bill. An appeal was taken, and the court of appeals of Virginia held that, "if one party may terminate an estate at his will, so may the other. Right to terminate is mutual;" also, that "where the minerals in certain lands are sold, with the usual mining rights to begin at any time after date of the agreement, with no time fixed for their ending, while the compensation is to be paid quarterly, as the iron ore is mined, but lessee to have the privilege of removing from the land at any time any machinery, etc., erected by him, and lessee has abandoned, and failed to mine and pay anything quarterly, he must be held to have terminated the estate, as he had the right to do, and lessor is no more and no further bound thereby." Barton, in his Chancery Practice, (volume 1, p. 121,) states the doctrine thus: "Owing to the general rule that the specific performance of a contract will not be enforced, in a court of equity, unless the party seeking it has not been in default, but, on the other hand, has shown himself to have been ready, eager, prompt, and desirous of maintaining his rights, the rule of laches is more strictly applied in cases of this character than in ordinary suits for accounts, etc., and hence, though in some instances a long delay has been held insufficient to bar the complainant's rights, yet in others a very short time has been sufficient for that purpose." In this case, the party who was to mine and remove the ore had only failed to do so for about four years, while in the case under consideration the lessees had waited for 17 years without mining a lump of coal. The Bluestone Coal Company, some 13 years after the contract was made, authorized the railroad company to take some timber off of the defendant Bell's land for cribbing for trestles, and Mr. Welch was directed by the president of the Bluestone Coal Company to pay said David Bell for said timber, but he refused to accept it in payment for timber used by the railway company, so that no timber was ever taken from the said land; and the testimony shows there is very little merchantable timber on said land. But, be that as it may, under the decisions above quoted, and under the circumstances shown by the testimony, the defendant Bell had a right to regard said contract as abandoned; and it being manifest that there was a mutual mistake in the contracting parties as to the character of the coal in said lands, the court erred in perpetuating said injunction, and refusing to dismiss the plaintiff's bill, and in refusing to rescind said contract and dissolve said injunction. The decree complained of is therefore reversed and annulled, and such decree entered here as the circuit court should have rendered, with costs.

STATE v. WARREN.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—FREEDOM OF SPEECH—LOCAL POLICE LAWS.

1. Acts 1891, c. 42, making it unlawful, among other things, to use profane language to the disturbance of the peace on the lands of the Henrietta Cotton Mills, in Rutherford county, is not an undue interference with free speech, as applied to language which fails of being a nuisance under the state law, because not used in the presence or hearing of persons, to their annoyance.

2. Acts 1891, c. 42, to protect the operatives of the Henrietta Cotton Mills, in Rutherford county, making certain industries and behavior unlawful on lands of said mills, is a police law, and not invalid as a local criminal law.

Appeal from superior court, Rutherford county; Armfield, Judge.

J. T. Warren, convicted under Laws 1891, c. 42, of using profane language on land of the Henrietta Cotton Mills, appeals. Affirmed.

Said act makes it unlawful to manufacture or sell liquor, use profane language, fire off firearms, congregate on the bridge, etc., on lands of the Henrietta Cotton Mills, in Rutherford county.

The Attorney General and John Devereux, for the State.

CLARK, J. The defendant was arrested upon a warrant issued under chapter 42, Acts 1891, for "unlawful and willful use of profane and indecent language, that did disturb the peace, on the lands of the Henrietta Mills." On the trial before the justice of the peace the defendant pleaded guilty. He was fined $50, and appealed. The sworn complaint was made on October 31, 1892, and the warrant issued on the same day. The trial was had, and a plea of guilty entered, on November 3, 1892. We only note that the officer returned the warrant, "Served on October 12, 1892," to say that this was a palpable inadvertence, of no purport, since the defendant appeared in the action. If pleaded at the trial, the justice should have granted the officer leave to amend the return. Code, § 908. Not being pleaded, the plea upon the merits cured the error as to the defendant. The defendant having pleaded guilty, his appeal could not call in question the facts charged, nor the regularity and correctness in form of the warrant. Code, § 1183. He is concluded as to these, though in fact the proceedings are regular in form. The words used by the defendant need not have been set out. State v. Cainan, 94 N. C. 880. The appeal could only bring up for review the question whether the facts charged, and of which the defendant admitted himself to have been guilty, constituted an offense punishable under our laws and constitution. Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. (9th Ed.) § 413. Though the record proper states that in the superior court the defendant was tried by jury and found guilty, it seems that in fact the object of the appeal was merely to test the validity of the statute, since the judgment was arrested by the court upon the ground that the act of the legislature was unconstitutional. There are two grounds upon which the unconstitutionality of the statute may be urged.

First, that it is an interference with the freedom of speech. The legislature could have empowered a municipality to make the use of such language punishable by its ordinances, when it falls short of being a nuisance punishable by state law, from not having been "committed in the presence and hearing of divers persons, to their annoyance," etc. State v. Calnan, 94 N. C. 880; State v. Debnam, 98 N. C. 712, 3 S. E. 742. Of course, the legislature could do this directly, if it could do it indirectly, as by authorizing a municipality to make an ordinance to that effect.

Secondly, it may be urged that this is criminal law, and hence must be uniform, and take effect over the whole state. But, on the contrary, it is a police regulation, and hence may be limited in its operation to such localities as the legislature may prescribe. The distinction between the two has been too often pointed out to require reiteration. Such public local acts have been often sustained by this court in cases of prohibition of sale of seed cotton in certain counties, of intoxicating liquors in prescribed localities, or the sale of certain commodities in places named, without being weighed, and the like. These precedents, and the reasons for the distinction drawn, are given by Avery, J., in State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 714, 10 S. E. 143, which is cited and approved in State v. Moore, 18 S. E. 342, (at this term.)

The court should have overruled the motion in arrest, and affirmed the judgment, the defendant having pleaded guilty before the justice. This case differs from State v. Koonce, 108 N. C. 752, 12 S. E. 1032. There, the defendant pleaded not guilty. Having been convicted, he moved in arrest of judgment. This being denied, he appealed. The court properly held that on such appeal the whole case was opened, and the trial was de novo, (Code, § 900), and not restricted to the motion in arrest of judgment. But here the defendant has restricted himself by his plea of guilty. There can be no facts left open for consideration by a jury after such plea, and the sole question for review is the legal one, which we have discussed. The judgment of the superior court is set aside, and the case is remanded, that judgment may be entered below affirming the sentence of the justice of the peace. Reversed.

DEEDS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

The attempted acknowledgment of a trust deed before a notary public who was a preferred creditor is a nullity, because taken before an officer disqualified to act, and is not cured by probate upon such acknowledgment before the clerk and by registration.

Appeal from superior court, Granville county; Brown, Judge.

Action by J. H. Long against J. A. Crews and others. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Batchelor & Devereux, Graham & Graham, B. S. Royster, and L. C. Edwards, for appellant. Strong & Strong, for appellees.

OLARK, J. In this state it is settled law that an acknowledgment of a deed by the husband, and privy examination of the wife, taken before a justice of the peace, commissioner, or notary, is a judicial, or at least a quasi judicial, act, and, if such officer is not authorized to take it, the probate upon it by the clerk, and registration, are invalid against creditors and purchasers. This was laid down by Pearson, J., in the leading case of De Courcy v. Barr, 45 N. C. 181, in which a commissioner of deeds for this state, in another state, took the examination of a resident of this state, temporarily absent from it. The probate and registration based upon said defective acknowledgment were held invalid. Though the statute in this special particular was changed by Code, § 632. (Buggy Co. v. Pegram, 102 N. C. 540, 9 S. E. 412,) the principle has been since followed in Toussaint v. Outlaw, 79 N. C. 235; Duke v. Markham, 105 N. C. 137, 10 S. E. 1017, and many other cases. In Ferebee v. Hinton, 102 N. C. 99, 8 S. E. 922, it was held by Shepherd, J., that an acknowledgment before a clerk of the county where the land lay, taken outside of the state, rendered the registration invalid. The registration upon an acknowledgment before an officer not authorized to take it is not even notice to creditors and subsequent purchasers. Robinson v. Willoughby, 70 N. C. 358; Smith v. Castrix, 27 N. C. 518; and there are other cases. The plaintiff relied on Darden v. Steamboat Co., 107 N. C. 437, 12 S. E. 46, and Perry v. Bragg, 111 N. C. 159, 16 S. E. 10. In the first, the headnote is misleading, unless carefully read, for the case shows that the deeds were in fact acknowledged in the county where the grantors resided. In the latter, the point was taken that the deed was improperly acknowledged before the clerk of Franklin, when the grantor resided in Granville; but it did not appear in the facts agreed that the land might not be situated in Franklin, and the case went off on other points. It is true these were all cases where the registration and probate were insufficient because the acknowledgment was made before an officer by reason of his locality not authorized, or acting outside of his local jurisdiction, and the ruling is sustained by ample authority elsewhere. 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 146, note 2, and 1 Devl. Deeds, §§ 487, 488, with cases cited. The curative acts (1891, c. 12; 1893, c. 293) are legislative recognition of the prior defect in jurisdiction in taking acknowledgment. But exactly the same principle still applies where the officer taking the acknowledgment is disqualified, not (as above) by not acting within the authorized locality, but by reason of his interest in the deed, either as party, trustee, or cestui que trust.

1 Devl. Deeds, § 476, and cases there cited. In both cases alike, the acknowledgment is taken, so to speak, coram non iudice, and cannot authorize probate by the clerk and registration. Beaman v. Whitney, 20 Me. 413; Groesbeck v. Seeley, 13 Mich. 329; Davis v. Beazley, 75 Va. 491; Bowden v. Parrish, 86 Va. 67, 9 S. E. 616; Brown v. Moore, 38 Tex. 645; Wasson v. Connor, 54 Miss. 351; Withers v. Baird, 32 Amer. Dec. 754, and notes; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 145, note 6; 16 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 775. The act of 1885 (chapter 147) places deeds on the same footing as to registration as mortgages and deeds of trusts were on under Code, § 1234. The attempted acknowledgment of the deed in trust before a notary public who was a preferred creditor therein was before an officer disqualified to act, and hence a nullity. It could not be cured by probate upon such acknowledgment before the clerk and registration. White v. Connelly, 105 N. C. 65, 11 S. E. 177; Freeman v. Person, 106 N. C. 251, 10 S. E. 1037. The deed was properly excluded. No error.

FOREIGN JUDGMENTS—COPY AS EVIDENCE—RES JUDICATA.

1. The certificate of the judge of the court in which a foreign judgment was rendered, that the clerk's attestation of the copy of the record of the judgment is in due form, is conclusive.

2. Where the copy of the record of a foreign judgment on which an action is brought shows that the court had jurisdiction, defendant cannot show that he and his attorney made mistakes, and that the judgment was for more than was due.

Appeal from superior court. Alleghany county; Winston, Judge.

Action by Morgan Edwards, administrator of the estate of T. M. Dobyns, deceased, against H. F. Jones. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff alleged that he was the administrator of the estate of T. M. Dobyns, late a citizen of the state of Virginia, who died in 1872, having made and published his last will and testament, which has been duly admitted to probate in that state, and also in this; that one D. W. Dobyns was appointed executor of that will, and qualified as such executor in the state of Virginia, but was thereafter removed from said executorship by the proper court of that state, and one Marshall was duly appointed administrator de bonis non, cum testamento annexo, of the estate of T. M. Dobyns; that said administrator became plaintiff in the place of the removed executor in a suit then pending in the circuit court of Carroll county, in the state of Virginia, in which the appellant was defendant. In that cause, process had been duly served on the defendant, and he had appeared by counsel, and filed an answer. At October term, 1884, of said circuit court, a judgment was rendered in that suit against the defendant, and to enforce the payment of that judgment this suit was brought by the plaintiff here, who has been duly appointed administrator of that estate in this state, it being admitted that the defendant has no property in the state of Virginia, and is a citizen here. Upon the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a certified copy of the record of the aforesaid judgment, to which the defendant objected "on the ground that judge's certificate is defective." The objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted. The defendant offered evidence that tended to show that mistakes were made in taking the account in the Virginia suit of the dealings between him and T. M. Dobyns, who had been his partner, the object of the said suit being to effect a settlement of the partnership accounts. He said that he employed counsel who represented him in that litigation, and that he went over the accounts with his lawyer, but did not discover then any mistakes, and did not appeal from the judgment rendered against him in that cause. He also testified that he had great confidence in the executor, and turned over to him his vouchers, but lost confidence in him before the suit was brought. On the whole evidence being in, the court charged the jury that the Virginia judgment was an estoppel, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover upon said judgment the amount of the claim, and gave judgment accordingly. The defendant excepted, and assigned as error: (1) For the admission of the certified copy of the record of the Virginia court; and (2) for that, upon the whole evidence, the jury ought to have been permitted to say whether the Virginia judgment was procured through the fraud of the administrator Marshall or of D. W. Dobyns, and whether the defendant, Jones, was bound by the same.

R. A. Doughton, for appellant. Strong & Strong and A. E. Holton, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. The exception of the defendant to the introduction of the copy of the record of the judgment of the circuit court of Carroll county, Va., upon the ground that the certificate of the judge thereon was "defective, in that it states that the record is in due form of law, instead of in due form according to the law of this state," cannot be sustained. The attestation of the clerk should be, as here, in the form prescribed for the court in which the judgment was rendered, and the certificate of the judge that the clerk's attestation is in due form is conclusive. Black, Judgm. § 878. This record of the judgment of a court of the state of Virginia being thus in evidence, and it appearing therefrom that the court that rendered that judgment against the defendant had properly acquired jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter, it followed that, as full faith and credit must be given to that judgment thus established, no defense against it was open to the defendant, except such as would have availed him in the court in which it was rendered, except, perhaps, fraud. Id. § 881. And of fraud vitiating this judgment there is no evidence whatever. It is final and conclusive on the merits. Nothing can be set up against it that, with proper diligence, might have been interposed in the action in which it was rendered. Hence, it was not allowable for the defendant to attempt to show in this action that he or his attorney in that cause had made mistakes or omissions that enhanced the amount of the recovery against him there. He was represented there by counsel. The court, as we have said, had jurisdiction of him and his cause. What was there determined by the judgment then rendered is finally settled. The amount there ascertained to be due from him to the estate of T. M. Dobyns should be paid by him to the ancillary administrator in this state, that he may dispose of it according to law. Affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. KERR.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT—LOST RECORDS—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—PARTIES—LIS PENDENS—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Where the probate of a mortgage recites that the justice of the peace taking the acknowledgment was a justice of the county where the land lay, the presumption is that he was a justice of such county, in the absence of proof to the contrary.

2. It is not necessary that lost records of mortgage foreclosure proceedings shall be supplied by supplemental proceedings, but they may be proved by secondary evidence, where satisfactory proof of the loss has been made.

3. Loss of the records of a foreclosure suit is sufficiently proved to render secondary evidence thereof admissible, where the clerk of the court, the commissioner who sold the land, and the attorneys in the foreclosure suit, testify that they have made diligent search for them, and have been unable to find them.

4. Where a purchaser of mortgaged premises from the mortgagor did not record his deed until after a suit for foreclosure was brought, he is considered a purchaser pendente lite, and is as effectually bound by the judgment as if he had been made a party.

5. Subsequent incumbrancers, though proper parties to a foreclosure suit, are not necessary parties.

6. If there has been a payment on a mortgage bond within ten years before suit brought to foreclose the mortgage, the debt is not barred, and the purchaser at the foreclosure sale acquires title.

7. In an action by the purchaser of land at a foreclosure sale to recover the same from the grantee of a purchaser from the mortgagor, it was not error to charge that a mortgagor in possession of land held under the mortgage, as did also a purchaser from him, if he had notice of the mortgage, and that he had such notice if the mortgage was registered at the time of the conveyance, and that a seven-years holding by such mortgagor or purchaser would not give title.

8. Nor was it error to charge that if the purchaser bought the land from the mortgagor, with actual knowledge of the mortgage, agreeing to assume the mortgage debt, he was in possession under the mortgage, and defendant, having bought the land from such purchaser within less than a year before suit to foreclose, did not have possession long enough to make his title good against the mortgagee, even if his possession was adverse and without notice.

Appeal from superior court, Sampson county; Winston, Judge.

Action by C. H. Williams against John D. Kerr to recover land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Both plaintiff and defendant claim title to the land in suit from one James S. Boone. The plaintiff offered a deed of mortgage dated September 20, 1876, duly registered, from said Boone and wife to M. E. Parker, wife of J. P. Parker. Defendant objected to introduction of said deed because it did not appear from the clerk's commission that the person authorized to take the same was a justice of the peace or a resident of the county, or that he took the acknowledgment in said county. The objection was overruled, and an exception taken. The plaintiff next offered a deed dated July 21, 1879, from J. P. Parker and wife, aforesaid, to Edward Williams. The plaintiff next proposed to show by the clerk and other witnesses that the foreclosure papers in the case of Edward Williams against J. S. Boone and wife had been lost, and could not be found. Defendant objected, because said lost records could not be supplied in this way, and could only be supplied by an independent action to restore the same. The objection was overruled, and exception taken. Plaintiff next offered Bizzell, the clerk, and M. C. Richardson, the commissioner who sold the land and executed the deed to plaintiff, and also the attorney in said case, and the defendant, Kerr, as witnesses, each of whom swore that they had made diligent search for the lost papers in their respective law offices, and also in the clerk's office, and had been unable to find them, and that they were lost; that they had searched repeatedly. The court held that secondary evidence was now admissible, after objection and exception. Plaintiff next offered the records in the foreclosure case. Defendant objected to these records, because it appeared that suit was brought September 19, 1889, and prior to that date the defendant had taken a deed from the mortgagor, and was in possession of the land, and also because he was not a party to the said suit. This objection was overruled, and exception taken. A deed from M. C. Richardson, commissioner, to plaintiff, dated January 4, 1890, and duly registered, was next read and put in evidence, over objection and exception. It was proven that the defendant was in possession of the land in dispute. J. S. Boone, being put on the stand as a witness for plaintiff, stated that he made the last payment on the land and mortgage to M. E. Parker in December, 1879, the payment being $75 or $80. The bond was $400 at first. Credit was entered on the back of note. That he was in possession of the land until he sold it to Newkirk, in 1883. Sold land to Newkirk, with the understanding that he was to assume the Parker debt. J. D. Kerr is now in possession, and has claimed it ever since C. H. Williams bought it. M. O. Richardson sold the land. Kerr was present at the sale, and forbade the sale in presence of the plaintiff, who bought it. Defendant offered a deed from Boone to Newkirk, dated August 14, 1883, registered January 2, 1890; also a deed from said Newkirk to defendant, dated April 2, 1890, covering the land in dispute. Plaintiff offered the answer to estop the defendant, and read the same as evidence. It appeared in evidence that on April 12, 1890, a suit was brought by plaintiff against defendant to recover the same land, but at October term, 1891, a nonsuit was taken, and this action was begun within a year. Upon the issue of the statute of limitations, the court charged the jury that if they believed that in December, 1879, Boone, the mortgagor, paid $75 on the bond, and that in September, 1889, within 10 years, an action was begun to foreclose said mortgage, the cause of action was not at said time barred by the 10-year statute of limitation; that the purchaser at such foreclosure sale was not at that time barred, if the debt was not out of date. Defendant excepted. The court also charged the jury that a mortgagor in possession of land held under his mortgage, as did also a purchaser from such mortgagor, provided he had notice of the mortgage, and that, if the mortgage was registered at the time of the purchase, that was notice to the purchaser. That a seven years' holding by such mortgagor or purchaser would not give title. Defendant excepted. That if Newkirk had actual knowledge of the mortgage when he bought the land of Boone, and agreed to assume the Parker debt, and purchased with this understanding, he would be in possession under the mortgage. That the defendant, having bought of Newkirk in 1890, had not had possession of the land a sufficient length of time to make his title good against the mortgagee, even if it were adverse and without notice. Defendant excepts to this portion of the charge.

J. D. Kerr, for appellant. Allen & Dortch, for appellee.

CLARK, J. It is true that, if the mortgage was acknowledged before a justice of the peace not of the proper county, (Code, § 1246, subd. 1.) the registration would be invalid, (De Courcy v. Barr, 45 N. C. 181; Todd v. Outlaw, 79 N. C. 235; Duke v. Markham, 105 N. C. 137, 10 S. E. 1017, and cases cited; Devl. Deeds, §§ 487, 488.) It is also true, as contended, that the acts validating such irregular acknowledgments and probates, (Acts 1889, c. 252; Acts 1891, c. 12; Acts 1893, c. 293,) while good, probably, as between the parties, and as to third parties, from the passage of the acts, would not validate such acknowledgments and probates as to third parties, whose rights had already been acquired prior to the validating statutes, (Gordon v. Collett, 107 N. C. 362, 12 S. E. 332.) But here the probate recites that the justice of the peace taking the same was a justice of the peace of Sampson county, where the land lay; and the presumption is that he was a justice of the peace of said county, and that he took the acknowledgment within the same, subject to proof of the contrary. Kidd v. Venable, 111 N. C. 535, 16 S. E. 317; Darden v. Steamboat Co., 107 N. C. 437, 12 S. E. 46; Devereux v. McMahon, 102 N. C. 284, 9 S. E. 635.

Exc. 2. It was not necessary that the lost record should be supplied by an independent action. Upon satisfactory proof of loss, secondary evidence is admissible. Mobley v. Watts, 98 N. C. 284, 3 S. C. 677; Hopper v. Justice, 111 N. C. 418, 16 S. E. 626.

Exc. 3. The proof of loss was sufficient to justify the admission of secondary evidence of the lost records.

Exc. 4. This goes upon the ground that the defendant was not a party to the proceedings in foreclosure. The defendant's title was derived by conveyance from Newkirk, the assignee of the mortgagor, and the plaintiff had purchased at the foreclosure sale made under proceedings in which the mortgagee and the mortgagor were the parties. The foreclosure action was commenced on the 19th day of September, 1889, and the sale by the commissioner under the decree rendered therein was on the 4th day of January, 1890. The records are lost, and it will be presumed that the decree was rendered upon a complaint regularly filed, setting out the facts. The deed from the mortgagor, Boone, to Newkirk, though dated August, 1883, was not registered until the 2d day of January, 1890; and the deed from Newkirk to the defendant Kerr, though dated 15th October, 1889, was not registered before April 2, 1890. In Collingwood v. Brown, 106 N. C. 366, 10 S. E. 868, the court say: "If, at the time it [the deed] is so filed for record, there is a pending suit, the holder of such a deed, previously withheld from the record, is a pendente lite purchaser." And in that case it is held that such a purchaser is as effectually bound as if a party to the action. It would be strange, indeed, if a party could take a deed pending litigation, and could hold the deed in his pocket, setting up no claim, and after the litigation closes could say he ought to have been made a party. The defendants Kerr and Newkirk were not made parties because the records did not show that either had title, or claim of title. Besides, subsequent incumbrancers are proper parties in a foreclosure proceeding, but not necessary parties. Kornegay v. Steamboat Co., 107 N. C. 118, 12 S. E. 123.

Excs. 5 and 6 are, it seems to us, simply exceptions out of "abundance of caution," and are without merit.

Exc. 7. If there was a payment on the mortgage bond within 10 years before suit brought, the debt not being out of date, the purchaser at the foreclosure sale was not barred. Code, § 152, subd. 3; Ely v. Bush, 89 N. C. 358.

Exc. 8. The court correctly charged the jury that "a mortgagor in possession of land held under his mortgage, as did also a purchaser from such mortgagor, provided he had notice of the mortgage, and, if the mortgage was registered at the time of the purchase, that was a notice to the purchaser, and a seven-years holding by such mortgagor or purchaser would not give title." Parker v. Banks, 79 N. C. 480.

Exc. 9. The court correctly stated the law in charging that "if the purchaser bought the land with actual knowledge of the mortgage, agreeing to assume the mortgage debt, he would be in possession under the mortgage; and, the defendant having bought the land from the aforesaid purchaser within less than a year before the suit was originally brought, (this suit having begun within one year after a nonsuit taken in such original suit,) the defendant would not have had possession of the land long enough to make his title good against the mortgagee, even if his possession were adverse and without notice." Parker v. Banks, supra. No error.

STEALMAN v. GREENWOOD.

FALSE RETURN — ACTION FOR PENALTY — AMENDMENT OF RETURN.

After a person has brought an action against a sheriff to recover the penalty for a false return on an execution, such officer, by leave of court, may amend the return so it will speak the truth, and thus defeat the action.

Appeal from superior court, Wilkes county; E. T. Boykin, Judge.

Action by Bennett Stealman against S. J. Greenwood to recover a penalty for a false return on an execution made by defendant as sheriff. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff's action was for an alleged false return made by defendant sheriff, for the penalty of $500 prescribed by statute. Plaintiff introduced in evidence a judgment of a justice of the peace, duly docketed in the superior court, in a cause entitled Burnett Stealman v. Joel Church, in which it was adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of $7.50 and interest and costs, etc. Plaintiff also introduced an execution issued upon the aforesaid judgment, commanding the sheriff to satisfy said judgment out of the personal property of the defendant, and, if sufficient personal property cannot be found, then out of the real property belonging to the defendant on the day when the said judgment was docketed, etc. The sheriff returned this execution as follows: "This execution not satisfied. Collected from sale of land,—see return of sale in this execution,—$9.50. My fees and commissions retained, $2.56. Paid into office, $6.94. After due advertisement according to law, I sold the land described in the levy in this execution on the 13th of October, 1890, at the courthouse door, when James W. McNeill became the bidder, in the sum of $9.50." By leave of the court the following amended return is made on the execution: "That I received the execution on the 7th of April, 1890. The plaintiff furnished me $5 to defray expenses of laying off homestead and personal property exemption. I proceeded to summon appraisers, [naming them,] who proceeded on the 7th of August, 1890, to view the defendant's land, and lay off and assign to him his homestead therein, and his personal property exemption. There was no excess of personal property out of which any part of the execution could be satisfied, and I levied the execution on the excess of the defendant's land, as found by the appraisers; and after due advertisement and notice to defendant, I sold the same publicly, to the last and highest bidder, at the courthouse, on September 13, 1890, when James W. McNeill became the bidder and purchaser thereof at the price of $9.50. That of the $5 furnished me by plaintiff to lay off the homestead, etc., I paid $1 to each of the three appraisers above-named, and retained $2 as my fee for laying off the homestead, etc., and out of the money arising from the sale I retained my commissions on this execution, in which is included 62½ cents due me on a former execution issued in the same case, returnable to March term, 1890, as will appear by the return on said execution, and paid the balance ($6.94) into office. This 14th day of September, 1891." Signed by the sheriff, by J. H. Andrews, D. S. After this action commenced, on a notice issued to the plaintiff at fall term, 1891, the defendant was allowed to amend his said return on the execution as above, which said amendment was made and attached to the aforesaid execution, and the plaintiff excepted. Issue submitted by the court: "Is the plaintiff entitled to recover the statutory penalty demanded in the complaint?" Answer: "No." The court instructed the jury that if they believed the evidence the plaintiff could not recover. Judgment for defendant. Appeal by plaintiff.

L. S. Benbow, for appellant. D. M. Furches, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. Plaintiff's counsel readily concede the power of the court to allow the amendment, but they deny that its effect is to discharge any part of the penalty, especially the part thereof which is said to belong to the plaintiff. They contend most strenuously that the court has no right to "purge the vice" of the false return, and discharge the penalty, after the popular action becomes a private one of plaintiff, by reason of his bringing suit. The authorities cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiff seem to establish the position that popular actions can only be barred, after suit brought, by a pardon, and possibly by a repeal of the penal statute. But the power of amendment in the courts to make the return speak the truth (the amendment, when made, relating back to the time of the return) is entirely distinct from the power to remit or to pardon, and has been too long established, and is too well settled, to be now disturbed. The statute, as interpreted in this state, imposing the penalty, even in cases of mere mistake, is so severe, and apparently harsh, but for the extreme importance, both to public and private interest, that these returns should in all cases speak the truth, that the discretionary power of allowing amendments in meritorious cases has always been liberally exercised. Albright v. Tapscott, 8 Jones, (N. C.) 473. In Hassell v. Latham, 52 N. C. 465, which was an action like the present, brought in the superior court for a false return in the county court, where the sheriff was allowed to amend in the latter court, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. While it does not appear, in so many words, that the amendment was made after suit brought, there is much to indicate that such was the fact. In Patton v. Marr, 44 N. C. 377, which was a motion to amerce for an insufficient return, and it was held that the return was sufficient, the court said: "Nor can there be any doubt that the court would have allowed the sheriff, the defendant, if he had been here, to amend his return." In Finley v. Hayes, 81 N. C. 308, the court said: "It is inconceivable how it was that the defendant did not obtain leave to amend his returns so as to acquit himself of all penalty." In Peebles v. Newsom, 74 N. C. 473, it is said that "any hardship resulting from this rule may be relieved, and will be relieved by our law of amendment." The plaintiff, by bringing this action, acquired no such vested right to the penalty that it might not be defeated by an amendment of the return. Murfree, Sher. § 879. This power of allowing amendment is so deeply fixed into our judicial system that all persons bringing such actions as the present do so with notice that the return may be amended, and the penalty never recovered. There are many instances of amendment of process, by which rights are acquired and lost. Defects in judgments may be amended, even after a writ of error; and executions may also be amended after they have been acted upon, so as to render them a justification to the officer, where otherwise they would not be, although it, thereby, may bar an action of him who has been imprisoned on it, or had his property sold under it, while in an imperfect state. Bender v. Askew, 14 N. C. 149. There is no error.

TAYLOR v. MILLER.

LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS—NEW PROMISE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

The agent of the payee of a note which was almost barred by the statute of limitations wrote to the maker, demanding payment of such note, and of another note held for collection by such agent. The maker wrote in reply that "I propose to settle both of your claims the first of next month, which I hope will be agreeable." He never owed such payee any debt except such note. Held, that the maker's letter was such a promise as prevented the bar of the statute as to the former note, under Code, § 172, requiring such promise to be contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby.

Appeal from superior court, Davie county; Boykin, Judge.

Action by John C. Taylor against P. A. Miller on a promissory note. Plaintiff submitted to a judgment of nonsuit on the suggestion of the judge that there was not sufficient evidence to bar the statute of limitations, and appeals. Reversed.

T. B. Bailey, for appellant. Watson & Buxton and Jacob Stewart, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. The action was upon a note for $400 and interest, dated March 29, 1886, payable one day after date, and made by defendant to plaintiff. The only plea was that of the statute of limitations, and the same was good, unless there had been a new acknowledgment or promise in writing, under section 172 of the Code. The case turns upon the testimony of E. L. Gaither and a letter referred to therein, which witness testified that he had received from the defendant. That portion of his testimony which is material is as follows: "That on or about the first of November, 1891, the plaintiff put this note into witness' hands for collection. That witness had this note and one other note against the defendant. That on the fourth of November, 1891, witness wrote to defendant a note, a copy of which is: 'Dear Sir: Mr. John C. Taylor had your note for $400 principal. He says you have promised to pay it off, and he needs the money, and has left it with me so you can take it up. Please settle the matter at your earliest convenience, and, if you can't pay it all at once, send me what you can. Respectfully, [Signed] E. L. Gaither.' That between the 4th of November and the 21st of December, 1891, the witness received a letter from the defendant, postmarked 'Mocksville, N. C., December 21, 1891,' and is as follows: 'Mr. E. L. Gaither, Mocksville, N. C.—Dear Sir: Your letter received, and I have been to town twice to see you, but you were not in. I propose to settle both of your claims the first of next month, which I hope will be agreeable. Will see you in person soon. Yours, respectfully, [Signed] P. A. Miller.'" It was also in evidence that the defendant has never owed the plaintiff anything but this one note sued on. The question is whether this letter was such a promise or acknowledgment as continued the obligation of the promise contained in the note, and prevented the bar of the statute,—whether the words "propose to settle," taken in connection with the testimony of Gaither and the rest of the letter, can be reasonably construed to mean "promise to pay." If they will bear the latter construction, the bar of the statute has been repelled; if not, the plaintiff can have no relief. The word "propose," like nearly every other word in the English language, has many meanings. A proposal may mean an offer, as of marriage; an introduction, as of a measure in a legislative assembly. It may also mean an expression of intention or design. I "propose to settle" is the same as I "intend or mean to settle." Webster defines it: "To form or declare a purpose or intention." A "promise" is defined to be a declaration which gives to the person to whom it is made a right to expect or claim the performance or nonperformance of some particular thing. There are many other meanings of these words, as there are also of the word "settle." Indeed, there are two distinct words "settle," the meanings of which have become confused. But we have no difficulty in selecting the definition in the Century Dictionary of this word in its colloquial sense, "To liquidate, balance, pay," as appropriate to the present use of it. We must construe language in its ordinary significance, unless it is manifestly used in some special or technical sense. Mr. Gaither writes to the defendant demanding payment of this specific note and another. The defendant answers: "I propose to settle both of your claims the first of next month, which I hope will be agreeable." How would this answer strike a man in an ordinary business transaction? It is evident that its effect would be to raise the expectation of payment at the time specified. The accumulation of adjectives used in their application to the words "acknowledgment and promise" in the statute has produced the impression that it requires more than an ordinary promise in writing to repel the bar of the statute. The old law, before the promise need be in writing, was: "The new promise must be definite, and show the nature and amount of the debt; or must distinctly refer to some writing, or to some other means by which the nature and amount of it can be ascertained; or there must be an acknowledgment of a present subsisting debt, equally definite and certain, from which a promise to pay such debt may be implied." McBride v. Gray, Busb. 420; Faison v. Bowden, 72 N. C. 405; Riggs v. Roberts, 85 N. C. 153. Since the statute, the words used are as applicable to this case: "The promise must be unconditional." Greenleaf v. Railroad Co., 91 N. C. 33. It must be "certain in its terms." Long v. Oxford, 104 N. C. 408, 10 S. E. 525. In Riggs v. Roberts, supra, the words "distinct and specific," and "unequivocal," are really applied to a promise to pay which would revive a debt from which the debtor had been discharged in bankruptcy. While either one of these qualifying words, alone, would be applicable to the promise or acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute of limitations, there is no special weight superadded by the use of them all at once. The law speaks for itself: "No acknowledgment or promise shall be received as evidence of a new or continuing contract whereby to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same be contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby." Here is the original contract, liable to be defeated by the plea of the statute, but still continuing. Here is the correspondence between the agent of the payee and the maker himself; it is perfectly definite and certain as to what note is meant. And here is the letter of the defendant, in which he refers to the letter which describes it and demands payment; he proposes to settle both claims the first of next month. The defendant was probably no philologist. He used words in their ordinary acceptation, and which could not be misunderstood. We think they fill the letter and spirit of the statute. There is error, and a new trial must be awarded.

EXECUTION—AGAINST LAND OF DECEDENT—WILLS—CONSTRUCTION.

1. A sale of a decedent's land under a writ of venditioni exponas issued after his death, without the issue and service of a scire facias against his heirs, is null and void.

2. A will gave land to testator's wife for life, and after her death to his son, providing that the son, before taking possession, should give or secure to his sisters a certain sum of money, and that, in case he should fail to do so, the land should be sold, and such sums be paid them, the balance of the proceeds to be paid the son. Held, that after the widow's death the daughters had neither title nor right to possession of the land, but only the right to prevent the son's occupying it and appropriating the rents until the sums due them should be paid, or else to have the land sold; and where, instead of taking this course, they rented out the land and appropriated the income, they are liable to account to the son therefor.

Action by Solomon J. Barfield against Ally A. Barfield and others to recover land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence the will of John Barfield, probated in 1849, under the fourth and fifth items of which he claimed the land in controversy. The fourth item of said will is as follows: "I leave to my wife, during her natural life, the home plantation, and I hereby request her to relinquish her life estate in forty acres of land which she has, as will appear by reference to a deed made by me to my son, Solomon Barfield, in lieu of that to have her life estate in my home place;" and the fifth item of said will is as follows: "After the death of my wife I give, devise, and bequeath to my son, Solomon Barfield, to him and his heirs forever, all my lands lying on Buck swamp, in the county of Wayne. My son, Solomon, however, is, before he takes possession of the home plantation, (where his mother will reside during her lifetime,) required to give or to secure to my two youngest daughters, Ally A. and Mary, three hundred and fifty dollars apiece; and in case he fails to pay or secure the payment to them of the above-mentioned sums, three hundred and fifty dollars to each of them, then, and in that case, the home plantation to be sold, they each to receive the share due to them, and the balance of the money to go to Solomon and his heirs." It was admitted that the land in controversy, and described in the complaint, is the same as the home plantation spoken of in said will; that John Barfield died on the 20th day of October, 1848, and that Nancy Barfield, his widow, qualified as his executrix, May, 1849; that Nancy Barfield, his widow, died on the 16th day of August, 1889; that the defendants Ally A. Barfield and Mary R. Barfield (now wife of the defendant D. A. Cogdell) are children of John and Nancy Barfield, and are the persons named as devisees in said will; that defendants are in possession of said land, and were in possession when this action was begun, and refuse to surrender the same; that said defendants have been in possession of said land since the death of Nancy Barfield, and were in possession at and before her death; that on the 27th day of February, 1892, a notice was delivered to the defendants, of which the following is a copy: "To Ally A. Barfield and Mary R. Cogdell: The will of our father, John Barfield, leaves the home plantation, on which he lived, on Buck and Thunder swamps, in Wayne county, to me after the death of our mother, Nancy Barfield, now dead, and I now demand possession of the same; and I will now pay you each the sum of $350, as provided in said will, if you elect to surrender the possession of said land to me without litigation. Let me know if you will do so by the 15th of March, 1892; otherwise, I shall assume that you refuse to deliver possession on the condition above stated. This 27th of February, 1892. Sol. J. Barfield. Witness: Daniel Kornegay,"—and that no other offer to pay or secure said sums of $350 each has been made, and no money has been tendered, except as shown in said notice, or paid into court by the plaintiff.

Evidence was introduced by plaintiff to show the rental value of the land since 1889. The defendants put in evidence the following receipt: "Received of Mrs. Nancy Barfield $75.00, being the amount bid by her for the tract of land on which John Barfield lived, on the north side of Thunder swamp and on the south side of Falling creek, joining the lands of George L. Kornegay, James Manly, and others, sold by me by virtue of a writ of venditioni exponas issued from the superior court of Johnston county to satisfy a judgment recovered by the state of North Carolina, and returnable to the fall term, 1853, of said court, said land being sold by me at public auction this 15th day of August, 1853," (signed by the sheriff,) and also a writing signed by said sheriff, (O. Coor,) dated in 1869, and purporting to be a deed made by him to Nancy Barfield, and corresponding to this receipt. This writing was not under seal. They also put in evidence a deed from Nancy Barfield to them, dated in 1881, and introduced evidence to show that they had rented out the land since her death, and had received the income therefrom. There was evidence tending to show that the femes defendant had removed two houses from the land, and their value. One of the plaintiff's witnesses testified that he paid to Nancy Barfield, executrix of the will of John Barfield, $6000, between 1850 and 1855. This was objected to. The objection was overruled, and the defendants excepted. The following issues were submitted to the jury: "(1) Is the plaintiff the owner, and entitled to the possession, of the land described in the complaint, subject to the defendants' lien under the will of John Barfield, as alleged in the complaint? (2) Are defendants in possession thereof? (3) What is the annual value for rents and profits? (4) What damages other than rents is plaintiff entitled to recover, if any?" His honor instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the land, and they should answer the first issue, "Yes." The defendants excepted, as follows: "(1) For that the plaintiff deduced his title from the fifth item of the will of John Barfield, and by said item a condition precedent was attached before the plaintiff could take possession of the land, to wit, the payment or security of $350 each to Ally and Mary Barfield, and it did not appear that the condition had been performed; that the offer of February 27, 1892, did not fulfill the condition for the reasons—First, that the plaintiff did not make an actual tender of money; second, that he did not tender interest from the death of the life tenant; and, third, that he did not pay into court the amount admitted to be due the defendants. (2) For that the defendants had shown title to the land in controversy." There was a verdict for the plaintiff. His honor stated the account between the parties, charging the plaintiff with interest on the sums due to the femes defendant ($350 each) from the day of the death of Nancy Barfield, the tenant for life, and charging the defendants with the rents from January 1, 1890, and also with the damages assessed by the jury on account of the removal of the houses; and, having then determined what was due to each of the femes defendant, ($141.44,) he then made the following order: "It is ordered and adjudged that plaintiff is the owner, and entitled to recover possession, of the property described in the complaint; that upon the payment to the clerk by the plaintiff, for the use of Ally A. Barfield and Mary R. Cogdell, of the above-mentioned sums of money, then he shall issue a writ of possession. In case said money is not paid, with interest, within ninety days after April 17, 1893, it is adjudged that the land be sold for cash, after advertisement, by the clerk, to the highest bidder at the courthouse in Wayne county, and, in case of sale, that he report his proceedings to the next term of court, and that the proceeds be applied in payment of said liens in favor of defendants, hereinbefore adjudged, and remainder, if any, to plaintiff. Let costs be taxed against defendants, and execution issue after the expiration of said ninety days." The defendants excepted to the judgment rendered. "(1) For that the plaintiff is allowed rents prior to February 27, 1892, when he claims to have tendered payment to the defendants. (2) For that it was adjudged that plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to the possession, of the land in controversy."

Allen & Dortch, for appellants. W. T. Faircloth, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. The contention of the defendants, that Nancy Barfield acquired a title in fee to the land in dispute by virtue of a purchase of it by her at a sale made in 1853 by the sheriff of Wayne county, has nothing to support it. They themselves showed that, if it was sold at all, (of which there was in fact no legal evidence,) the sale was made under a writ of venditioni exponas issued several years after the death of John Barfield, and they made no proof whatever of the issuing or serving of any scire facias against his heirs. The writ was null and void, (Samuel v. Zachery, 28 N. C. 377,) and every act done under it goes for nothing. This disposes of the defendants' alleged title, and brings us to the consideration of the rights of the parties under the will of John Barfield.

By that will, the title to the land, upon the death of the widow, was vested plainly in the plaintiff and his heirs. The title did not in any event descend to all the heirs of John Barfield, nor did it in any contingency vest in the femes defendant, his daughters. The latter had, under that instrument, neither title nor right of possession. The land was simply charged with the payment of the sum of $350 to each of them. It was their privilege, according to the provision of the will, to prevent their brother from occupying the land, and appropriating the rents to his own use, till these sums were paid to them, and to that end they might have invoked the aid and protection of a court by proper proceedings to have the rent collected and reserved, and the land sold, so that, out of the fund so arising, they might certainly have what the testator said they should have. Instead of pursuing this course, they chose to assert a title adverse to the plaintiff devisee, to rent out the land, and appropriate the income to their own use, and, when their pretended title fails, they insist that the rents accruing from the death of the life tenant to the date of plaintiff's offer to pay the sums charged on the land for them belonged to them, and that they are not accountable therefor to the plaintiff. His honor properly decided that they should account for all the rents received by them. As we have said, they had no right to the possession, either as heirs at law or devisees. Had the testator put the title in them, with a provision that it should vest in the plaintiff when he paid to each of them the sums named, the rents might have been theirs till the payment was made, or there was a proper tender of payment. But this provision the testator did not see fit to make. He willed that they should have a certain sum of money. This they will have received when the judgment is fully executed, with interest thereon from the day it was first incumbent on the plaintiff to pay it. It is difficult to see how they can, with any show of reason, claim more than this under their father's will. The judgment, we think, in a very proper manner provides for an adjustment and settlement of the conflicting claims of the parties. The evidence in relation to the payment of money to the executrix of John Barfield's will was immaterial. Its admission, if erroneous, was harmless. Affirmed.

STATE v. DE GRAFF.

CRIMINAL LAW—ADMISSIONS—PROOF OF HANDWRITING—NEW TRIAL.

1. When a motion to quash the indictment, on the ground of the relationship of a grand juror to the person injured, is made after arraignment and plea, and refused, without reasons assigned, the exercise of the court's discretion is presumed, and its order is not reviewable.

2. When a juror was challenged, and it appears that his opinion, adverse to the accused, was based on rumors only, and he testified that, after hearing the evidence, he could render a fair and impartial verdict, the court's finding that he was impartial will not be disturbed.

3. The mere fact that an officer, in making the arrest, pointed a pistol at the accused, and advised him to give up, does not vitiate the latter's subsequent admissions, under circumstances showing that he had no fear of violence.

4. Code, § 1146, provides that, at the commencement of his examination, the prisoner shall be informed by the magistrate that he may refuse to answer any question put to him, and that such refusal shall not be used to his prejudice. Accused was duly warned that he need not say anything unless he wanted to, and it would not be used against him, if he did not testify, that it was dangerous to go on the stand, etc. Held, a substantial compliance with the statute, so as to admit the accused's statements made before the magistrate.

5. A witness testified that he had been many years a bookkeeper; was secretary and treasurer of the city; it was his duty, as such, to compare writings to see which were genuine; to examine checks and drafts; had been in the business 15 years; had such experience in inspecting handwritings that he could compare a paper with one known to be genuine, and tell if the former was genuine. Held, that he was competent as an expert to make such comparison.

6. A witness testified that he had been four or five years register of deeds; had occasion to examine signatures; was frequently called on to prove signatures of deceased persons in the clerk's office; used a magnifying glass to detect erasures; had such experience that he could compare a writing with one admitted to be genuine, and tell if the former were genuine. Held, that he was competent as an expert to make such comparison.

7. An affidavit made by the accused in the same case, the signature being admittedly genuine, is a proper exemplar for comparing handwriting.

8. It is within the court's discretion to refuse a new trial for newly-discovered evidence that a witness for the state had, before trial, spoken in hostile terms of the prisoner, and stated that he desired his conviction.

9. Affidavits of grounds for new trial cannot be considered by the supreme court, in reviewing the order refusing a new trial, unless the facts have been found by the trial court, and spread upon the record.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Winston, Judge.

The Attorney General, for the State.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The prisoner was indicted for the murder of one Ellen Smith, and, after his arraignment, moved to quash the indictment, on the ground that one of the grand jurors was a cousin of the deceased, and therefore disqualified to participate in the finding of the bill. In State v. Gardner, 104 N. C. 739, 10 S. E. 146, it is held that, if a motion to quash for the disqualification of a grand juror is made before plea, the prisoner has a right to have the motion granted; but if the motion be made after plea, but before the jury is impaneled, it may be granted or not, in the sound discretion of the judge; and in such latter case, if the motion is simply declined, without the assignment of any reason, it will be assumed that such discretion was exercised, and no appeal will lie from the ruling. The exception, therefore, to the refusal of the motion, is without merit.

Two of the petit jurors were challenged, and, after examination, the court found that they were impartial, and they were sworn. It appears that their opinions, adverse to the prisoner, were based upon rumors only, and they both stated that, after hearing the testimony, they could render a fair and impartial verdict. The exceptions to the rulings of the court upon the question of indifference, based upon such examination, cannot be sustained. State v. Ellington, 7 Ired. 61; State v. Collins, 70 N. C. 243; Busb. Dig. 336, 337.

In the course of the trial, certain confessions were offered by the state, and their admission was excepted to, because of alleged threats made by the witness on the occasion of the arrest of the prisoner. The witness Adams, a policeman, testified as follows: "I went to help arrest the prisoner. The sheriff and two others went along. Saw prisoner at the window of Russell's house at about 12 o'clock at night. He pulled the curtain back. I said to the prisoner: 'Peter, you had just as well give up. You may get one of us, but we will get you.' We went in, and I pointed my pistol at the prisoner. Prisoner had three heavy pistols and 52 rounds of cartridges in a trunk by the bed. After the prisoner put on his clothes, he began to make fun of us for coming after him with little popguns. We had Smith & Wesson's pistols. He said, 'Let me show you some pistols,' and he showed us these three large pistols. He rode behind me on a horse to Winston. He was not frightened, nor was he tied. No threats were made to him and no promises, and his statements were voluntary." The witness, at another stage of the trial, was examined again upon this subject, but his testimony was substantially the same. The witness then testified to declarations made by the prisoner concerning his flight to Roanoke and New Mexico, and his subsequent return to this state. It is hardly necessary to cite authority in support of the ruling of the court. The single circumstance of pointing the pistol at the prisoner, in connection with the language of the witness, indicating that it was done only for the purpose of effecting the arrest, very clearly would not have authorized the exclusion of the declarations subsequently made; and especially is this so in view of the conduct of the prisoner, showing that he had no actual fear of violence, and also because of the entire absence of any circumstances whatever that were likely to produce such an apprehension.

It appears that, when the officer was on the porch of the house where the prisoner was staying, the owner inquired, "Who was it?" It also appears that the prisoner was in the room, and heard the remark. The remark was harmless, but had it been otherwise, having been made in the presence of the prisoner, it was plainly admissible. State v. Ludwick, Phil. (N. C.) 401. This exception, like several others, is so trivial that, but for the gravity of the charge, it would be overruled without comment.

Neither is there any force in the objection to the admission of the statements of the prisoner before the committing magistrate. The testimony upon this point is that "he was duly warned; told that he need not say anything unless he wanted to, and it would not be used against him if he did not testify, and it was dangerous to go on the stand," etc. It is well settled that, in cautioning the prisoner under such circumstances, it is not necessary that the exact language of the statute (Code, § 1146) should be used. A substantial compliance is sufficient, and such was the case in the present instance. State v. Rogers, 112 N. C. 874, 17 S. E. 297.

Equally untenable is the objection to the testimony touching the general character of the witness Davis, and the same is true as to the question asked the said witness whether the prisoner told him where the deceased was at a certain time. The witness gave a negative answer, and, even if the question were objectionable, (and we do not see that it is,) the prisoner could not have been prejudiced thereby.

The state introduced a letter found in the bosom of the dead woman, and introduced Wilson, as an expert, to prove that the said letter was in the handwriting of the prisoner. Wilson, being examined by the court as to his qualifications as an expert, testified as follows: "Was bookkeeper many years. Am secretary and treasurer of the city. It is my duty as such to compare handwritings, to see which are genuine and which are not; to examine checks and drafts. Have been in the business 15 years. I have had such experience in the business of inspecting handwritings that I can compare a paper with one whose genuineness is known, and tell if the former paper is genuine." His honor held that the witness had been properly qualified as an expert, and the prisoner excepted. The witness was then handed an affidavit made by the prisoner in this case, the signature to which was admitted to be genuine, and the witness was permitted to compare the same with the letter, and to give his opinion as to whether the letter was in the handwriting of the prisoner, and the prisoner excepted. Another witness, J. P. Stanton, was also examined, and gave similar testimony. He testified in reference to his competency as an expert as follows: "Have been four or five years register of deeds of the county. Had occasion to examine signatures. Frequently called on to prove signatures in clerk's office of dead men's names. Used magnifying glass to detect erasures. Have had such experience that I can compare a writing with one admitted to be genuine, and tell if the former is genuine." All of the exceptions addressed to the admission of this testimony are so fully discussed in the elaborate opinion of this court in Tunstall v. Cobb, 109 N. C. 816, 14 S. E. 28, that it is only necessary to refer to it as decisive authority as to the qualification of these witnesses as experts, and in support of the ruling under which they were permitted to state their opinions, based upon the comparison of the writings in evidence. See, also, Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 142, and Fuller v. Fox, 101 N. C. 119, 7 S. E. 589.

The testimony as to Ray's leaving after the homicide was evoked by the prisoner upon cross-examination, and cannot form a ground of exception. It seems, however, to have been immaterial, and in no view could it have prejudiced the prisoner.

After the verdict, the prisoner moved for a new trial, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, which was to the effect that one Brewer, a witness for the state, had, before the trial, expressed himself in very bitter terms against the prisoner, stating, in effect, that he desired his conviction, etc. The affidavit also states that the prisoner did not know of the hostility of said witness until after the counsel had argued the case. It is well settled that the granting of a new trial upon newly-discovered evidence is, in the absence of gross abuse, a matter within the discretion of the court, and that its refusal to do so is not reviewable upon appeal. It is also well established that the court will not exercise such a discretion where the new testimony is merely cumulative, or, as in this case, only tends to contradict or discredit the opposing witness. Therefore, even if the ruling of his honor were the subject of review, we would have but little hesitation in sustaining it. State v. Starnes, 97 N. C. 423, 2 S. E. 447; Carson v. Dellinger, 90 N. C. 226; State v. Mitchell, 102 N. C. 347, 9 S. E. 702. It may be observed, in passing from this exception, that there was abundant evidence, besides the testimony of Brewer, to support the conviction of the prisoner, and that the hostility of this witness, if known to the jury, would very probably have had no influence upon the verdict.

The remaining question to be considered grows out of the affidavit of one Hudson to the effect that two of the jurors who tried the case had, on several occasions before the trial, expressed the opinion that the prisoner was guilty, and that the affiant did not inform either the prisoner or his counsel of the fact. It is stated in the motion, but not in the affidavit, that these jurors made a contrary statement on the voir dire. His honor overruled the motion, but found no facts, and it is settled by repeated decisions that, where the facts are not found, the affidavits cannot be considered in this court. In State v. Godwin, 5 Ired. 401, Chief Justice Ruffin discussed the question very elaborately, and adopted the above conclusion as "unavoidable." In that case the prisoner was convicted of murder, and moved for a new trial, on affidavits tending to show improper conduct on the part of the jury. The chief justice said: "It is not in the power of this court to look into the affidavits, or, at least, to act on them. One would think this must be understood, upon a moment's reflection on the nature of the jurisdiction of the court. In matters of common law, it is strictly a court of errors, and can only review the matters of law. We cannot, therefore, go out of the record, or pay any regard to affidavits, for the evidence forms no part of the record. A record is constituted of the pleadings, the acts of the parties in court, and the acts and doings of the jury and court thereon. If advantage is sought by any extrinsic matter which occurs at the trial or in the course of proceeding, it must be put into the record as a fact, or be stated in an exception, and not left to be collected by this court upon evidence. This evidence is directed exclusively to the judge who tried the cause, and his determination on it is conclusive. He ought not to state, therefore, the evidence submitted to him, but his judgment as to the fact itself, which the evidence was offered to establish. * * * When, therefore, a motion is made to vacate a verdict for certain alleged causes, the first thing is to ascertain whether the alleged causes really exist, for, until the facts be found, no question of law can arise, and this court is confined to the consideration of the matter of law only. We can in such case do nothing, * * * and therefore, acting judicially, we must assume that the application was unsupported in point of fact, though we might in our private judgment think there was evidence before the judge on which he might or ought to have found the fact" in favor of the prisoner's contention. In Rinehardt v. Potts, 7 Ired. 403, the motion for a new trial for gross misconduct of the jurors was based upon an uncontradicted affidavit, and Daniel, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The case sent up here only states [as in the present case] 'that the court refused the motion.' We do not know upon what grounds the judge refused the said motion. It may have been because he did not believe the affidavit of Dowdle. The defendant did not pray the court to give the reason for rejecting the motion, and we cannot see that it was in fact overruled against law. We cannot say there was any error in the judgment of the judge on this part of the case. We have often stated that this court cannot act upon affidavits offered in the court below." In State v. Smallwood, 78 N. C. 560, after a conviction for murder, the prisoner made a similar motion, based upon uncontradicted affidavits, and the court, on the authority of the above decisions, held that it would not look into the affidavits. Bynum, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "They [the court] only decide upon the record presented to them, and therefore, if such motion is designed to be submitted to their revision, the facts must be ascertained by the court below, and spread upon the record. That has not been done in this case." This point was recently before the court in State v. Best, 111 N. C. 638, 15 S. E. 930, in which the authority of the foregoing cases was again recognized and approved, and we think that no rule of practice is better established in this state. The prisoner is required, under this rule, to request a finding of facts; and if this is refused, and there is any phase of the testimony which presents a legal, and not merely a discretionary, ground for a new trial, it seems that it will be awarded by this court. While this requirement of the prisoner may be attended in some instances with injustice, by reason of his neglect, yet it would seem to be no more than the application of the general principle that all motions and exceptions must, even at the peril of life, be taken in apt time. We cannot, however, forbear repeating the earnest injunction of Chief Justice Ruffin that the facts be found in motions of this nature, whether requested by the prisoner or not. In the present case the judge, in view of all the circumstances, may have acted wisely, supposing he was vested with discretionary power, under the ruling in Spicer v. Fulghum, 67 N. C. 18, (a point which it is unnecessary to decide,) or he may have concluded that the affidavit was unworthy of belief, or that no challenge was in fact made to the jurors. State v. Perkins, 66 N. C. 126; Baxter v. Wilson, 95 N. C. 137. However this may be, we are not, under the rule to which we have referred, and which has ever been so rigidly followed, permitted to act upon the affidavit offered by the prisoner. Until the rule is relaxed, the only remedy to be found in a meritorious case is in the executive department of the government. After a patient and careful investigation of the record, we have been unable to discover any error in the rulings of the court, and, in view of the whole testimony, we see no reason for disturbing the verdict. Affirmed.

HOMESTEAD—WHO MAY CLAIM—"RESIDENT OF THIS STATE."

1. The court charged: "The words, 'a resident of this state,' in Const. art. 10, § 2, regarding homesteads, have a more restricted meaning than 'domicile.' To entitle a person to the constitutional exemption, he must be an actual, not constructive, resident. Where the facts show an actual removal from the state, even for a definite period, the person so removing ceases, while absent, to be a resident, though he intend to return and resume his residence." Held correct, and corrective of a previous instruction that a resident is one who has a permanent dwelling, to which, when absent, he intends to return; that a residence continues until he acquires another by actual removal, with intention to remain altogether for a definite or indefinite period; that residence is established by occupancy and intention to make a home; that, these concurring, the time of residence is immaterial,—this instruction being appropriate to "domicile," but too broad as applied to "residence" entitling to homestead.

2. An instruction that if defendant actually removed to another state for a definite or indefinite period, and had his home there, then that would be his residence; but if he only went to trade in the winter, and return in the spring to his home in the state, and did not actually move to the other state, and settle there, as his home, then he had his homestead rights in the state,—correctly defines the rights of one claiming homestead as "a resident of the state," under Const. art. 10, § 2.

3. In an action for possession of land, by the holder of the sheriff's deed against the judgment debtor, the burden is on defendant, claiming the land as homestead, to show that a homestead had not before been allotted him, but if he make such showing the burden is on plaintiff to prove that defendant was not entitled to the land in question as homestead; and, defendant's former residence in the county being admitted, it is for plaintiff to show that defendant had later become a resident of another state.

Appeal from superior court, Surry county; McCorkle, Judge.

Action for possession of land by Winston Fulton against Rufus Roberts and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff claimed under a sheriff's deed made in pursuance of a sale of the locus in quo made by S. H. Taylor, sheriff of Surry county, to satisfy an execution in his hands against the property of defendant Rufus Roberts. The defendants resisted plaintiff's recovery, and claimed that the sheriff sold the property without first having allotted homestead to the defendant Rufus Roberts, and that the sale was, therefore, void. The plaintiff contended (1) that, under the admissions filed of record, there was no necessity for laying off homestead before the sale; (2) that defendant Rufus Roberts was not entitled to have homestead allotted him, because, at the time of said sale by the sheriff, he was not a resident of this state. The admitted facts filed of record are as follows: "It is admitted that, at the time of sale by sheriff of the lot in controversy, the lot was a lot on which there was a cabinet shop one hundred feet by two hundred feet, in Mt. Airy, and unoccupied, and that the defendant owned and occupied as a residence, if not a residence of Georgia, the Sulphur Springs tract, of seventy-five acres of land, four miles from Mt. Airy, and that this tract was worth five thousand dollars or more." Holton, Haymore, Graves, Watson & Buxton, Attorneys for Plaintiff. Carter, Joyse, Sparger, Glenn, Attorneys for Defendants.

The following issue was submitted: "At the time of the sale of the locus in quo, on the 27th day of April, 1881, was the defendant Roberts a resident of North Carolina?"

Upon this issue alone, there was a large amount of testimony offered by the plaintiff, tending to show that prior to said sale the defendant Rufus Roberts had sold off at auction, and privately, all of his real estate, consisting of plantations and town lots in Mt. Airy, except the lot in controversy, and two or three other lots sold on same day by the sheriff, and except the Sulphur Springs tract, which tract he was offering for sale; also, tending to show that he had bought real estate in Milledgeville, Ga., and erected buildings thereon and farm near by; also, evidence of declarations made by Roberts to various persons, both before and after the sale, claiming Georgia as his home, and disclaiming North Carolina, declaring he could not be induced to live here again. The defendant testified in his own behalf that, while he went into the mercantile and farming business in Georgia, he had never abandoned North Carolina as his home, and offered much evidence to corroborate him, and to sustain the affirmative of the issue. There being no exception taken by plaintiff to evidence, it is deemed unnecessary to set it out in full.

After the close of the evidence and the argument of counsel, the judge charged the jury, in writing, as follows: "The time has arrived when you are called upon to act. This is an important case. You have given it a patient hearing. A large amount of testimony has been introduced. You will scarcely see as many intelligent witnesses, and more ably argued on both sides by counsel, than in this case. You will consider all that has been said by all the witnesses. If you find any discrepancy in their testimony, you will reconcile it, if you can; and, if you cannot do that, then you may believe one, and reject another,—believe a part or the whole, as you may judge to be right. You will consider the intelligence and opportunity of the witnesses of knowing the facts to which they testify. You may consider their demeanor, and their interest in the matter in controversy, and the relation they stand in to the parties. And after you have considered all the facts, as deposed to by the witnesses, then you will determine the issue submitted to you. "The burden of satisfying you, by a preponderance of testimony, that the defendant Roberts was a nonresident at the time of the sale is thrown upon the plaintiff." The only issue you have to try is whether, at the time of the sale of the locus in quo, was the defendant Roberts a resident of the state of North Carolina on the 27th day of April, 1881? A 'resident' denotes one who has a permanent dwelling, to which the party, when absent, intends to return. The residence of a person continues until he acquires another by actually removing to another country with the intention of remaining in the latter altogether for an indefinite period or a definite period. Two things must concur to constitute residence;

First, occupancy; secondly, the intention to make it a home. If these two concur, it makes no difference how short his residence may be in the new residence. The words, 'a resident of this state,' employed in Const. art. 10, § 2, in respect to homestead, have a more restricted meaning than that usually given to 'domicile.' To entitle a person to the constitutional exemption, he must be an actual, and not a constructive, resident. Where the facts show an actual removal from the state, even for a definite period, the person so removing ceases, so long as he remains absent, to be a resident of the state, in respect to his right to a homestead, although he may have the intent to return and resume his residence. So, if you find that defendant Roberts actually removed to the state of Georgia for a definite period or an indefinite period, and had his home there, then that would be his residence, and he would not be entitled to the homestead in this state, and you will answer, 'No.' But if he only went to Georgia for the purpose of trading in the winter, and returning in the spring to his home in North Carolina, and did not actually move to Georgia, and settle there, as his home, then he would be entitled to a homestead in this state, and you will answer the issue, 'Yes.'

The jury found the issue, "Yes," and the plaintiff's counsel moved the court for a judgment for the possession of the land upon his sheriff's title, and the admissions filed of record, insisting that there was no necessity, under the law, for the allotment of homestead before the sale. Motion refused by the court, and plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff then moved for a new trial because of error in the instructions to the jury given by the court, and assigns as erroneous that part of the instructions appearing in italics. Motion overruled, and plaintiff appealed.

AVERY, J. Two questions are raised by this appeal: (1) If it be admitted that the defendant Rufus Roberts was a citizen of North Carolina, could the sheriff lawfully sell, under execution issued against him upon a judgment recovered on a debt created since 1868, a tract of land belonging to him, other than that upon which he lived, and distant four miles from it, when no homestead had been allotted to him? (2) Was the definition of "a resident," given in the instruction of the court to the jury, because of its inaccuracy or inconsistency, calculated to mislead them in passing upon the issue submitted?

While it may have been supposed by the framers of the organic law that a debtor would usually elect to have his homestead allotted in his dwelling place and the surrounding land, "his choice is not positively restricted to that nor to contiguous land." Mayho v. Cotton, 69 N. C. 292; Hughes v.

Hodges, 102 N. C. 246, 9 S. E. 437; Flora v. Robbins, 93 N. C. 40. The constitution guarantees the right of selection between different tracts, in express terms, if, as suggested in Mayo v. Cotton, supra, the power would not have been implied necessarily in the grant of exemption in a home worth $1,000. Const. art. 10, § 2.

The sale, having been made to satisfy a debt created since the homestead exemption became a part of the constitution, was void, therefore, if the defendant was, as a resident of this state at that time, entitled to the benefit of that privilege. Long v. Walker, 105 N. C. 90, 10 S. E. 858. It is true that the general definition of a "resident" given by the court was incorrect, and embodied the very terms in which this court has defined "domiciled," which is a much more comprehensive term. Horne v. Horne, 9 Ired. 99; Plummer v. Brandon, 5 Ired. Eq. 190. Generally, one who has acquired a domicile at a given place must have resided there with the intention of making it a home, and the fact that he temporarily resided elsewhere, with the purpose of returning to such home, would not impair any right growing out of having become domiciled there. Fleming v. Straley, 1 Ired. 305; Burke County Com'rs v. Buncombe County Com'rs, 101 N. C. 520, 8 S. E. 176. But, however erroneous the general proposition may have been, the more specific instruction as to the "restricted meaning of the words, 'a resident,'" in article 10, § 2, of the constitution, must, of necessity, have been understood by the jury, and followed in answering the issue submitted to them. If the jury were made to comprehend what was meant by the words, as used in the constitution in reference to the right of exemption, and that their inquiry was limited to ascertaining whether the facts brought the defendant within the definition of a "resident," as the words are there used, the confounding of "domicile" with "residence" in the abstract proposition was a harmless error. The instruction which bore directly upon the issue was as follows: "The words, 'a resident of this state,' employed in the constitution, (section 2,) in respect to homesteads, have a more restricted meaning than is usually given to 'domicile.' To entitle a person to a constitutional exemption, he must be an actual, and not a constructive, resident. Where the facts show an actual removal from the state, even for a definite period, the person so removing ceases, so long as he remains absent, to be a resident of the state, in respect to his rights to a homestead, although he may have the intent to return and resume his residence." Although a juror might have thought that for some purposes a resident might mean one who is domiciled, he could not fail to understand from the foregoing instruction that one who actually removed from the state for a limited period, even animo revertendi, would forfeit his right of exemption by failure to occupy the place protected by the constitution for the purpose of furnishing him a home. Indeed, the explanatory proposition embodies substantially the language used by the court in Lee v. Moseley, 101 N. C. 814, 7 S. E. 874, and in Munds v. Cassidey, 98 N. C. 563, 4 S. E. 353, 355, to draw the distinction between a domicile, as understood in reference to the right of suffrage or of administration, and a residence, such as was essential to the retention of the right of exemption under the constitution.

We see no error in the last paragraph of the charge. If the defendant did not actually remove to Georgia, and make it even a temporary home, but visited that state for the purpose of trading in the winter, and returned to his home in North Carolina in the spring, he acquired none of the advantages, and must be subject to none of the disadvantages, there incident, in contemplation of law, either to being a resident or domiciled during such a sojourn. Though he may have been accompanied by his family, he would not have been entitled to the benefit of similar exemption laws as a resident of Georgia; and, adopting the test suggested by this court, we must conclude that the right of exemption ceases here when, by reason of a change of residence, it begins in another state, or when a similar occupancy of a place of residence by one coming from a sister state to this state would entitle such person to the benefit of section 2, art. 10, of our constitution. Lee v. Moseley, and Munds v. Cassidey, supra; Baker v. Legget, 98 N. C. 304, 4 S. E. 37. It is not necessary to a decision of the questions involved in this case to advert to the difference in the character of the residence or domicile which would entitle one to the right of suffrage, protect him against attachment, or qualify him to administer on an estate. Boyer v. Teague, 106 N. C. 602, 11 S. E. 665; Wheeler v. Cobb, 75 N. C. 21; Hannon v. Grizzard, 89 N. C. 115; Roberts v. Cannon, 4 Dev. & B. 256; Carden v. Carden, 107 N. C. 214, 12 S. E. 197; Abrams v. Pender, Busb. 260.

The onus was upon the defendant to show that a homestead had not been allotted to him, as, in the absence of any evidence beyond the proof of judgment, execution, levy, and sale,—all apparently regular,—the presumption would have been in favor of the validity of plaintiff's title. Mobley v. Griffin, 104 N. C. 112, 10 S. E. 142; Bule v. Scott, 107 N. C. 181, 12 S. E. 198; 2 Whart. Ev. §§ 1318, 1319. But, as soon as it appeared in evidence that a homestead had not in fact been allotted, the presumption in favor of the regularity of judicial proceedings was rebutted, as it would have been if the same fact had appeared upon the face of the record. Mobley v. Griffin and Bule v. Scott, supra. It would not have been incumbent on the plaintiff, in a case where the record showed that no exemption had been allowed, to negative the possibility of nonresidence. But if it had not been decided, in both of the cases cited, that proof that no homestead was allotted upon what appeared, either from the date of the judgment or of the contract, to be a new debt, rebutted the presumption of regularity in the sale, another principle may be invoked, which is clearly decisive of the question as to the correctness of the charge. It was shown, and admitted by both parties, that the defendant had been a resident of Surry county, in the state of North Carolina, prior to his purchase of the property and engaging in mercantile business in Milledgeville, Ga. That fact being settled, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that his place of residence was not still the same, because the law presumed the status once shown to continue, (2 Whart. Ev. §§ 1285, 1286,) generally, and especially as to place of residence; and the duty resting upon a plaintiff to show his right to recover shifted, therefore, to Fulton, upon the rebuttal of the presumption in favor of the regularity in the sale, on which his prima facie case was dependent. The burden of showing a change of domicile, when it becomes material to do so, "unquestionably lies on the party who asserts the change," (5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 865,) and "it is presumed that the residence of a person continues to be in the place where it is proved to have been until the contrary is shown." 17 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 76. We conclude, therefore, that, in view of the admitted fact that the defendant had resided in Surry county, the burden of showing that he had subsequently become a resident of another state, when his land was sold, rested upon the plaintiff, and there was no error in so instructing the jury. ADAMS v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF WINSTON.

BANKS—OVERDRAFT OF FIRM—CHARGES ON INDIVIDUAL ACCOUNT.

A bank cannot charge an overdraft of a firm against the individual account of a member of the firm, though the member, as such, may be liable for the overdraft.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; E. T. Boykin, Judge.

Action by J. J. Adams against the First National Bank of Winston to recover the sum of $40, alleged to be due on account. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff, introduced as witness in his own behalf, testified that on the 21st day of March, 1892, the firm of J. J. Adams & Co., composed of himself and one J. A. Reid, dissolved copartnership; that theretofore they had an account with the defendant bank, and plaintiff went to defendant bank before noon of the said day, and asked for the account in bank of J. J. Adams & Co., wishing to know the balance; that he was told by the bookkeeper of the bank that the balance due J. J. Adams & Co. was $201.08, which amount was there and then paid to him; that this sum was coming to witness as due him of the assets of J. J. Adams & Co.; that several days thereafter, about the 23d of March, the plaintiff deposited with the defendant bank the sum of $615 of his own money from the sale of his own individual property, and opened the account in his own name; that he checked on this sum various times in various amounts, and that on the 5th day of April, 1892, he made a check for balance due him, when he was told by the officer of the bank that his check was not good by $40; that this sum had been taken from his account, by order of the president of the bank, and paid on a draft drawn by J. J. Adams & Co.; that his balance, less the $40, was paid to plaintiff, plaintiff demanding the total amount, including the $40, which was refused. Plaintiff further testified that he did not know whether the check for $40 drawn in the name of J. J. Adams & Co. was in the bank at the time he asked for the balance due J. J. Adams & Co., on March 21st, or not; that no notice of the dissolution of the copartnership of J. J. Adams & Co. has been given by publication. Col. James Martin, in behalf of the defendant, testified that he was a bookkeeper in the defendant bank, and on the 21st March, 1892, the plaintiff asked him for balance of J. J. Adams & Co., which he told him was $201.08, and which plaintiff made check for, and drew the amount out of bank. That a check of J. J. Adams & Co. for $40, made by J. A. Reid, came into bank, I think, on that day. It might have been in the bank at the time I gave the balance of $201.08 to Mr. Adams. It was not entered on the books, but might have been on the file. I cannot say whether it was in bank at the time or not. I did not know it had been paid by the teller. If I had known so, I would have charged it in the account of J. J. Adams & Co. before giving the plaintiff the balance. J. A. Reid, a witness for defendant, testified that he was a member of the firm of J. J. Adams & Co.; that he drew the check for $40 on the firm account in bank to pay an individual debt due by him for rent; that the check was given several days before the 21st of March; that the firm agreed to dissolve on the 21st of March, but no final settlement of the copartnership had ever been made; that on the 21st of March they quit business, and Adams drew out all they had in bank. The court instructed the jury, among other things, as follows: "That if the check given by J. A. Reid was paid by the defendant after the payment to plaintiff of the balance of $201.08, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover; that if, as the defendant contended, the check for $40 was paid by the bank before the check for $201.08 was paid plaintiff, and the defendant gave the balance by mistake, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover,"—to which charge, given as above stated, defendant excepted, and assigned as error the charge as above given; and, further, that he did not tell the jury that the defendant had a right to offset the $40 check as an overdraft of the firm against the individual account of J. J. Adams.

Watson & Buxton, for appellant. Glenn & Manly, for appellee.

CLARK, J. If the overdraft of the firm of which plaintiff was a member was paid by the bank after the balance was drawn out, it not appearing that the bank had any notice of the dissolution, such overdraft could be recovered by the bank out of the plaintiff as a member of the firm. If, at the time the plaintiff drew a check for the balance which the cashier told him was due the firm, in fact there was less due the firm, it was equally an overdraft, by mutual mistake of the parties, and the bank could recover it back out of the plaintiff as a member of the firm. But the bank had no right to charge up against the individual account of a member of a partnership a balance due it on the firm's account. Such right of set-off only exists between the same parties, and in the same right. Morse, Banks, § 334. The bank has no lien on the deposit of a partner for a balance due from the partnership. Bolles, Banks, § 385. The reason is thus given by Lord Langdale, master of the rolls, in Watts v. Christie, 11 Beav. 555: "It is of the nature and essence of transactions between banker and customer that a customer, having a balance in the hands of his banker, should have full power over it, and be able to command payment at sight. If, where there is an account between a firm and the bank, and another account with one particular member of the firm, it be once held that the bank has a lien upon the balance due upon the separate account of the individual partner for a balance due to the bank from the firm, there would be an end to some transactions which it is most important to commerce should be continued." Inasmuch as the members of the partnership can draw in the name of the firm, if their overdrafts can instantly be charged up against the individual account of a member of the firm, no partner would be safe in keeping his private account in the same bank where the partnership account is kept. Otherwise, his private funds, deposited perhaps for special engagements he may have in view, would be liable at any time to be swept away by checks drawn by another for his own personal ends, but in the name of the firm, and the partner's checks on his private account would go to protest, to his damage and inconvenience. Then, too, in case of insolvency and an assignment by the partner or of the partnership, his available cash could be subject to appropriation by the bank in this shorthand mode to his partnership liability, notwithstanding his or the firm's election in the deed of assignment to prefer another, or to share the assets pro rata; and this, also, would deprive the individual partner, having a sum to his credit, using it as his personal property exemption as against the indebtedness of the partnership to the bank. It is true, in the present case, the plaintiff being liable to the bank for the overdraft of the firm, the bank could sue him therefor, and hence, of course could have pleaded it as a counterclaim, instead of bringing an independent action. But the bank did not plead a counterclaim. It claimed the right to charge up against the individual account of the plaintiff the overdraft of the firm, and hence pleaded the general issue that it was not indebted. This it cannot do. The difference between a counterclaim and a payment is not merely technical, but substantial. Some of the differences are pointed out above. There are others, among them the cases in which the statute of limitations might be pleaded to the counterclaim. In the present case it is still open to the bank, as it did not plead the counterclaim, to bring an action against the plaintiff for the balance due by the firm. It is not yet barred by the statute of limitations, and, if the plaintiff has property in excess of his exemptions, the bank has lost nothing except the bill of cost in this case. While not concurring altogether in the reasons of his honor, we reach the same conclusion, and declare the judgment affirmed.

KIGER v. HARMOND.

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—WHEN LIES—INSTALLMENT MORTGAGE—PLEADINGS.

1. The action of claim and delivery for the possession of property under a chattel mortgage providing for payment of weekly installments may be maintained for the installments past due and unpaid at the date of the writ.

2. A demand for possession of the property, and for judgment for the debt secured, may be joined in an action of claim and delivery under a chattel mortgage.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; E. T. Boykin, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by S. L. Kiger against E. T. Harmond for the possession of property under a note and mortgage. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. B. Jones, for appellant.

CLARK, J. Though the note sued on purports to be due one day after date, the mortgage and contemporaneous agreement contain a stipulation that it should be paid in installments of $10 per month. Upon the trial the plaintiff was permitted, without objection, to amend so as to allege and prove that the agreement was to pay $10 per week. The note and mortgage must be construed together, and as making one contract. With the amendment allowed, (if the jury should find there was such a mistake as justified correcting the mortgage,) the weekly installments of $10, beginning July 1, 1892, when the first weekly installment was to have been paid, down to October 7, 1892, when this suit was instituted, would have amounted to $150. The third section of the complaint admits that $130 had been paid within that time. According to the complaint, there would have been, therefore, a balance due on the installments of $20 when suit was brought. The court erred, therefore, in holding that the action was premature. The plaintiff had a right, under the mortgage, to claim possession of the property to be applied on the installments due. It not being alleged and shown that the property was worth "not more than $50," the superior court alone had jurisdiction, as it would have had it concurrently with a justice of the peace, if of less than $50. Noville v. Dew, 94 N. C. 43; Code, § 887. It will be noted that there was no agreement here that, upon failure to pay one installment, all the installments should become due and payable, as in Capehart v. Dettrick, 91 N. C. 344; Kitchin v. Grandy, 101 N. C. 86, 7 S. E. 663; Whitehead v. Morrill, 108 N. C. 65, 12 S. E. 894. The verified complaint not having been answered, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for balance due on installments up to issuance of the writ, and for possession of property, that it might be sold, (or so much as was necessary,) to be applied on the judgment then obtained. Moore v. Woodward, 83 N. C. 531. But, as it was alleged that the property had been wasted since the bond in claim and delivery had been given, the value of the same, unless admitted to be as much as $20, is the subject of inquiry before a jury. Rogers v. Moore, 86 N. C. 85. The demands for possession of property and for judgment for the debt secured thereon are properly joined. Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) pp. 210-214, and cases cited. Even if this had been a misjoinder, the objection was waived if not taken by demurrer or answer. Finley v. Hayes, 81 N. C. 368; Burns v. Ashworth, 72 N. C. 496; McMillan v. Edwards, 75 N. STATE v. BARBER.

JURORS—WHEN EXCUSED—CHALLENGE FOR CAUSE—RECEIVING STOLEN PROPERTY—INDICTMENT—ELECTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The court may, in its discretion, excuse a juror, at his own request, as a favor to him, and before he is accepted as one of the panel.

2. It is sufficient ground on which to challenge a juror that he is attending court in the expectation of being called as a witness for the opposite party, the danger of bias not being removed by showing that he expects to testify only as to the character of a defendant charged with felony.

3. On a criminal trial the court charged "that they [the jury] might convict on the unsupported testimony of an accomplice, but that it was dangerous and unsafe to do so; but if the story of the accomplice, taken with the other facts and circumstances in the case, carry conviction to the minds of the jury, then it is their duty to convict. The jury must be satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the guilt of the defendant, before they can convict." Held not objectionable as tending to mislead the jury as to the weight to be given to an accomplice's testimony.

4. On a trial of several defendants under an indictment containing two counts, where there is evidence that some of the defendants stole the property, and that defendant B. received it, knowing it to have been stolen, it is within the court's discretion to determine whether it will compel the state to elect on which count to proceed against B.

Appeal from superior court, Rowan county; Winston, Judge.

Charles Barber and others were tried under an indictment containing two counts,—one for larceny, and the other for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen. Defendant Barber was convicted on the second count, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Busbee and S. F. Mordecai, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

AVERY, J. A talesman was called, who, upon being challenged for cause by the solicitor, stated that one of the defendants had spoken to him about the case, and had requested him to attend as a witness to prove the character of that defendant, who had stated nothing but the fact that he was indicted; that he had agreed to become a witness for the defendant, and was attending the court without having been summoned to appear. Two jurors had already been challenged peremptorily for the state, but the defendants had 28 peremptory challenges, which were not exhausted by them. The prosecuting officer asked the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to excuse the juror, and he was so excused. The authority of the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to excuse a juror at his own request, as a favor to him, and before he is accepted as one of the panel, it seems to us, cannot be seriously questioned. If, however, taking the whole statement together, it is susceptible of the construction that the judge meant to excuse the juror because he was voluntarily attending for the purpose of being examined to prove the good character of one of the defendants, we think it equally clear that it was not error to sustain a challenge to the favor by either of the parties to an action upon the ground that the juror was attending the court, whether under subpoena or not, in the expectation of being called upon as a witness for the opposite party. The danger of bias is not removed by showing that the witness has no knowledge of the more material facts bearing upon the issue, and expects to testify only as to the character of a defendant charged with a felony. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 767, 768.

The jury could not have been misled as to the weight to be given to the testimony of an accomplice. The defendant had no just ground to complain of the instruction "that they [the jury] might convict on the unsupported testimony of an accomplice, but that it was dangerous and unsafe to do so; but if the story of the accomplice, taken with the other facts and circumstances in the case, carry conviction to the minds of the jury, then it is their duty to convict. The jury must be satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the guilt of the defendant, before they can convict." State v. Mitchener, 98 N. C. 689, 4 S. E. 28; State v. Miller, 97 N. C. 484, 2 S. E. 363; State v. Stroud, 95 N. C. 626. "The unsupported testimony of an accomplice, if it produces entire belief of the prisoner's guilt, is sufficient to warrant a conviction; and the usual direction to the jury not to convict upon it, unless supported by other testimony, is only a precautionary measure to prevent improper confidence being reposed in it, and the propriety of giving this caution must be left to the discretion of the judge who tries the cause." State v. Holland, 83 N. C. 625; State v. Haney, 2 Dev. & B. 390. In State v. Morrison, 85 N. C. 561, Justice Ruffin, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The common-law rule is that if an indictment contains charges distinct in themselves, and growing out of separate transactions, the prosecutor may be made to elect, or the court may quash. But when it appears that the several counts relate to one transaction, varied simply to meet the probable proof, the court will neither quash nor force an election." "The same rule applies when there is but one count, and testimony as to several transactions, either of which will be relied on to make a case under that count, and when there are several counts, containing distinct charges, and growing out of separate transactions, all punishable in the same way." State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 689, 10 S. E. 457. In this case the testimony tended to show that several other defendants, who were convicted of larceny on the first count, had been stealing tobacco from the same owner at various times, and had been disposing of it to the defendant, who knew it to have been stolen, at a price much below its market value. The defendant Barber, who alone appeals, was convicted, on the second count, of receiving. It was within the discretion of the trial judge to determine whether he would compel an election, and his ruling is not reviewable in this court. State v. Harris, 106 N. C. 682, 11 S. E. 377; State v. Allen, 107 N. C. 806, 11 S. E. 1016. The appellant certainly has no ground for complaint, since the jury were told that all of the defendants must be convicted, if at all, upon the evidence relating to a single transaction.

and that so many of the defendants as did not participate in the particular transaction upon which the verdict should be founded must be acquitted. Bish. Crim. Proc. § 210. Where the jury find a defendant guilty of larceny in a particular case, the law construes the verdict as if the words, "in manner and form as charged in the indictment," were added to it; and where the finding as to another defendant is, "Guilty of receiving, knowing the tobacco to have been stolen," it must be interpreted in the same way. The verdict as to the defendant Barber, taken in connection with the indictment, is sufficiently clear and intelligible to show that it is a conviction upon the second count. It was not essential that the jury should mention the property received, or, certainly, that they specify it directly instead of by implication arising out of the words, "knowing the said tobacco to have been stolen," when read in connection with the charge contained in the second count. State v. Horan, Phil. (N. C.) 571, 576.

Upon an inspection of the whole record, we find no sufficient ground for arresting the judgment. It is not clear that the judge who tried the case below intended to waive the objection that the prayer for instructions was offered too late. It does not follow from the fact that he gave a part of the instruction asked, and refused other portions of it, that he intended to make such a concession. But we have considered the principal objections to the charge given, and to the refusal to give instructions prayed for, as if the exception had been well taken. There is no error.

LARCENY—VERDICT—SPECIFICATION OF COUNT—AIDED BY VERDICT.

1. As Code, § 1191, permits the joining in an indictment of a count for larceny with one for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, a general verdict of guilty, under an indictment charging both offenses, is good.

2. A general verdict of guilty under an indictment containing two counts will support a judgment of conviction if either count be good.

3. Where, on a trial for the larceny of a bank note, the ownership of which is laid in C., "agent of the Farmers' Exchange," there is no exception that the evidence fails to show a special property in C., a verdict of guilty establishes C.'s ownership, and on appeal the words, "agent of the Farmers' Exchange," will be treated as surplusage.

Appeal from superior court, Davie county; Boykin, Judge.

The Attorney General and T. B. Bailey, for the State.

CLARK, J. The case on appeal states that there were no exceptions to the admission or refusal of testimony, nor to the charge, and that no special instructions were asked. The judgment must be affirmed, unless there is error upon the face of the record proper. State v. Bell, 103 N. C. 438, 9 S. E. 548, and other cases cited in Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) p. 582.

The defendant was indicted for larceny, with a second count for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen. There was a general verdict of guilty, without specifying upon which count. The Code, § 1191, permits the joining of the two counts; and a general verdict was held good, without specifying upon which count it was rendered, in State v. Speight, 69 N. C. 72; State v. Baker, 70 N. C. 530; State v. Jones, 82 N. C. 685. These cases were decided when the first count (larceny) was a felony, and the second (for receiving) was only a misdemeanor. A fortiori, a general verdict is valid, since the act of 1891, c. 205, which makes both charges felonies. The second count is not defective, though using some unnecessary phraseology. But, if it were defective, the court would place the verdict to the good count. State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736, 11 S. E. 168, and cases there cited.

The charge of the theft of five dollars in money, of the value of five dollars, is good under the Code, § 1190, and was sustained by proof of the theft of any amount of coin or treasury or bank notes, without proof of the particular kind of coin or treasury or bank notes. State v. Freeman, 89 N. C. 469. The property is laid in "W. A. Clements, agent of the Farmers' Exchange." There is no exception that there was a variance, or that the evidence failed to show a special property in Clements. The verdict establishes all the material facts charged in the indictment, including that of the ownership. The words, "agent of Farmers' Exchange," are mere surplusage. This differs from State v. Jenkins, 78 N. C. 478, in that there exception was taken on the trial that the evidence did not show any special property in the railroad agent in whom the ownership was laid. His possession being merely, on the evidence, the possession of a servant, he had no property therein, and the ownership should have been laid in the corporation. There being no error on the face of the record, the judgment is affirmed.

TAX SALE—VALIDITY—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Though plaintiff was the attorney of the mortgagor in proceedings to foreclose, such fact will not make him his agent, and so defeat his title as purchaser of the mortgaged land at a public sale thereof, made pending the foreclosure, for taxes assessed against the mortgagor, where plaintiff was not the mortgagor's general agent, but represented him in the foreclosure only, and at the time of the sale the mortgagor was not in the country, and had not left any money or directions with plaintiff to pay the taxes or buy in the land, and the mortgagor, after the purchase, made no objections thereto.

2. 19 St. at Large, p. 884, § 10, provides that if taxes for 1887-88 are not paid on or before December 15, 1888, the county treasurer shall collect the same, and if the amount of such taxes are not collected by January 2, 1889, then the same shall be treated as delinquent, and shall be collected by sale of property. Held, that the failure of the treasurer to make an effort, between December 15th and January 2d, to collect unpaid taxes for such fiscal year on certain land, would not invalidate a sale of the land made by virtue of a treasurer's warrant, issued January 23, 1889, directing the sheriff to levy on the land, and sell it.

3. A finding by the trial court that the owner of certain land had no personal property against which a levy could be made to satisfy taxes assessed against such owner, being a question of fact, will not be reviewed on appeal.

4. Though 19 St. at Large, p. 863, § 2, relating to the collection of delinquent taxes, authorizes the sheriff to seize and sell only so much of the taxpayer's land as may be necessary to pay the taxes assessed thereon, the fact that the sheriff sold an entire tract, without making any effort to divide it, will not invalidate the sale, in the absence of fraud or collusion.

5. Under 19 St. at Large, p. 884, § 10, providing that, when the taxes and assessments charged against any property or party are not paid before a certain time, such taxes shall be treated as delinquent taxes, and shall be collected by sale of realty, a sale of land for unpaid taxes is not void because there was included in the treasurer's warrant directing the seizure and sale an unpaid poll tax assessed against the owner of the land, even though section 6 of such statute makes the failure to pay a poll tax a misdemeanor.

6. Under 19 St. at Large, p. 863, § 2, making a sheriff's deed at tax sale only prima facie evidence of the regularity of the tax proceedings prior to its execution, the burden is on one who seeks to defeat the deed to show that there has not been a compliance with the law.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by Stanyarne Wilson against Fielding Cantrell for the recovery of land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The decree of the circuit court is as follows:

"The plaintiff commenced this action on the 7th day of July, 1890, to recover the possession of the tract or parcel of land described in the complaint. It was referred to the master of said county to hear and determine all the issues. The master, after taking the testimony offered and hearing argument, filed his report on the 23d day of September, 1892, holding that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the possession of the land in dispute, together with two hundred dollars damages. To this report the defendant filed exceptions imputing error in the findings of the master, both as to law and fact. The case was heard by me at the October term, 1892, of the court of common pleas for said county, on all the papers in the case, including the testimony taken by the master, the master's report, and the exceptions of the defendant thereto. In order to obtain a clear comprehension of the questions raised by the exceptions of the defendant, I deem it necessary to state more fully the facts established by the evidence than the master has done in his report. From the testimony, it appears that one W. H. Gowan, in September, 1883, was the owner of the land in dispute; that, being largely indebted to one B. F. Bush, he, (W. H. Gowan,) on the 13th day of September, 1883, to secure said indebtedness, executed to the said B. F. Bush his promissory notes and a mortgage of said land; that afterwards certain of said notes, and the mortgage securing the same, were assigned to Fielding Cantrell, the defendant herein; that Fielding Cantrell, after the condition of said mortgage had been broken, advertised the mortgaged premises for sale under the power contained in the mortgage; that thereupon W. H. Gowan filed his complaint in this court against the said Fielding Cantrell to restrain the sale under the said power; that the defendant, Fielding Cantrell, answered the complaint, and the issues raised by the pleadings were referred to the master; that the master heard the case, and filed his report therein, recommending that the said lands be sold, and the proceeds applied to the debt of the said Fielding Cantrell; that the said W. H. Gowan, through Stanyarne Wilson, his attorney in said cause, filed exceptions to the report of the master; that the exceptions were heard on the 14th day of August, 1889, and overruled; that, under the decree made in the cause, the mortgaged premises were sold by the master on the 7th day of October, 1889, and were bid in by said Fielding Cantrell for the sum of six hundred and fifty-five dollars; and that, the said Fielding Cantrell having complied with the terms of sale, the master executed to him a conveyance of said land. It further appears from the evidence that the land mortgaged as aforesaid was listed and assessed for the taxes of the fiscal year, commencing November 1, 1887, in the name of W. H. Gowan; that the taxes and assessments charged against him on the tax duplicate for said fiscal year were not paid by him, or collected, by distress or otherwise, on or before the 2d day of January, 1889, and the same became delinquent; that on the 23d day of January, 1889, the county treasurer for said county issued his tax warrant or execution in the form required by law for the collection of delinquent taxes against the said W. H. Gowan; that the return of the sheriff indorsed upon said warrant or execution is to the effect that the said W. H. Gowan had no personal property out of which the taxes charged could be made, and that he had seized, levied upon, and taken possession of one hundred and fifty acres of land, the property of W. H. Gowan; that the land so levied on by the sheriff is the land in dispute in the present action; that the amount of the taxes, assessments, and penalties stated in the warrant or execution is twenty-six dollars and forty-two cents; that, after due advertisement, the land levied on as aforesaid was sold by the sheriff on the sales day in August, 1889, before the courthouse door in said county, during the legal hours of sale; that, at said sale, Stanyarne Wilson, the present plaintiff, became the purchaser, he being the highest bidder therefor; that he complied with the terms of the sale, and the sheriff executed to him a conveyance to said land, bearing date the 10th day of August, 1889, which was duly recorded in the register's office for said county on the 3d day of September, 1889; and that the sheriff put Stanyarne Wilson in possession of said land under said purchase and conveyance. It further appears from the evidence that, after the purchase at the master's sale by the said Fielding Cantrell, he entered into the possession of the said land, and was at the commencement of this action, and is now, in possession of the same; that said land is worth from eight to ten dollars per acre; that the rental value is one hundred dollars per annum; and that said land could have been divided and sold in several tracts. In addition to the foregoing facts, an effort was made on the part of the defendant to show that the said W. H. Gowan owned, on the 15th day of December, 1889, and at the time of the tax levy, sufficient personal property to pay and satisfy the taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against him. I have examined the testimony on this point very carefully, and must say that I concur fully in the conclusion reached by the master thereon. The facts as recited show that the parties claim through W. H. Gowan as a common source of title. The plaintiff claims through the tax sale under sheriff's deed. The defendant claims through the foreclosure sale and under the master's deed.

"The main question presented and to be determined is, which of the parties has the better title to the land in dispute? If nothing further was made to appear, there would hardly be room for doubt that the conclusion reached by the master is correct, for it is expressly declared by statute (Gen. St. § 170) that all taxes, assessments, and penalties legally assessed shall be considered and held as a debt payable to the state by a party against whom the same shall be charged, and such taxes, assessments, and penalties shall be a first lien, in all cases whatsoever, upon the property taxed, etc.; and hence the lien for taxes would have been superior to the lien of the mortgage under which the land in question was sold by the master, and the purchaser at the tax sale would have taken a title free and discharged from the incumbrance created by the mortgage. But the tax deed of the plaintiff is attacked on the grounds (1) that the failure of the treasurer to make an effort to collect the taxes due by Gowan, between the 15th of December, 1888, and the 2d of January, 1889, rendered the deed to the plaintiff null and void; (2) that at the time the tax execution against Gowan was issued, as well as at the time the land was levied upon, he was the owner of personal property, and that it was the duty of the sheriff to have levied upon and sold this before levying upon and selling the land, and that his failure to do so rendered the deed to the plaintiff null and void; (3) that the property levied upon and sold by the sheriff to pay the taxes due by Gowan was more than was necessary to pay said taxes, and that a sale of all the land owned by Gowan, without an effort to divide and sell a part, renders the deed of the plaintiff null and void; (4) that, at the time the plaintiff bought the land at tax sale, he was attorney for Gowan in a suit then pending between Gowan and the defendant, in which the identical land was involved; and that, when he bid off the same, he did so as the agent of Gowan, with full knowledge of the equities of the defendant, and that his title is fraudulent and void as against the defendant; and (5) that the lien of the defendant's mortgage is an older and better lien than that for taxes.

"What I have already said disposes of the second and fifth grounds of attack upon the tax deed of the plaintiff. The conclusion reached by the master ought not to be disturbed by anything contained in these grounds. Neither do I think there is anything in the third and fourth grounds to affect the conclusion of the master. Section 8 of the act to raise supplies and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing November 1, 1887, approved December 24, 1887, (19 St. pp. 870-885,) declares 'that all taxes herein assessed shall be due and payable from the 15th day of October, to the 15th day of December, 1888, and the several county treasurers shall collect the same in the manner prescribed by law.' Section 10 prescribes 'that when the taxes and assessments of any portion thereof charged against any property or party on the duplicate for the present fiscal year, shall not be paid on or before the 15th day of December, 1888, the county treasurer shall proceed to collect the same, together with the penalty of fifteen per centum on the amount so delinquent, and if the amount of such delinquent taxes, assessments and penalties shall not be paid on or before the 2d day of January, 1889, or collected by distress or otherwise, then the same shall be treated as delinquent taxes on such real and personal property and shall be collected by sale of such real and personal property according to law.' Under this act, the county treasurer was required to begin the collections of the taxes for the fiscal year 1887-88 on the 15th day of October, 1888, and to continue to collect, without penalty, until the 15th day of December, 1888. After this latter date he is required to proceed to collect the taxes and assessments charged against any property or party on the duplicate, together with a penalty of fifteen per centum on the amount delinquent, until the 2d day of January, 1889; and if, between the 15th day of December, 1888, and the 2d day of January, 1889, the amount of such delinquent taxes, assessments, and penalties shall not be paid or collected by distress or otherwise, then the same shall be treated as delinquent taxes on such real and personal property, and shall be collected by sale of such real and personal property according to law. The law then in force regulating the sale of real and personal property for delinquent taxes is found in the act of 1887, in relation to 'forfeited lands, delinquent lands and collection of taxes,' (19 St. p. 862.) This act directs that, 'immediately upon the expiration of the time allowed by the law for the payment of taxes in any year, the county treasurer of each county shall issue in the name of the state a warrant, or execution against the defaulting taxpayers,' etc. In the construction of this act the language 'upon the expiration of the time allowed by law for the payment of taxes' is not altogether free from doubt. Two periods of time are fixed by the act to raise supplies for the fiscal year commencing November 1, 1887, within which the taxpayer is allowed to pay,—one embracing that period in which there is no penalty; the other after the penalty attaches. But giving the defendant the benefit of the doubt, and assuming that it refers to the former period,—that immediately after the 15th day of December, 1888, it was the duty of the county treasurer to issue a warrant or execution against the defaulting taxpayer,—I am of the opinion that a warrant or execution issued thirty-seven days after said date would not be such an irregularity, if irregularity at all, as would avoid a tax deed made in pursuance of a sale thereunder. The act of 1887 in relation to the sale of property for delinquent taxes prescribes no specific time for tax sales. It only requires the sheriff to sell, after due advertisement, before the courthouse door of the county on a regular sales day, within the usual hours of public sales. The evidence shows that the taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against W. H. Gowan for the fiscal year 1887-88 were not paid, or collected by distress or otherwise, on or before the 2d day of January, 1889; that the land in dispute was levied on and sold, after due advertisement, before the courthouse door in Spartanburg county, during the legal hours of public sales; that the land levied on was then and there purchased by the plaintiff; that it only brought a sufficient sum to pay the taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against the property of W. H. Gowan; that the purchaser at said sale complied with his bid, and received a conveyance to said land from the sheriff, and was put into possession of his purchase. Under this state of facts, I cannot hold that the mere fact that the county treasurer did not issue a warrant or execution against W. H. Gowan, the defaulting taxpayer, between the 15th day of December, 1888, and the 2d day of January, 1889, (even if the time for collecting taxes for said fiscal year had not been extended by the comptroller general,) makes the sale thereunder irregular, and renders the tax deed in question null and void.

"In this connection it may be well to dispose of another question raised in the argument by the defendant's counsel. It is contended that the treasurer issued his warrant and execution for an amount including the poll tax; that the amount due for poll tax, with the fifteen per cent. penalty thereon, is not a lien on the land, and that the land was in no sense liable therefor; and that the levy on the land for this amount renders the deed void. It is true that the act approved December 24, 1887, (19 St. p. 882,) in providing for a sale of the defaulting taxpayers' property for taxes, does not mention specifically the poll tax. Section 6 of this act, however, provides 'that there shall be assessed upon all taxable polls in this state a tax of one dollar.' Section 10 provides that if the amount of delinquent taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against any property or party on the duplicate shall not be paid on or before the 2d day of January, 1889, or collected, by distress or otherwise, the same shall be treated as delinquent taxes on such real and personal property, and shall be collected by a sale of such property according to law. The poll tax is a tax assessed against the party. The taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against any property or party on the duplicate, and not paid within the time allowed by law, are to be treated as delinquent taxes on the real and personal property of the defaulting taxpayer, and such property may be sold to satisfy the same. This view does not appear to me to be in conflict with sections 11 and 12 of said act; and the fact that section 6 makes it a misdemeanor for any person to fail or refuse to pay his poll tax does not take away the right of the state to enforce the collection of such tax by distress or sale of the real and personal property of the defaulting taxpayer according to law. The county treasurer, therefore, properly included in his warrant or execution against W. H. Gowan the amount of the poll tax and the penalty thereon, and the tax deed of the plaintiff is not rendered null and void by reason thereof. This disposes of the first ground of attack on plaintiff's deed.

"The seventh exception of the defendant to the master's report must now be considered. This exception charges the master with error 'in holding that by the failure of Gowan and of Cantrell to comply with the requirements of section 3 of the act in relation to forfeited lands, delinquent lands, and collection of taxes, (19 St. p. 864,) they must be deemed to have waived all irregularities.' I do not think the case falls within the class intended to be included in section 3 of said act. This act has been recently construed by the supreme court in the case of Bull v. Kirk, 16 S. E. 151. In this case the court say: 'As we think, it appears that the legislature had in mind the classes of taxpayers alleged to be in default: One, where the land of the taxpayer had already been sold, and he was, within the two years allowed him, to bring this action. This class was manifestly intended to be covered by section 2. Another class, where the taxpayer was allowed, not commanded, to make application in a summary way (20 days) to have the sale of his lands suspended upon his alleging that the assessments were improperly made against him, or that the taxes had been paid. This class was intended to be covered by section 3, and all the requirements of that section were made with reference to that class, and intended to be limited to them.' The present case falls within that class covered by section 2 of said act. This being so, the tax deed of the plaintiff is only prima facie evidence of the regularity of the preliminary proceedings prior to its execution, and may be attacked in the present action. But, while this is so, the burden is upon the defendant, who seeks to avoid the conveyance of the plaintiff, to prove that some of the essential requirements of the law have not been duly and fully complied with, and that the proceedings have not been regular. This, I think, he has failed to do. While, therefore, the master erred in holding that by the failure of Gowan and Cantrell to comply with the requirements of section 3 of said act 'they must be deemed in law to have waived all exceptions to the omissions, errors, and irregularities (if any there be) in the assessment of said tax, and in all preliminaries to said sale,' etc., yet the conclusion reached by him in his report, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the land in dispute, is in my opinion correct. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the exceptions of the defendant to the master's report be, and the same are hereby, overruled; and that said report, as herein modified, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed; and that said report, as thus modified, stand as the judgment of the court. Let the judgment for the plaintiff be entered accordingly."

Duncan & Sanders, for appellant. Nichols & Moore and Bomar & Simpson, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. This is a law case, pure and simple, the sole purpose of the action being to recover a tract of land in Spartanburg county, described in the complaint as containing 150 acres. The judgment of the circuit judge contains a statement of the case, so full and clear that any attempt to restate it could add nothing, and might possibly tend to confuse. (The circuit decree ought to appear in the report of the case.)

First. The plaintiff's abstract of title, as claimed, is very simple, as follows: (1) Both parties claim through a common source, one Wade H. Gowan, who originally owned the land; (2) that the land in question was assessed for taxes of the fiscal year commencing November 1, 1887, in the name of W. H. Gowan; that the taxes and assessments charged against him on the tax duplicate for said fiscal year were not paid by him, or collected, by distress or otherwise, on or before January 2, 1889; that the county treasurer for said county issued his tax warrant or execution in the form required by law for the collection of delinquent taxes against the said W. H. Gowan; that the return of the sheriff indorsed upon said warrant or execution is to the effect that the said W. H. Gowan had no personal property, out of which the taxes charged could be made, and that he had seized, levied upon, and taken possession of 150 acres of land, the property of the said W. H. Gowan, (the same here in controversy;) that the amount of the taxes, assessments, and penalties stated in the warrant or execution is $26.42,—twenty-six dollars and forty-two cents; that, after due advertisement, the land levied on, as aforesaid, was sold by the sheriff on the sales day of August, 1889, before the courthouse door in said county, during the legal hours of sale; that, at said sale, Stanyarne Wilson, the present plaintiff, became the purchaser, as being the highest bidder therefor; that he complied with the terms of sale, and the sheriff executed to him title, bearing date August 10, 1889, which was duly recorded September 3, 1889, and he was let into the possession thereof under this title. Afterwards, his tenants attorned to the defendant, and he brought this action to recover the land.

Second. The grounds on which defendant Cantrell resists recovery are as follows: That, at and before the land was sold under the aforesaid tax execution, he (Cantrell) was conducting legal proceedings against the said Gowan to foreclose a mortgage which he owned upon the identical land now in dispute, said mortgage bearing date as far back as 1883; that in said proceeding he obtained a confirmation of the master's report, a final judgment, and an order for the sale of the land on August 14, 1889, and it was again sold by the master under that order on October 7, 1889, and, he (Cantrell) being the highest bidder, for $635, the master made him title, and let him into possession; and he now claims that, although the sheriff's deed to the plaintiff under the tax execution is older than his from the master, yet that, as his mortgage, under which the order of sale was made, had a lien before the tax execution existed, he has the better title. We suppose that such might have been the case, as against the lien of any ordinary junior judgment; but, as against the lien of the tax execution, the law declares that "all taxes, assessments and penalties legally assessed shall be considered and held as a debt payable to the state by a party against whom the same shall be charged; and that such taxes, assessments and penalties shall be a first lien in all cases whatever upon the property taxed," etc.; so that, if this were all, there could be no doubt that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the land. But the defendant makes vigorous defense, alleging irregularities and illegality in the tax proceedings, and the purchase and acceptance of title thereunder by the plaintiff. In his answer, among other things, the defendant states as follows: "Defendant admits that he claims the land described in the complaint through one Wade H. Gowan, said title being derived from a sale of said lands under an order of this court for the foreclosure of a mortgage over said land, in a proceeding instituted in this court by the plaintiff, as attorney for the said Wade H. Gowan; that said mortgage is an older and prior lien on said land than the lien through which plaintiff claims title to said land; that, pending proceedings for the foreclosure of said mortgage as hereinbefore stated, the said land was levied upon by the sheriff of this county, advertised, and sold for taxes, and the same bid off by the plaintiff, who was at the same time the agent for the said Gowan, and, if the plaintiff has any valid deed to said land, he holds the same as agent of the said Gowan; that, when the plaintiff bid off said land, he did so with full knowledge of the rights and equities of the defendant. Defendant further says that the deed through which the plaintiff claims said land is defective and void on account of the noncompliance with the laws of this state, but that, notwithstanding this fact, as well as the others heretofore stated, defendant, wishing to avoid the expense of a lawsuit, offered to pay to plaintiff any money he may have paid out on account of taxes due on said land, but that said offer was refused," etc. The cause was referred to the master to hear and determine all issues, and report his conclusions to the court, with leave to any party to except thereto. Accordingly, the master took the testimony, including the whole record in the foreclosure proceedings in the case of Cantrell v. Gowan, as well as the tax execution, and the sheriff's return of nulla bona as to personalty, and his advertisement of the sale and conveyance under it. After stating the important facts in the case, which appear in his report, he held "that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of the land in dispute, together with two hundred dollars damages. The case seems to be a hard one, but the defendant had his remedy in buying the property at the tax sale, or in paying the taxes before sale," etc.

Upon exceptions to this report, the cause came on for trial before his honor, Judge

Izlar, who, concurring in all the facts found by the master, and in his law except upon one point, pronounced judgment that the exceptions of the defendant be overruled, and that the report, as modified, be confirmed, and, thus modified, stand as the judgment of the court, etc. From this judgment the defendant appeals to this court upon numerous exceptions, which are all printed in the brief, (30 in number;) but as some of them are long, and state the same matter in different forms, we think that the points made may be more satisfactorily considered by condensing them into the following propositions, in their natural order:

1. "That his honor erred in not ruling that, where the plaintiff bid off the land at the tax sale, he was the attorney for W. H. Gowan, the then owner of the land, in a case then pending in the court between Gowan and the defendant in this action, involving the identical land, and the foreclosure of a mortgage given by Gowan thereon, and that his act in bidding off the land, and taking a deed therefor to himself, was unauthorized, illegal, and void," etc. It is very true that the relation of attorney and client is a responsible and delicate one, and the books of reports are full of evidence of the determination of the courts to maintain with scrupulous care the integrity of that relation, at all times and under all circumstances. But we cannot think it necessary, in this case, to comment on the numerous cases from different states which the research of the defendant's counsel has enabled him to bring to our attention on the subject. The general doctrine is nowhere better stated, as we think, than in 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 939, as follows: "The relation of attorney and client being quasi fiduciary, all transactions between them, to be upheld, must be aberrima fides, and to establish that such is the case rests with him who would uphold the transaction. The jealous care and scrutiny over such transactions extends to all gifts, conveyances, and contracts by the client, and all securities given by him pending the relation. The foundation of the rule is the influence arising from the relation. So long, therefore, as the influence exists, the rule, of course, applies," etc. As we understand it, the above is only another form of stating the principle as it has been declared in this state. See Miles v. Erwin, 1 McCord, Eq. 549, where Chancellor David Johnson closed his well-considered decree in the following words: "I conclude, therefore, that all contracts between attorney and client in relation to the property in litigation are not necessarily void on the ground of that relationship, but that, to render it so, it must appear that it was used to the prejudice of the client. As a matter of proof, it is impossible to lay down any rule as to what will or will not constitute sufficient evidence of it," etc. Taking this as the settled principle, did Mr. Wilson show the necessary good faith to his client? The master found the facts as follows: "Mr. Wilson was representing Mr. Gowan in the foreclosure suit of Cantrell against him, when the land was sold for taxes, but he made purchase at sheriff's sale for himself, and Mr. Gowan is contented and satisfied with such purchase. Mr. Gowan has never made any complaint to the sheriff concerning the sale, nor did he do so while said land was advertised." In these findings the judge concurred, and they are beyond review by this court. Miller v. Railway Co., 33 S. C. 359, 11 S. E. 1093. Mr. Wilson was not the general agent of Gowan, but had been engaged to make the legal defense in the mortgage suit, and, as it seems, he did his duty in that character until the cause had been practically lost after the report of the master against Gowan in that case; and Gowan was not in the country, leaving neither money nor directions nor agent to pay the taxes on the land, or to buy it. Having discharged his duty in the foreclosure suit without success, Mr. Wilson had no dealing with his client, but bid off the land publicly at sheriff's sale, paid the purchase money, and received titles. "The law looks with proper jealousy upon contracts between an attorney and his client, to the disadvantage of the client; but here there was no contract with the client." Le Conte v. Irwin, 19 S. C. 558. And when it is further considered that, instead of the sale being to the disadvantage of Gowan, he makes no objection, but is "contented and satisfied" with the sale, and testified as a witness in behalf of the plaintiff, we must concur with the circuit judge that there is nothing in this exception to affect the conclusion of the master. "In order to give these rules effect, it is necessary that the relation of attorney and client should exist between the parties. The mere fact that the opposite party was an attorney, etc., is not enough. He must then have been the attorney of the complaining party." See Mechem, Ag. § 879.

2. "That the failure of the treasurer to make an effort to collect the taxes due by Gowan between the 15th of December, 1888, and the 2d of January, 1889, rendered the deed to the plaintiff void," etc. It appears that, while the contest over Cantrell's mortgage was going on, the land in dispute was listed and assessed for the taxes of the fiscal year, commencing November 1, 1887, in the name of W. H. Gowan, amounting to $26.42; and the same, remaining unpaid, became derelict on January 2, 1889. The county treasurer issued his warrant on January 23d; and the sheriff, having made return to the effect that the defaulting taxpayer, Gowan, had no personal property out of which the taxes and penalties charged could be made, seized and sold the land on sales day in August, 1889. In this state of facts, the complaint is made that the treasurer should have issued his warrant sooner, viz. on December 15, 1888, or on January 2, 1889. The master found as follows: "The time for the payment of taxes was extended in 1887, and hence the treasurer was not compelled to make effort to collect taxes between December 15, 1888, and January 2, 1889, nor, indeed, could he have done so. The facts show that he issued papers from his office as soon as he could do so according to law," etc. The judge, after stating fully the law upon the subject, held as follows: "Under this state of facts, I cannot hold that the mere fact that the county treasurer did not issue a warrant or execution against W. H. Gowan, the defaulting taxpayer, between December 15, 1888, and January 2, 1889, (even if the time for collecting taxes for said fiscal year had not been extended by the comptroller general) makes the sale thereunder irregular, and renders the tax deed in question null and void," etc. We cannot say that this was error of law.

3. "That the judge erred in not holding that at the time the tax execution against Gowan was issued, as well as at the time the land was levied upon, he was the owner of personal property, and that it was the duty of the sheriff to have levied upon and sold this before levying upon and selling the land, and that his failure to do so rendered the deed to the plaintiff null and void." This was a question of fact, and it cannot be necessary to say more than to state the finding of the circuit judge upon the subject, as follows: "In addition to the foregoing facts, an effort was made on the part of the defendant to show that the said W. H. Gowan owned, on the 15th of December, 1889, and at the time of the tax levy, sufficient personal property to pay and satisfy the taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against him. I have examined the testimony on this point very carefully, and must say that I concur fully in the conclusion reached by the master therein," etc. Exception disallowed.

4. "That the deed is void because the sheriff levied upon and sold the entire tract of one hundred and fifty acres of land without first making an effort to divide it, and sell a part," etc. It is true that there is considerable disparity between the quantity of land sold under the tax execution and the amount of taxes paid; but that may have resulted from several causes,—possibly from the low estimate generally placed on tax titles, or the neglect of the parties in interest to attend the sale, and pay the taxes or purchase the land. The question now is whether, in a case where no fraud or collusion is charged, that circumstance alone should be considered sufficient to invalidate the sale and the deed made under it. It seems that at one time it was the law of the state that, in selling lands for taxes, the collecting officer was limited to “the person offering to pay the taxes thereon, for the least quantity thereof,” to be cut off from the northwestern corner of the tract. As we understand, however, such is not now the law, but the warrant of the treasurer is lodged with the sheriff, to be executed like other process in his hands, “by distress and sale of the personal property, and, if sufficient personal property cannot be found, then by distress and sale of the land of the defaulting taxpayer,” etc. See State v. Turner, 32 S. C. 348, 11 S. E. 99, and Shell v. Duncan, 31 S. C. 567, 10 S. E. 330. In the latter case of Shell, 1,200 acres of land was sold in a body to collect $113.70 for taxes, and no objection was made on that ground to the title. It is true the act of 1887, (19 St.),¹ so often herein referred to, authorizes “the sheriff of the county to seize and take exclusive possession of so much of the defaulting taxpayer’s estate, real or personal or both, as may be necessary to raise the sum of money named therein, and after due advertisement to sell the same. * * * And after deducting from the proceeds of sale the amount of taxes and charges, to pay the excess, if any there be, to the defaulting taxpayer,” etc. It is very obvious that the main object of this act was to collect, at all events, the taxes due the state. But we do not understand that in doing so it was intended to limit the sheriff, on pain of destroying his own deed, to buying and selling only “so much” of the land as would produce the precise sum necessary to pay the taxes; for the act expressly provides that “if there is any excess it shall be paid over to the defaulting taxpayer.” This certainly contemplated the possibility of an excess. Of course, a sacrifice of property is always to be avoided, if possible. It would seem difficult, if not impracticable, for the sheriff, a ministerial officer, without the necessary machinery of law for that purpose, to determine in advance, with any degree of certainty, how much land (to be sold under a tax execution) would produce the precise sum required, and no more. But if, as argued, the power to sell “so much as may be necessary,” etc., imposed upon the sheriff the duty of determining in advance what property he should sell,—the whole, or some part thereof, as in his discretion he might think best,—it seems that he exercised that discretion by offering for sale the whole tract of 150 acres. The result showed that the sale produced the exact amount required, leaving no excess. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that he so abused his discretion as to avoid the sale. As was said by the master: “The form of execution set out in the statute provides that the sheriff sell so much of delinquent’s property as may be sufficient to pay the taxes and costs, and it is urged that in this case the land could have been divided, and sold in separate tracts, and that either one of them would have been sufficient. The best answer to this is that, under the circumstances, the whole tract brought only enough to pay the taxes and costs. It is not what the land is really worth, but what it would bring, that should guide the sheriff in estimating how much he should sell,” etc. Both the master and circuit judge found that the levy and sale were not excessive, and that the advertisement of the sale was regular; and therefore we are constrained to agree that there is nothing in the levy, advertisement, or sale which should invalidate the plaintiff’s deed.

5. “It is contended that Mr. Floyd, the county treasurer, issued his warrant and execution for an amount including the poll tax, with the 15 per cent. penalty thereon, and that the same was not a lien on the land, which was in no sense liable therefor, and that the levy on the land for this amount rendered the deed void,” etc. The poll tax not paid, and therefore put into the warrant, with the penalty, was a small item; and, even if it should be stricken out as not allowable, I confess I do not see how that could invalidate the title of the purchaser, for the remainder of the execution would be unaffected, and, as I suppose, be sufficient to sustain the sale. But we think that the circuit judge, in his decision below, shows very satisfactorily that the treasurer was right to include the “poll tax” among the other items in the warrant. After citing the acts upon the subject, he states his conclusion as follows: “The poll tax is a tax assessed against the party. The taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against any property or party on the duplicate, and not paid within the time allowed by law, are to be treated as delinquent taxes on the real and personal property of the defaulting taxpayer, and such property may be sold to satisfy the same. This view does not appear to me to be in conflict with sections 11 and 12 of said act, and the fact that section 6 makes it a misdemeanor for any person to fail or refuse to pay his poll tax does not take away the right of the state to enforce the collection of such tax by distress or sale of the real and personal property of the defaulting taxpayer according to law,” etc. We cannot say that this was error. We think that making the failure to pay the tax a misdemeanor was intended to be “cumulative." We also agree with the circuit judge in holding that this case does not fall under section 3, but section 2, of the act of 1887, so often referred to, and is ruled by the case of Bull v. Kirk, 37 S. C. 395, 16 S. E. 151, which decides that, under the circumstances of this case, the sheriff's deed is only prima facie evidence of the regularity of the tax proceedings prior to its execution, and may be attacked. But, while this is so, the burden is upon the defendant to prove that one or more of the essential requirements of the law have not been complied with, and that the tax proceedings have not been regular, which the defendant in this case has failed to do. The case is in several respects a novel one, and involves an unusual number of points. The court has endeavored to consider all the important questions made, and feels excused for saying that it has been greatly assisted by the learned arguments of the counsel on both sides. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SMITH v. RAY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 6, 1893.)

APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—BRIEFING EVIDENCE.

The only error complained of being the granting of a nonsuit, and there being in the bill of exceptions no brief of evidence, but instead thereof a full stenographic report of the trial, containing questions to the witnesses and their answers to same, colloquies between court and counsel, rulings made by the judge, objections and exceptions thereto, and much other entirely irrelevant matter, all in total disregard of the requirements of the supreme court practice act of 1889, the case has not been brought to this court as the law requires, and the writ of error must be dismissed. The statement of the presiding judge in these terms: "I think the evidence may be better understood, as I conceived it to be, and that the supreme court can better understand the error complained of, by having before them the evidence in full, as reported by the stenographer and incorporated in the foregoing bill of exceptions,"—is without effect, inasmuch as statutory requirements can neither be modified nor dispensed with on account of any opinion a member of the judiciary may entertain.

Error from city court. Macon county; J. P. Ross, Judge.

Action by B. B. Smith against B. H. Ray. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

Laws 1889, p. 114, § 1, provides: "That no case shall be taken to the supreme court by bill of exceptions, except in the following manner: If the case is not one in which a motion over new trial is to be renewed, the plaintiff in error shall plainly and specifically set forth the errors alleged to have been committed, and shall incorporate in the bill of exceptions a brief of so much of the written or oral evidence as is material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, and shall specify therein such portions of the record as are material to such understanding. If none of the evidence is material to elucidate the errors complained of, this fact shall be stated and the evidence omitted. The judge to whom such bill of exceptions is tendered shall, if needful, change the same so as to conform to the truth and contain all the evidence, and to refer to all of the record necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, and he shall require the clerk to send up only so much of the record as he may certify is material," etc.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—HUSBAND TO WIFE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A request to charge, which is not adjustable to any correct theory of the evidence, was properly refused.

2. There was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Burke county; H. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Action by Beach & Farmer against W. P. Netherland. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and an execution was levied on property, to which M. J. Netherland, wife of defendant, interposed a claim of ownership. From a verdict for claimant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

An execution from a judgment of June 13, 1892, against Netherland, was levied November 15, 1892, on certain property which was claimed by Mrs. Netherland, the wife of the defendant in execution. The jury found for claimant, and the plaintiffs excepted to the refusal of a new trial. The claimant introduced a bill of sale to her from her husband, dated December 4, 1891, reciting a consideration of $780.80, covering all the personal property of the husband which was on the plantation owned by her and where they resided. The paper contains the following: "This bill of sale is intended to cover all personal property owned by the said W. P. Netherland on the plantation aforesaid, and is sold subject to a crop mortgage and a bill of sale on said personal property given by said W. P. Netherland to Wilkins, Neely & Jones, to wit, a bill of sale dated Feby. 2, 1891, and a crop mortgage dated October 30, 1891, both of which are recorded in the clerk's office, Burke county. The payment of this balance due said Wilkins, Neely & Jones, about $400, more or less, on said bill of sale and mortgage, which balance has been assumed by said Mary J. Netherland, is hereby made a part consideration of this bill of sale, in addition to the consideration first above mentioned. The property hereby conveyed is mine, and subject to no other incumbrance than those above mentioned." Netherland, the defendant in execution, testified: "I owed my wife $200 insurance money she got on her father's life, and let me have it, and then I rented out some of her land to tenants, and collected the rents, and she let me have the money. All these amounts aggregated the sum of $780.80. And then she took up the amount I was owing to Wilkins, Neely & Jones of $400, and these amounts are the consideration of this bill of sale. It was not made to defraud any one, but was a bona fide debt I owed my wife. I conveyed to her all the property I owned. I remember Mr. Farmer coming to see me before the time this suit was begun, and I told him, if he pressed me, I would make over all my property to my wife, as I owed her and Wilkins, Neely & Jones both, and that would have to be paid. I deny positively that I ever told Mr. Farmer that I didn't owe my wife, but would owe her if he pressed me. On the contrary, I distinctly told him that I did owe her at that time. [Witness testified to the various items of indebtedness, consisting of money loaned, rents collected and appropriated to his use, etc., which make up the total of $780.80 named as the consideration of the bill of sale.] I gave my wife due bills for the money borrowed and for the rents appropriated. The property conveyed by the bill of sale is not worth exceeding the sum of $780.80, named as the consideration, and not that much." J. R. Roberson testified: "Mrs. Netherland is my sister. I know of her letting her husband have the $200 insurance money. I also know that her husband rented out the land she was in possession of, and he kept the rents, and used them for himself. She was in possession of this land before my father's death, in 1886, and part of this rent is for that time. Netherland rented the land in his own name, and took the rent notes to himself, but he gave his wife duebills for the rent after he would collect it. Since our father's death, Mrs. Netherland has retained the land the same as before, and Mr. Netherland has appropriated the rents." L. R. Farmer testified: "Went to see Netherland about the time this suit was filed, and he threatened, if I sued him, he would sell out to his wife. I talked with him some time, and asked him if he owed his wife. He said, 'No,' but he would let her take up Wilkins, Neely & Jones' debt, and he would owe her then, as they held a mortgage, and it must be paid." The motion for new trial alleges that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence; that the court erred in allowing the claimant to introduce the bill of sale, over objection of plaintiffs' counsel; and that the court erred in refusing to give the following charge to the jury: "If you believe from the evidence that the only real consideration in the bill of sale from W. P. Netherland to his wife was the $400 paid Wilkins, Neely & Jones, then this was a void consideration, and cannot alone support the bill of sale, it being conceded that the other named consideration of said bill of sale was more than the value of the property covered thereby."

Phillips & Phillips, for plaintiffs in error.
Johnston & Brinson, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALE TO INTOXICATED PERSON—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL.

No error was committed on the trial. There is no merit in the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The verdict was right, and the court properly refused to grant a new trial. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from criminal court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

J. W. Simpson was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Simpson was tried in the city court on an accusation of selling liquor to J. I. Clay, who was intoxicated or drunk at the time. After verdict of guilty, the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted. (1) The first special ground of the motion is that the court charged thus: "If, after you have considered the evidence in the case fairly and impartially, with a desire to arrive at the truth, you believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, as I have explained to you, that this man is guilty, you are authorized to convict him." The error specified is that the court failed to couple the prisoner's statement with the evidence, in this instruction. (2) The court charged that "a juror cannot raise a doubt in his own mind, and then acquit on it." This is complained of as error, because "each juror should decide for himself, upon his oath, as to what the verdict should be, and should not be hampered with the charge of the court." (3) During the argument of the state's solicitor, he called the court's attention to the distinction between the terms "intoxicated" and "drunk," and evoked from the court this statement, in the presence of the jury: "There is, I think, a distinction between the terms 'intoxicated' or 'drunk.'" Thereupon, defendant's counsel made a written request of the court to give the following instructions to the jury, and the court's refusal to do so is assigned as error: "I charge you that there is no distinction between the terms 'intoxicated' or 'drunk.' Neither term means that a man must be down.

and unable to walk, but if his conduct is such that a man whose duty it is to know whether or not a man is intoxicated or drunk, and this he must ascertain by the exercise of ordinary diligence. (Define the term of 'ordinary diligence.') You must look to the circumstances, and ascertain for yourselves as to whether or not Clay was intoxicated or drunk. You can look at the circumstances of no arrest on the occasion testified about. You can look at the circumstances that no witnesses were introduced, except the kin-folks of Clay." (4) The motion also contains the ground that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence, and a ground of alleged newly-discovered testimony. The evidence at the trial consisted of the testimony of Clay's wife, and his brother and sister. From this it appears that, on two occasions within the past two years, he bought liquor from the defendant, and was drunk at the time he bought it. On the first occasion, he staggered as he went into, and when he came out of, defendant's barroom; and, after he came out, his wife, who was waiting for him, prevailed on him to give the bottle to her, which she carried back to the counter, and delivered to the defendant, with the admonition not to sell her husband any more whisky. The defendant gave her the money which he had received for the liquor, and she took her husband home. On the way, he stopped at a store, and cursed the storekeeper, without apparent cause. His wife soon afterwards got him upon a street car, which took them to their home, where he lay across the bed, and could not be got up until the next morning. His wife testified that she did not remember seeing or meeting any policeman after leaving the barroom, and that her husband was not arrested, or in any way interfered with. Clay's sister testified that when he is drinking he is very wild, and when he is drunk he is like a dead man. His brother testified that Mrs. Clay sent him to watch her husband in last June, to find out, if possible, where he got his liquor. Witness watched him for more than three hours. He was in and about a wagon yard opposite defendant's place of business, and, while in this yard, witness saw him break an empty flask, and then take his money and scatter it on the ground. Between 7 and 8 o'clock that evening, witness saw him cross the street, and enter the defendant's barroom, which was crowded with negroes, and soon afterwards saw him walk up to the counter, and receive from the defendant a half-pint flask of white liquor, which he put into his pocket and went out. Part of the time, he walked straight; and part, he would stagger. He was drunk. Witness saw no more of him until he came home the next morning, about 4 o'clock. The occurrences related took place near the station house on Decatur street, "recognized as a pretty tough street." Witness saw policeman, but did not ask Clay to go home with him, or threaten to have him arrested if he did not, and said nothing to defendant about it. When Clay is drinking, he is pretty wild and talkative, and anybody can tell he is intoxicated or drunk. The defendant introduced no evidence, but made this statement: "I have been in the whisky business four or five years, and this is the first time I have ever had a case made against me. I try not to violate the law, if I know it, and I do not recollect ever selling any whisky to J. I. Clay when he was intoxicated or drunk. This is all I have to say." The newly-discovered testimony is contained in an affidavit of Clay that he has never been arrested for being drunk but twice, on the first of which occasions he was fined by the city recorder for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, and on the latter was acquitted; "that he always drinks more or less, but, when he feels his whisky, no one not intimately acquainted with him can tell that he has been drinking, and in that particular he is not unlike a great many other men;" that "in the past three years he has bought and paid for a home, now worth $1,100, by his own labor, the sum of $500, except $75, and supported himself, wife, and two children; that he has been married 12 years, and has never stayed away from home but 2 nights during that time;" and that he never said anything about these facts to the defendant or to his attorney until after the conviction. Accompanying this were affidavits,—one by M. J. Priscock, that he is acquainted with Clay, and knows him to be a man of good character and worthy of belief; and one, each, by the defendant and his counsel, that they did not know of the evidence contained in Clay's affidavit until after the trial, and that their failure to discover the same before the trial was by no lack of diligence on their part. This showing was met by a counter showing on the part of the state to the effect that Clay was under the influence of liquor when he made the above affidavit, and did not understand what he was swearing to, and that the statements made therein are not correct in fact. There were three affidavits produced by the defendant in rebuttal of the counter showing, to the effect that, if Clay was under the influence of whisky when he made the affidavits, the affiants did not detect it, but his speech and behavior were such as to impress a witness to the contrary.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

OWEN v. SMITH.

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—CONSIDERATION—GIFT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where it is doubtful whether an instrument in the form of a deed, attested and delivered as such, and showing upon its face that it was made partly for value, and partly for love and affection, be testamentary or not, some of its language importing a present conveyance, with reservation of a life estate, and some indicating a purpose to postpone the vesting of title until the death of the maker, the safer and better construction of the instrument is that it was intended to pass an interest at the time of delivery, and to postpone only the possession and use.

2. On the trial of a case involving capacity to make a deed of conveyance, the court is not bound to give in charge to the jury the law of testamentary capacity.

3. Where, according to the face of the conveyance, it is founded upon a mixed consideration, consisting in part of love and affection, and in part of money or services, mere inadequacy of the latter part is no cause for setting the conveyance aside, and raises no presumption against the capacity of the maker, or against the good faith and fair dealing of the beneficiary. A widow, who, during the lifetime of her husband, voluntarily put herself in loco parentis to his bastard son, and has so continued since her husband's death, may extend her bounty to such son, by a deed of gift, as if he were her own offspring.

4. In view of the evidence, and of the charge as given, there was no error in refusing to charge as requested, whether the requests be taken severally or all together. The evidence, though in some respects conflicting, warranted the verdict.

Error from superior court, Thomas county: A. H. Hansell, Judge.

Action by James T. Owen, guardian, against William T. Smith, to cancel a deed. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A bill in equity was brought in 1887, on behalf of the grandchildren of George E. Smith, deceased, to set aside an instrument of conveyance to William T. Smith, an illegitimate son of George E. Smith, executed by the wife of George E. Smith, the grandmother of plaintiff's wards, shortly before her death. The grounds of attack on the instrument were that it was not a deed, but was testamentary in its character, and was void for being attested by only two witnesses, and that it was void as a deed because the maker was mentally incompetent to make it, she being feeble in mind and body from old age; because she was easily controlled and influenced by the defendant, William T. Smith, who did exert undue influence over her to induce her to make the conveyance, when she would not otherwise have made it; and because the consideration was grossly inadequate, and the execution of the paper was procured by the defendant by fraudulent promises, persuasions, and practices, etc. The court construed the paper to be a deed, and submitted the issues made by other allegations to the jury, who found in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he excepted. The instrument in question is dated October 1, 1887, and is between Sarah Smith, of the one part, and Willie T. Smith, of the other part. It recites that whereas, in the division of the estate of George E. Smith, deceased, there was an agreement that Sarah Smith should have all the real estate belonging to him that lay in Thomas county, and the heirs of her son L. D. Smith, represented by their guardian, J. T. Owen, should have the lands in Mitchell county, which agreement and division were ratified and confirmed by Sarah Smith, widow of George E. Smith, J. T. Owen, guardian of the children of L. D. Smith, deceased, and R. B. Mardre, administrator of George E. Smith, and a consent decree of the superior court is to be taken, ratifying and confirming this agreement and division so made, "the said Sarah Smith hath given, granted, bargained, and sold unto the said Willie T. Smith, in consideration of the sum of ten dollars ($10.00) to her in hand paid, as well as for the natural love and affection which she has and bears towards the said Willie T. Smith, upon the conditions and reservations and limitations hereinafter named, [certain described land;] also, all of her personal property, consisting of various kinds of stock and household and kitchen furniture. The terms, conditions, and limitations upon which the aforesaid property is to vest in the said Willie T. Smith are as follows: She reserves to herself a life estate in the whole of it, with power to direct, manage, and control it as she sees proper during her lifetime; and she is to be consulted by the said Willie in all things, and, if they differ in opinion as to the management of matters or things, her views are to control; and the said Willie is to live with her, care for and provide for her, supply her necessary wants, take care of and protect the property and herself as a dutiful and affectionate son would take care of an old and invalid mother; and, upon compliance with these terms upon the part of said Willie T. Smith, whatever, at her death, is left, together with the natural increase thereof, and such addition as may be made thereto by the thrift and industry and care of the said Willie T. Smith, is to belong to the said Willie T. Smith, his heirs, assigns, executors, and administrators, in fee simple." There was testimony for the plaintiff to the effect that the maker of the deed was an invalid, and not capable of attending to ordinary business, at the time it was made; that the defendant had great influence with her, and had stated that she was mentally incapable; that she did nothing of consequence without consulting him, etc. She died about three weeks after the deed was executed, in her seventy-seventh year. On the other hand, the testimony for the defendant was that her mind was strong and clear; that she was capable of attending to her affairs, and did so; that she directed the drawing of the deed, after the division was made between her and the plaintiff's wards of her own volition, and without any suggestion from the defendant, and it was drawn exactly in accordance with her wishes; that it was read over to her at the time of execution, and she said it was just as she wanted it, and afterwards stated that she wanted the defendant to have her share of the property, and had so fixed it, and that Dow's children (plaintiff's wards) had property of their own, and she thought it was enough for them. The defendant was raised from infancy by her and his father, in their house, as one of their children, and had always behaved as a dutiful son, etc. The grounds of the motion for new trial, besides those alleging that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence, are that the court erred in refusing to give in charge the following, as requested: "In case of wills, if the testator or testatrix is of weak mind, and is moved to make a will, and the legacy is great, the law presumes the moving is not right or lawful; a presumption to be repudiated only by bringing something sufficient to show the will to be such as a person of average mind, morals, and family love might be supposed to be willing to make. Great inadequacy of consideration, when joined with great disparity of mental ability in contracting a bargain, may justify a court of equity in setting aside a sale or other contract. Although the natural influence arising from the relation of parent and child by those who possess such influence to obtain a benefit for himself in a matter of gift among the living will be held to be an undue influence, though such influence may be used in obtaining a legacy, provided the testator or testatrix understand what he or she is doing, and is a free agent. While inadequacy of price is no ground for a rescission of contract of sale, unless it is so gross as, combined with other circumstances, to amount to fraud, yet, if the inadequacy be great, it is a strong circumstance to show fraud. When the party making a deed is weak in mind, and liable to be imposed upon, if the evidence shows the least spark of imposition or fraud, the deed will or ought to be set aside. Whenever there is great weakness of mind, though not amounting to absolute disqualification, arising from age, sickness, or any other cause, in a person executing a conveyance, and the consideration given for land is grossly inadequate, a court of equity will, upon proper and seasonable application of the injured party or his representative or heir, set aside the conveyance." At the conclusion of the general charge, the plaintiff's counsel orally requested the court to charge that, if the jury should determine to set aside the deed, they could then proceed to divide the property between the two heirs at law. This the court refused, and charged that the jury could find only for or against the deed. This refusal is assigned as error.

J. R. Alexander, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The instrument to be construed shows on its face that it was made in consideration of $10 and of love and affection. It shows, also, that future services to be rendered by the grantee to the grantor were contemplated as a part of the consideration. It is certainly doubtful whether the instrument is testamentary or not. Some of its language imports a present conveyance, with the reservation of a life estate, and some indicates a purpose to postpone the vesting of title until the death of the grantor. We think the trial court adopted the safer and better construction in holding that the instrument was a deed, and not a will. It is manifest that the maker did not intend to confer a mere bounty, but expected to receive some compensation for the conveyance, in the way of services rendered to her, and to be rendered as long as she lived. It is equally manifest that she intended the grantee to be owner of the property at some time, and that she intended to retain possession, and a supervision over the control and use of it, during her own life. A reasonable supposition as to her real intention is that an interest was to pass to him at the time of the delivery of the deed, with a postponement only of the possession and use until she should be dead.

2. After holding the instrument to be a deed, the court was not bound to give in charge to the jury anything whatever as to the law of testamentary capacity. The capacity in question was of a higher order; and while the court, in expounding its requisites, might have referred, not improperly, to the lower capacity requisite to make a will, the refusal to do so was not erroneous.

3. The consideration being a mixed one, consisting in part of love and affection and in part of services, to say nothing of the $10 expressly mentioned, any disproportion between the value of the services and the value of the property conveyed would raise no presumption against the capacity of the grantor, or against the good faith and fair dealing of the grantee. Any such disproportion or inadequacy would be fully covered by the other part of the consideration, namely, love and affection. That would be sufficient to uphold the whole conveyance, irrespective of the value of the property. Nor would this part of the consideration be vitiated or weakened by the fact that there was no blood relationship between the parties. The maker of the deed, Mrs. Smith, was the widow of the grantee's father. During her husband's lifetime she had put herself in loco parentis to this bastard son, and after his death had so continued. According to the evidence, there was between them the regard and affection of parent and child. This being so, she could make a deed of gift to him, the same as if he were her own offspring.

4. We have carefully examined the evidence and the whole charge of the court, as given. In view of these, there was no error in refusing to charge as requested, no matter whether the several requests be considered separately or collectively. In some respects the evidence was conflicting, but the jury settled the conflict, and upheld the deed. The verdict was warranted, and there was no error in refusing a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

ADAMS et al. v. WILDER.

DOCUMENTS—PAROL EVIDENCE AS TO LOSS OF SEAL.

Without some evidence of the genuineness of an unsealed document offered in evidence as a plat and grant from the state, the exclusion of the evidence of a witness that "the wax and seal had been attached to said plat and grant, and was lost," was not erroneous.

Error from superior court, Dooly county; W. H. Fish, Judge.

Action in ejectment by J. J. Adams and others against John H. Wilder. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

An action of ejectment was brought upon the demises of J. J. and James Adams, which was amended by striking said demises, and inserting in lieu demises of Jephtha Pickett, J. H. Wilder was the defendant. The bill of exceptions states that plaintiffs tendered in evidence, as a part of their chain of title, a plat and grant from the state to one Sanders, conveying the land; that defendant objected to the plat and grant, on the ground that the wax and seal were not attached thereto; that plaintiffs offered to prove by one J. N. Brooks that the wax and seal had been attached to the plat and grant, and was lost; that the court ruled that plaintiffs could not prove the loss of the wax and seal by parol evidence, but would have to prove the same by certified copy, to which ruling plaintiffs excepted; and that, the court having ruled out the plat and grant, plaintiffs closed, whereupon the court granted a nonsuit, to which ruling also plaintiffs excepted. In a note to the bill of exceptions, the court says: "The court did not rule that the loss of the wax and seal would have to be proved by a certified copy of the grant, but ruled as follows: The defendant objected to the plat and grant, because they were torn or worn into many pieces, and were unintelligible, and because there was no seal attached. They were badly mutilated, but might have been intelligible, possibly, by carefully putting the many pieces together. The court held, upon these facts, that there should be proof of the existence of the original grant by the production of a copy from the secretary of state's office, before the oral evidence of the loss of the seal was admissible."

Hudson & Blalock, for plaintiffs in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The document tendered in evidence as a plat and grant from the state to Sanders was in ruins. It was a mass of fragments, which may or may not have been intelligible had they been carefully put together. There was no proof of their genuineness, or that the instrument, which might possibly have been reconstructed by a proper arrangement of the several fragments, was ever executed. The effort was to verify and authenticate the mass by showing "that the wax and seal had been attached to said plat and grant, and was lost." This evidence would have been admissible had there been proof by a certified copy from the secretary of state's office, where all grants are recorded, and in which the record of all plats, as well as of the grants, is now preserved, under the public laws of the state, showing, by necessary inference, that a genuine plat and grant had once existed. There can be no doubt that for this purpose such a copy would have been competent and appropriate evidence. The very object of attaching the great seal of the state to a plat and grant is to authenticate their official execution by the proper officers. The genuineness of the seal itself is always determined by the court from inspection, and, the seal being genuine, it vouches for the genuineness of the document to which it is attached. But, when the seal is not produced, no inspection by the court can take place, and the mere testimony of a witness that the wax and seal had been attached to the document could be no substitute for inspection by the court as a means of inferring genuineness of the document. There can be no trial by inspection on a past inspection made by a witness. There must be a present inspection made directly by the court. In Doe v. McKilvain, 14 Ga. 252, the absence of the seal was accounted for by parol evidence, but there was other evidence from which the genuineness of the document could be inferred. Judgment affirmed.

NEAL et al. v. REYNOLDS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 24, 1893.)

AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS — APPEAL FROM JUSTICE'S COURT — OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION — USURY.

1. When an appeal is pending in the superior court from a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, the summons is amendable in matters of substance as well as matters of form, provided there is enough to amend by. There was enough to amend by in this case, and, the requisite amendments being made, the defects complained of were not cause for dismissing the action.

2. On the hearing of an appeal in the superior court, it is immaterial whether the judgment appealed from be void or valid, if the ap pellee recognizes the appeal as duly taken, and raises no question touching the validity of the judgment below. The appellant, by entering the appeal, recognizes the judgment as the basis of it, and as something needful to be appealed from. Nor can he urge that the appeal was entered too late. The amount and date of the judgment need not be inquired into at the instance of the appellant.

3. After several appeal cases have, with the consent of parties, and by order of the appellate court, been consolidated into one case for trial, it is too late for the appellant, by plea or motion, to attack the jurisdiction as to one of the consolidated cases on the ground that the amount involved therein was too small to bring it within the statute allowing appeals. If the appellant regarded it as too small, he should not have entered the appeal, nor should he have consented to the consolidation, so as to make that case abide the final judgment in the consolidated case.

4. Promissory notes, given when there was no statute on the subject of usury, and no limit as to the amount of interest, are not usurious, no matter how much past interest or usury was embraced in them as a part of the principal. If the debt was good and valid as to the principal, and was mature at the time the notes were given, and by the notes the day of payment was postponed, this postponement was a sufficient consideration, both for the interest and usury embraced as a part of the principal, and for future interest at the rate expressed in the face of the notes.

Error from superior court, Bartow county; Shelby Attaway, Judge pro hac.

Six actions by T. B. Neal and another, executors, against P. H. Reynolds and others. When the cases reached the superior court, they were consolidated, and plaintiffs had judgment. Plaintiffs and defendant Reynolds each bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Six justice's court suits were brought by Neal against Branson, Reynolds, and Tumlin, and judgments were rendered against the defendants. They appealed to the superior court, where their cases were consolidated and tried together, being referred to a special master. To his report, exceptions were filed by both sides. All of these, but one, were overruled, and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the executors of Neal, was rendered. Reynolds brought his bill of exceptions, and a cross bill of exceptions was taken by the plaintiffs. The suits were on five notes for $100 each, and one for $30, dated December 12, 1873, due October 25, 1874, stipulating for interest at 18 per cent. per annum, and signed by the defendants. In the superior court were filed pleas setting up usury, apparently on behalf of the defendants, but sworn to be Branson only. After the plaintiffs had put in evidence before the master the original notes sued on, Reynolds moved to dismiss the appeals because it did not appear from the record that the same were entered within four days from the date of the rendition of the judgments in the justice's court from which the appeals purported to have been entered, nor at what date the judgment was rendered in the justice's court in either of the cases, nor that any judgment was rendered. He further moved to dismiss the appeal in the suit on the $30 note because the amount claimed was less than $50. He further moved to dismiss the actions as to himself (averring that he had never appeared or pleaded thereto, except for the purpose of insisting on the following grounds) because (1) the summons did not command him to appear in the justice's court from which the appeal was entered; and (2) did not mention any militia district in or for which any justice's court was to be held; and (3) was not made returnable to any court, nor did it command him to appear at any court, nor recite that any court would be held on the date on which it was made returnable, nor that the place of return mentioned therein was the usual place of holding justice's court in and for the 952d district, G. M.; (4) no judgment was rendered in the case in the justice's court of the 952d district, G. M., on February 3, 1877, the date on which the summons was made returnable, nor does it appear that any justice's court was held on that day, nor any action taken in the case in said court on that day; (5) the summons was not directed to defendant Reynolds, nor did it command him to appear anywhere at any time, but was only directed to, all and singular, the constables of said county, and commanded them to appear. The following is a copy of one of the summonses in question: "Georgia, Bartow county. John Neal v. J. C. Branson, P. H. Reynolds, and Thomas Tumlin, sect'y. To All and Singular, the Constables of Said County: You are hereby required to appear, personally, or by attorney, at my office, in Kingston, on the 3d day of Feb'y, 1877, to answer the plaintiff's demand in action of debt due by note for one hundred dollars, as in default thereof the court will proceed as to justice may appertain. This Jan'y 8th, 1877. L. Burrough, J. P. [L. S.] The others contained the words, "To the defendants," just before the words, "You are hereby required," etc., and the words, "as per copy below," immediately after the words, "note for one hundred dollars." Over objection, the master allowed the plaintiffs to amend the summonses by inserting at the proper places therein the words, "952d Dist. G. M.," and the words, "to execute and return," and the words, "To the defendants," and the words, "at the usual place of holding justice courts in said district." To the allowance of this amendment, and to the overruling of the motion to dismiss, Reynolds excepted. He pleaded that on February 3, 1877, L. Burrough, J. P., without his consent, and in his absence, continued the cases to a date more than 10 days afterwards, and hence the suits, if valid as to him, as commenced, thereby lapsed and became discontinued, and the so-called "judgments" rendered on February 23d were, as to him, null and void; he never having consented to the trial on the day the judgments were rendered, nor to the continuance, nor was he present, nor did he, then or previously, appear or plead, or in any manner waive his right of objection to said proceedings. He also pleaded that he was only surety on the notes, though the word "surety" was omitted after his name; further, that the judgments were rendered against him at a day other than that upon which he was summoned to appear, and not upon the regular day set for the court for the trial of these cases, nor upon a regular court day, nor had he his day in court, and that, as to two of the cases, he was not in any manner summoned to appear, nor did he appear and plead, nor waive summons or service.

The master found that a justice court was held in and for the 952d district, G. M., at Kingston, by L. Burrough, J. P., on February 3, 1877; that the cases were regularly continued on that day; and that, while the testimony is somewhat conflicting as to the number of continuances, the justice's docket shows only one continuance. And the master reports that there was but one, and that it was from February 3d (Saturday) to February 23d, (Friday.) He holds that, under the then existing laws and practice in justice courts, this was simply an irregularity, and would not invalidate the judgments. He further finds that they were rendered on a regular court day, and are valid and binding against all the defendants, and, though Reynolds was not present when the cases were continued, he was informed by the justice, after the court had adjourned, February 3d, that the cases were continued to the next regular court day. The evidence does not show that he was informed what day that would be, nor that he inquired, or took any steps to ascertain, but, when informed of the continuance by the justice, he did not dissent or object. The master reports that the place where these judgments were rendered was the usual and legally established place of holding justice courts in and for the 952d district, G. M., and that Reynolds did not appear or plead on February 3d. These findings are excepted to by Reynolds because, as he alleges, the justice court had no authority to continue the cases for more than 10 days, and hence the judgments rendered on February 23d were null and void, the court having lost jurisdiction. He further says that under the law, as then existing, there were no regular court days in justice courts, and that the day on which the judgments were rendered was not a regular court day. The master further reported that the appeals in these cases were entered within four days after the judgments were rendered; also, that the appeal from the judgment on the $30 note was properly and legally appealed, for the reason that the sum claimed, principal and interest, with accrued costs, amounted to more than $50. Reynolds assigns error because the principal and interest, at the date of the judgment in the justice's court, amounted to a few dollars less than $50, and no evidence appeared before the master as to the amount of cost accrued, and insists that, the principal and interest then being less than $50, the case was not appealable to the superior court, whether the cost added would make the sum over $50 or not. On the question of usury the master found, as a fact, that the six notes in question were given in renewal of four notes aggregating $350, executed in 1871, while usury laws were of force; that the original amount loaned on the first notes was $300, and the original notes were usurious; that afterwards, December 12, 1873, the usury laws having been repealed, these six notes, aggregating $530, covering and including the original loan of $300, were executed, adding to the $300 interest at 18 per cent. per annum, making the $530; that the original notes were then long past due, and indulgence or forbearance was granted by Neal, and the new notes made to fall due October 25, 1874; and that they included the original loan of $300, with 18 per cent. interest from March 7, 1871, to December 12, 1873. As a matter of law, he reported that on December 12, 1873, no usury laws were of force, and parties could legally contract for any rate of interest they saw proper, and the usury contracted to be paid while usury laws were of force could be included in the new notes without the taint of usury attaching to the new promises, and that the forbearance or indulgence granted by Neal was a sufficient consideration to support the transaction and new promise, and the defendants were bound thereby. This finding is assigned as error by Reynolds, because, he says, it did not appear from the evidence that the usurious interest accruing on the original loan was included in the new loan by any express agreement of the parties that it should form any part of the consideration for future forbearance by Neal, and that in the absence of such understanding the notes sued on were invalid, to the extent of the usury accruing from March 7, 1871, to December 12, 1873, and remained tainted thereby, and were pro tanto without consideration, and should have been reduced. Reynolds also filed exceptions of fact involving substantially the same questions as appear from his exceptions of law. As a further exception of fact, he says that the master erred in reporting that there was no evidence before him to show that Reynolds was only security for Branson on the notes sued on. It is alleged that the testimony of Mark A. Hardin clearly shows that the notes sued on were given in renewal of notes given for a former loan made by Neal to Branson early in 1871, for which former loan Branson gave his notes with Thomas Tumlin and one Gillman as security; that the consideration of the notes now sued on was received by Branson, and not by Reynolds; and that the object of the signature of Reynolds to the renewal notes was to secure a debt of Branson, which he previously owed Neal, on which former notes Reynolds was in no way liable. From which testimony, as well as from the whole testimony before the master, it is alleged that he should have found Branson liable, if at all, only as security. This was the only exception to the master's report that was sustained.

The plaintiffs assign error upon the ruling of the auditor admitting the testimony of Mark A. Hardin over their objection on the ground that Neal was dead, and the facts testified to by Hardin could have been testified to by Neal, were he alive, and were facts of which Neal had knowledge, and that Hardin was the agent of the defendants in the transaction, and especially of Branson. The master found that Hardin was not connected with the notes sued on, nor with the transaction, in any way, when Reynolds became a party thereto. And the plaintiffs further except to the judgment of the court in overruling the master's finding that Reynolds was not a surety on the notes. Other assignments of error by the plaintiffs are as follows: In the finding that the notes sued on were given in renewal of four notes aggregating $350, executed in 1871; plaintiffs contending that no such fact was proved by the evidence. In the finding that the original amount loaned on the first notes was $300; plaintiffs contending that the evidence did not disclose what was loaned upon them, nor when due, nor whether they bore any interest. In the finding that the cases were continued in the justice's court more than 10 days, which continuance was but an irregularity,—plaintiffs contending that such was not irregular, but entirely regular; that the master should have found that the suit on the $30 note was properly appealed to the superior court, not only for the reason given by him, but because the defendants were estopped from moving to dismiss the appeal, or from excepting thereto, on the ground that the amount did not exceed $50 at the time of judgment. In the finding that the original notes for $350 were usurious; there being no evidence that they bore interest, nor when they were due or dated, and the evidence showing no usury therein. In the finding that there was but one continuance in the justice's court, and that the same was for more than 10 days; plaintiffs contending that the evidence showed that there were two or more continuances, no one of which was for more than 10 days. In the judgment of the court refusing to strike the defendants' pleas of usury on plaintiffs' demurrer thereto because they set up no sufficient defense, and showed no usury.

Denn & Smith, Neel & Swain, and Harrison & Peeples, for plaintiffs. John W. Akin, for defendants.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. When a case is on appeal in the superior court from a justice's court, any amendment of the summons whether in matter of form or of substance, may be made, which could have been made while the case was pending in the primary court. The only restriction on either court is that there must be enough to amend by. Code, § 3479. There was enough to amend by in the present case, and the amendments made cured the defects complained of.

2. Surely, the appellant should not be allowed to break up his own appeal by urging that he had taken it too late, or from a void judgment, or from one too small in amount. After securing the delay incident to the appeal, he might well bide the election of the other party on such questions as these. What the appellate court might do on its own motion, for its own ease or protection, need not be considered. Certainly, it is not obliged to take notice of such things at the instance of the appellant, but can assume, without inquiry or examination, that the appeal was well taken, the other party being satisfied with it.

3. The consolidated case was not subject to be reopened or remodeled or defeated by looking into the amount involved in one of the separate cases embraced in the consolidation. The order or judgment of consolidation was passed at the instance of both parties. Why should it be disregarded at the instance of one of them? Besides, the one who sought to recede was the appellant,—the same party who brought all the cases into the superior court, and caused that court to be troubled with them. For this reason, the principle of the ruling just made under the preceding head of this opinion applies here, also.

4. On the question of usury, it is to be observed that there was no usury law in force when these notes were given. This being so, there was no obstacle to charging interest, to an unlimited amount, for the future use of money then due from the debtor to the creditor, and for future forbearance to require or enforce payment; and it mattered not whether a part of the interest so charged was added to and made a part of the principal of the notes, and a part covered by a rate named in the notes as that which the principal, thus enlarged, was to bear, or whether the amount actually and legally due when the notes were given, and that only, was made principal, and the whole interest provided for by naming in the notes a rate of interest on that principal which would produce, by the time the new term of credit expired, an aggregate sum for interest equal to the total interest charged. It is matter of indifference, when there is no usury law in force, whether interest, the whole or a part of it, be added to the principal, or whether the principal, pure and simple, be expressed in the note, and the rate of interest named in the instrument be made high enough to produce all the interest agreed upon. In the notes now under consideration, a part of the sum charged for interest, and agreed to be paid, was incorporated with the principal, and a part was to accumulate as interest, eo nomine, at the rate mentioned on the face of the notes. But the two controlling facts are: First, there was a sum actually and legally due as the principal of prior notes at the time the new notes were given; and, secondly, a new term of credit was agreed upon, and the day of payment of the money already due was postponed accordingly. This postponement was a sufficient consideration for all the interest agreed upon and promised in the new notes,—both that which was embraced in the notes as principal, and that which was not so embraced, but was provided for by the rate of interest which the notes specified. True, this would give interest upon interest, to the extent of so much of the nominal principal as was made up of interest; but compound interest is not usury, any more than simple interest is usury, when no usury law is in existence. Thus far, we have treated the case without reference to the fact that the notes now in controversy were given in renewal of prior notes which were infected with usury. Did the infection of the first set of notes taint the second? We think not. The usury of the first set did not taint the principal of that set, but left it pure and collectible. That principal went into the second set. As there was no usury law, the granting of further time for paying that money upon a new agreement was the same, in effect, as receiving on the first notes that amount of money in payment, and then loaning it again for the new term of credit, and taking therefor these new notes. Had this course been pursued, no one would suspect or imagine that any of the interest covered by the new notes would have been usury. With a good principal, the term of credit to serve as a consideration for unlimited interest, and no usury law, how is it possible to make a contract which can rightly be held to be tainted with usury, either as to the whole of the interest, or any part of it? Ballard v. Bank, 61 Ga. 458. Judgment affirmed. Cross bill dismissed.

ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—NONSUIT.

The declaration alleging an unconditional contract for the sale of 500 cases of eggs, and the evidence not establishing such a contract, but one materially variant therefrom, there was no error in granting a nonsuit, whether the affidavit which the court considered was properly in evidence or not.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action for breach of contract by A. M. Shomo against A. B. Ransom. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Shomo sued Ransom for damages because of the failure of Ransom to deliver eggs according to an alleged contract between the two. After hearing the evidence for plaintiff, a motion was made for a nonsuit, upon the grounds: (1) The case came under the statute of frauds, in that it was a case of a sale of goods over the value of $50, without any writing to bind either party; 2) because the evidence failed to show any completed and definite contract on the part of defendant, and that defendant only agreed to ship 500 cases, or as many as he could; (3) because plaintiff was not bound to accept the goods, and could not have been held in a suit by defendant against him. The nonsuit was granted generally on the ground that plaintiff had failed to make out his case, and to this decision plaintiff excepted. He also excepted as to the ruling that the contents of an affidavit, hereafter to be mentioned, were in evidence, which ruling, made on the argument of the motion for nonsuit, was made over objection of plaintiff's counsel, but no objections were made to the admission of said evidence. In behalf of plaintiff, one Hudgins testified: Was a broker in Atlanta, and had represented Ransom in some business. Had some correspondence with Ransom as to the sale of 500 cases of eggs to Shomo, and had written Ransom if he could fill and accept such order. The order was 500 cases to be delivered, at 10 cents, between the 1st and 25th of July, in Atlanta. He did not know how many letters he wrote Ransom. At the time of his letter of June 30th, eggs were going down to 10 cents a dozen. In his letter asking Ransom about witness' customer for 500 cases of eggs to be delivered between the 1st and 25th of July, at 10 cents, no name was given, and no name was mentioned in the letters before the 30th of June. Witness sent the telegram dated July 1st. At the time of the sale to Shomo, witness represented Ransom, and submitted the offers from Shomo to Ransom, expecting to be paid by Ransom. Had no conversation with Shomo in regard to the offer, except that Shomo asked him to make Ransom the offer. Shomo mentioned it a month before, some time in June. Shomo knew witness had written Ransom and Odell & Co. Witness told him so in the conversation about the submission of the offers. Up until July 1st, Ransom refused to accept the order, for the reason that eggs were continually fluctuating. Witness wrote him on the 30th of June, and the next thing Ransom wired him to know who wanted 500 cases of eggs, and witness answered by wire, giving Shomo's name. Shomo told witness to submit the offers to Ransom and Odell & Co. Witness represented Odell & Co. at that time. Witness had written Ransom about the offer of Shomo before the telegram of July 1st. The conversation about that offer occurred between Shomo and witness about the 1st of July. In the letter of June 30th, witness wrote Ransom that he had a customer for 500 cases of eggs, to be delivered between the 1st and 25th of July, in Atlanta, at 10 cents a dozen; cases to be returned. Whatever contract was made for Ransom by Shomo was concluded by the latter stating the condition of the offer. In the first letter witness wrote Ransom, he wrote that Shomo wanted 500 cases, and in the next letter mentioned Shomo as his customer. The first letter mentioned no name. This offer was declined until the 1st of July. Shomo submitted this offer or order about the 1st of June. Witness had written Ransom before the telegram from Ransom, asking witness who the customer was, but could not say that Ransom had not forgotten it. Ransom telegraphed witness, because witness wrote him a letter, and asked what about order for eggs. Witness wrote on the last day of June, and next morning received the telegram asking who it was that wanted the eggs. Witness had written, "What about my customer for five hundred cases of eggs?" saying nothing of the person. Did not remember that he mentioned the price, and does not remember all that was in the letter on the subject. The time of delivery, between the 1st and 25th of July, was in the letter. Witness cannot remember definitely whether it was in his last letter or not. There was read to witness an affidavit made by him on October 20, 1891, to the effect that on July 1, 1891, witness called at Shomo's place of business, and Shomo asked witness to buy for him (Shomo) eggs, witness being a broker; that Shomo knew witness would have to send out orders for them to produce men; that witness telegraphed on July 1, 1891, to Ransom for 500 cases, or as many as Ransom could sell, but made no positive contract for any definite amount for Shomo; that, so far as witness knew, Ransom had never at any time agreed to deliver Shomo, on deponent's order, the full amount of 500 cases of eggs, but only so many as he could; that there was never any contract that Ransom should deliver any specific number of boxes or cases of eggs by witness; that witness sold 500 cases conditionally, provided the order could be filled in 30 days, and the further condition that Ransom would agree to fill the order; that witness sent the telegram annexed, to wit, "A. M. Shomo, 500 cases, or as many as you can," which was all the contract made, so far as witness knows; that witness acted as broker, but had no agreement from Ransom that Ransom would fill his orders to any definite amount. The witness stated that the signature to this affidavit was his, and that the statement in it was correct; that he could not make contract; and that, in pursuance of Shomo's request, he wrote Odell and others. The reading of this affidavit to the witness, and asking him if the statement therein was correct, was not objected to by plaintiff's counsel. The witness further testified: The words "my customer," in the letter of June 30th, referred to Shomo, and Ransom could know this from a previous letter witness had written him, which he presumed Ransom had; that the date of the first letter was in June, but he did not remember whether the letter of June 19th was the first written; that his recollection was he had written a letter, and given Shomo's name; that, judging from the letter of June 19th, it seemed to be the first letter written Ransom on the subject, but he could not say whether the letter in which Shomo's name was given was before or after. Ransom did not send witness to Shomo, and did not know about his going to get the order for 500 cases. Did not send him particularly to Shomo, but to sell him, (witness,) and, when witness sold, he would report and settle up. At that time there were 30 dozen eggs to the case. The following telegrams and portions of letters were introduced: Letter of June 18, 1891, from Cason & Hudgins to Ransom, stating that the writers had customer for 500 cases, to be delivered 1st to 20th July; that his offer was 10 cents for Atlanta, and return cases, and, if Ransom found he could place any of the amount, let the writers hear from him. Telegram of July 1, 1891, from same to same: "A. M. Shomo, 500 cases, or as many as you can. Must be good." Letter of July 1, 1891, from same to same, stating: "We wired you this evening to commence shipping A. M. Shomo eggs as per our letter of yesterday. We trust the trade will be a satisfactory one in every way." Letter of July 7th, from Ransom to Cason & Hudgins, stating that their order for 500 cases for Shomo was received; that he wrote Shomo "to-day" regarding terms, etc., and shipped him 18 cases the day before, and would ship him regularly to July 25th, until notified differently. Letter from Ransom to Shomo of July 7th, stating that Ransom had shipped Shomo that day, as per C. & H.'s order, 18 cases of eggs, and would ship more until July 25th, provided his terms, etc., were satisfactory with Shomo; that his terms were as stamp stated, and he guaranteed everything to be right; that he would ship Shomo regularly up to the 25th, unless notified differently, and Shomo would please return cases; that he would make draft on Shomo for invoice the next day; that he thanked Shomo for his order, and hoped to do considerable business with him, etc. Letter of July 7th, from same to same, stating: "Inclosed find bill of lading and invoice of eggs shipped to-day. Will send you considerable more to-morrow." Letter from same to same of July 10, 1891, inclosing bill of lading and invoice of eggs, and stating: "Will ship you regular next week, and will try and get you in a big lot of eggs. * * * Will make draft for same, which please honor." Shomo testified: Prior to these letters and telegrams, he had given an order for eggs to Hudgins. About June 1st, Hudgins asked him if he wanted to buy eggs, and he told Hudgins he would take 500 cases delivered in July, and Hudgins said he would endeavor to get them up. In about a week, Hudgins said he could not get anybody to make prices at that time, but would by the 1st of July. Then witness told him, he thinks, he was willing to pay for eggs 10 cents delivered, and would return cases. About July 1st, Hudgins told him he had gotten the eggs from Ransom, whom witness does not know. Witness answered the letter of July 7th the same or the next day, and told Ransom everything was satisfactory, and to let the eggs come as rapidly as possible. He received 42 cases. When Ransom's contract expired, eggs were worth 14 cents a dozen. There were 30 dozen to the case. Knows nothing about the telegraphic order, as he sent none, and had no conversation with Ransom. Did not know what the letter dated July 1st referred to, but based the order on another letter from Hudgins. Ransom had until July 25th to ship the eggs, and witness supposed Ransom understood the matter. Ransom was bound, and witness was not, and witness did not know whether, if he had refused to take the eggs, he could have been sued. He never asked for any written contract, only through Hudgins. Ransom may have been bound to this agent. Witness never signed, nor expected to sign, any proposition, but wrote the letter to Ransom.

Glenn & Maddox, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The facts appear in the official report. There can be no doubt that the contract alleged in the declaration for the sale of 500 cases of eggs was an unconditional contract. It is equally certain that no such contract appears in the evidence, for the contract to which that points was conditional and the condition was of such a nature as to render the variance material. Putting aside other questions raised and discussed in the case, this is a decisive one. With or without considering the affidavit which was before the court, the judgment of nonsuit was correct. Judgment affirmed.

PRITCHETT v. STATE.

HOMICIDE — WARNING TO JURY — ABSENCE OF JUDGE DURING TRIAL — RESISTING ARREST — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It appearing that in a trial for murder the jury were kept together in charge of an officer from the time they were impaneled until the verdict was rendered, there was no error in not instructing them at recess, and when the court adjourned at night, not to discuss the case among themselves, nor allow any one else to speak to them about it.

2. It is not proper for the presiding judge to absent himself from the court room during the trial of a murder case without suspending the trial during his absence, but such conduct on the part of the judge will not necessitate the granting of a new trial where it appears that he was absent only a few moments, for a necessary purpose, during the argument of defendant's counsel, it not appearing that any injury resulted therefrom to the accused, or that a motion to have a mistrial declared was made. In Hayes v. State, 58 Ga. 35, a new trial was granted, not alone because of similar conduct on the part of the judge, who absented himself during the examination of a witness for the state, but also because of serious errors in the charge. The ruling made in the case at bar is supported by O'Shields v. State, 6 S. E. 426, 81 Ga. 301.

3. Whether, under all the facts in evidence, an attempt by an arresting officer and his posse to commit a serious personal injury on another will reduce to manslaughter a homicide committed by the latter, is a question for the jury under a proper charge from the court, and not a question of law to be decided in the first instance by the presiding judge.

4. Where two instances of resisting an arrest stood in immediate connection one to the other, if the first was by a combination of several persons, some of whom participated in the second, the circumstances and conduct attending the first are admissible in evidence against a person who was not connected therewith, but who did participate in the second as a friend of the individual sought to be arrested, and a charge of the court which explains to the jury the reason for admitting the evidence is not erroneous.

5. Where the evidence of a homicide is not wholly circumstantial, a request to charge the jury, based on a contrary theory, should be denied.

6. A charge which relates to the turning points of a case, if not erroneous as to the points specified in the motion for a new trial, the other points not being referred to in the motion, is no cause for a new trial.

7. A charge that the state claims so and so, even when its propositions are not in the most natural order, but are inverted, and somewhat involved, does not infringe on the rule of law forbidding the judge to intimate his opinion on the evidence, or what it establishes.

8. Where counsel goes out of the evidence, and states an irrelevant fact, which he contends he arrives at by inference from the evidence, it is not cause for a new trial that the presiding judge, in interdicting a repetition of the statement, says that of his own knowledge the real truth of the irrelevant matter was thus and so.

9. When the court inadvertently omits to instruct the jury as to the form of the verdict in case they find the accused not guilty, the omission may be repaired by recalling the jury after they have retired to their room, and then suggesting the proper form.

Error from superior court, De Kalb county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Brack Pritchett was convicted of murder, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Pritchett was tried in February, 1893, upon a special presentment charging him, Lovejoy, and Harralson, alias Harrison, with the murder of Hurst. (The presentment was made at the February term, 1888, of De Kalb superior court.) Lovejoy had been previously tried, and found guilty, and, his motion for new trial being overruled, brought the case to this court, by which the judgment of the court below was reversed. See 82 Ga. 87, 8 S. E. 66. Harralson or Harrison was also tried, and found guilty, and the judgment of the court below refusing him a new trial was by this court affirmed. See 83 Ga. 129, 9 S. E. 542. Pritchett was found guilty, with a recommendation to imprisonment for life. His motion for new trial was overruled, and to this ruling he excepts.

The motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc. Also, because the court erred in refusing to rule out the evidence of a witness (Rogers) relating to the rescue of Hubert; the objection to the evidence being that it was not shown that defendant was present, or in any way connected with it; and the same objection being made to the same evidence by witnesses Coffey and Hutchinson. What the objectionable evidence was is not set out in the motion.

Because the court erred in not instructing the jury at recess, and when the court adjourned at night, not to discuss the case among themselves, nor allow any one else to speak to them about the case. Also in failing to instruct the officer in charge of the jury as is usual in such cases, but only saying, "The sheriff will see that you are taken care of." In reference to this ground the judge states that the jury was kept together from the time the first juror was chosen until the verdict was rendered.

Because the court erred in leaving the bench and the court room pending the first argument, and going down into the lower story of the courthouse and out into the yard, to the water-closet, without suspending proceedings during the court's absence. As to this ground the judge states he has no remembrance of leaving the bench at any time while the case was being tried, but, as both counsel for defendant have made affidavit that he left the bench while one of them was making his argument, he accepts that as true, and accompanies it with this explanation: It is his practice, when he must leave the bench to attend to the lighter call of nature, and defendant's counsel is speaking, to go out quietly, to keep from interrupting his argument, which, as every lawyer knows, may seriously impair the argument and its effect. If counsel for the state is speaking when he has to leave, he first gets the consent of defendant's counsel, so as not to impair his argument. In this case it seems he went out when one of defendant's counsel was speaking, and cannot see how what was intended for a benefit, and was a benefit, could be converted into an error.

Error in refusing to charge the following written requests, made by defendant: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant shot and killed J. E. Hurst, and that the killing was without malice, either express or implied, and was done without any mixture of deliberation whatever, but was voluntary, upon a sudden heat of passion; and if you believe further from the evidence that there was an attempt on the part of the posse of white men then and there to commit upon him, the defendant, a serious personal injury, or if you believe from the evidence that there were other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion, and to exclude all idea of deliberation or malice, either express or implied, you could not find the defendant guilty of murder. If you believe from the evidence that the defendant and another, by the consent of the sheriff of said county, were taking away Wesley Hubert, and after such consent the three had left, and were then violating no law, and at the instance of one of the white citizens of your county the arrest of Wesley Hubert was demanded, and, being armed with pistols, pursued the defendant and Wesley Hubert, and, overtaking them, attempted the arrest of said Hubert, and in such attempt undertook to do violence to the person of the defendant, he would be authorized in law to protect himself against such violence, and you could not find him guilty of murder, nor of any other offense." The evidence being circumstantial in this case as to who killed said Hurst, before you can convict the defendant on it the circumstances must be so strong as to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis except that of the defendant's guilt. If you believe from the evidence that the defendant did not kill Hurst, but that he was killed by some one of the white men, intentional or otherwise, the defendant would not be guilty, and you should acquit him."

Error in charging: "I have permitted introduction of evidence before you as to the first arrest, and I have done so with the view that you might have all the facts necessary for you to determine whether there was a combination by Wesley Hubert and his friends to resist the officers; and that, if you believe it was a forcible resistance in the first instance, and that when it was attempted to arrest him again there was another forcible resistance, that it was necessary for you to have it before you to throw light upon it, that you may judge whether the second arrest and resistance, and what occurred on the second arrest, was done for the purpose of resisting the officer in making the arrest; that is all. It is not material that all the parties who were engaged in the first resistance to the arrest should be engaged in the second resistance. It is only for you to determine whether there was first a rescue and a resistance to the second arrest,—a rescue at first, and the same thing continued afterwards,—to hold these persons responsible who were engaged in the second resistance. But if the testimony should not be so strong as to produce upon your minds the conviction beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Brack Pritchett, actually fired the shot which killed Hurst, then see whether that testimony satisfies your minds, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that Brack Pritchett was one who was forcibly resisting the officers, and that he fired his pistol in furtherance of that resistance. If he did so, it does not matter who fired the fatal shot, and you should believe, moreover, of course, there was a combination between these men to resist these officers; that they were all actuated by a common intent to do so. And I charge you upon that part of it that it does not excuse Hubert, nor these other men who were aiding him, if they were aiding him, to resist the arrest, because some one said to them that Mr. Austin, or any one else who was pursuing them for the purpose of the arrest, said that they could leave, and that they would not arrest them then. The officer, even when he said that, had the right to change his mind; and the arresting officer had the right to adopt a different policy,—the whole thing being based upon the right to arrest Hubert. Because the officer declines to arrest at a particular time does not bind him to give up his right to arrest, even in a short time afterwards; and hence it is no defense,—that circumstance, if you should believe it from the evidence, is no defense, always provided that the man, Wesley Hubert, had laid himself amenable to the law; that Rogers was the constable, and had a warrant; and that Hurst was the lawful marshal of the town of Decatur. So, if those things are correct, why, they would have had the right to have made the second arrest in the way they did, just as they would have had to make the arrest if they had not desisted from the arrest."

Error in charging: "Well, those two points that I have given you in charge are the turning points in this case, provided, of course, as I said to you twice, that the arrest was a legal one, as I have described to you. Did this defendant, Pritchett, fire the shot that killed Hurst?" Alleged to be error in that the court expressed an opinion as to what were the turning points in the case.

Error in charging: "A circumstance given in evidence here, and which you have the right to consider, is that this defendant fled in the first instance, and that in the second instance he successfully made his escape, and that that was done last August five years ago, and that within the last few months he has been apprehended. Now, that is what the state claims; that those are the facts that are given in evidence before you, and from which you must come to your conclusion." Alleged to be error, as clearly expressing an opinion.

As to the exceptions to the charge and refusals to charge, the judge states that they must be considered with the whole charge, which is made a part of the record.

mony of Austin, objection having been made at the time: "About that time Mr. Pattillo came up. Mr. Pattillo was one of the councilmen at that time, and Tobe thought he had to obey him." It is not stated in this ground what objection was made to the evidence. Tobe was Hurst, the man who was killed, and who was engaged with others in attempting to arrest Hubert because of drunkenness and disorderly conduct in the town of Decatur, of which town Hurst was marshal. As to this ground the judge states: "Counsel for defendant, when Austin was testifying, said merely, 'I object,' without stopping the witness, or calling on the court for a ruling, and the court supposed he had waived his objection, as he permitted the witness to continue his testimony, and made no motion afterwards to rule that out."

Error in the following: One of defendant's counsel, while making the concluding argument relative to defendant's flight, referred to the fact that defendant was fearful he would be mobbed unless he left; and in addition to what defendant in his statement said relative to that, counsel stated further that defendant, when he was apprehended, was not put in De Kalb county jail, but in Fulton county jail, and there retained until within a few days since; and from that state of facts counsel was about drawing an inference that there was ground for the defendant's belief that he would be mobbed, when the court abruptly and most emphatically stated to counsel: "Stop, Mr. Jordan; there is no such evidence, and I know the contrary to be true;" and counsel in reply stated he thought he had a right to draw an inference from a given state of facts, but the court said that he would not permit it. As to this ground the judge states: "In trying to explain defendant's flight, Mr. Jordan stated it was because he was afraid of personal violence being done him by the citizens of De Kalb county, and then stated in verification of that as a fact that when apprehended he was placed in Fulton county jail, to make him safe from the citizens of De Kalb." At this point the solicitor general arose, and made the point to the court that Mr. Jordan had no right to state that. The court inquired from the bench if there was any evidence of that before the jury, and received for answer, without contradiction, that there was none. The court then stated he was placed in Fulton jail by the court's order, because quite a number of prisoners had in a body escaped from De Kalb jail. That is all there is of it, and should be taken in lieu of the ground of the motion.

Because the court actually forgot to charge the jury as to the form of their verdict in case they found the defendant not guilty, until after the jury had retired to their room, when the court stated to counsel that he believed he had failed to charge the jury as to the form of the verdict in case they found defendant not guilty, and directed that the jury be brought in, when the proper charge was given.

J. S. Candler, Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. We are aware of no law which constrains the judge who presides in a trial for murder to instruct the jury not to discuss the case among themselves, nor allow any one else to speak to them about it. The judge may give such instruction, when he thinks proper to do so; and the presumption is that he will give it whenever he deems the circumstances call for it. In this case the jury were kept together in charge of an officer from the time they were impaneled until the verdict was rendered. There is no cause for suspecting that they either discussed the case among themselves improperly, or that they were spoken to concerning it by any outside person, or that the officer in charge of them failed to perform his whole duty.

2. In relation to the judge leaving the bench, and absenting himself from the court room for a necessary purpose during a short interval, without suspending the trial on account of his absence, this is sufficiently treated of in the second headnote.

3. The actual grade of a homicide is to be ascertained by the jury on all the facts in evidence, and with the aid of a proper charge from the court touching the law of the case. It is not the duty of the court to decide in the first instance, as a question of law, whether an attempt by an arresting officer and his posse to commit a serious personal injury on the accused would reduce a killing done on the occasion to manslaughter. Under some circumstances it would, and under others the killing would even be reduced to justifiable homicide. The court's charge on the law should be such as to enable the jury to distinguish, one from another, all the grades of homicide which the jury, under the facts of the particular case, ought to investigate and consider, but beyond this the court could not go without trenching upon the province of the jury. They are to determine whether in the particular instance anything whatever done to the accused would make the killing manslaughter, rather than murder, or justifiable homicide.

4. Pritchett, the accused, did not participate in the first resistance offered to the arrest of Hubert. There were indications in the evidence that that resistance was made by a combination of several persons, and that some of these, together with Pritchett, participated in the second resistance. The second stood in close connection with the first in point of time, the interval between them being very short. We agree with the trial judge that the circumstances and conduct attending the first were admissible in evidence against Pritchett, who, although he took no part in the first, shared with some who did in the work of making the second, and while so engaged committed the homicide. We also think that the court did not err in charging the jury upon the subject as set forth in the official report, though we must admit that as to mere style and clearness the charge was not altogether felicitous.

5. There was some direct evidence that the killing was done by the accused. This being so, the court properly declined to charge the jury as requested on circumstantial evidence, the request assuming that the evidence as to the person who did the killing was circumstantial only.

6. It is not error for the court in its charge to the jury to specify the turning points in the case, and designate them as such. The motion for a new trial, after stating what the court charged on this subject, complains of it as error, "In that the court expressed an opinion as to what were the turning points in the case." The motion fails to mention or suggest any others as turning points, or to say that these were not. The complaint is that the court expressed an opinion at all as to what were the turning points in the case. Were it alleged that those specified were not all the turning points, or that certain others should have been included in the enumeration, we might consider the criticism well founded, but this is quite a different matter from holding that the court cannot express any opinion, whether it be correct or incorrect, as to what are the turning points. The assignment of error does not call in question the correctness of the opinion, but only the right to express it. For the purpose of dealing with this assignment, there being no other turning points suggested, and those specified not being denied to be such, we can take what the charge affirms touching this as being correct, and, so taking it, the charge can be upheld.

7. At first view, what the court charged on the subject of flight, escape, and recapture does certainly appear as infringing upon the rule of law which forbids the judge to intimate his opinion on the evidence, or what it establishes; but when the whole paragraph is read to its close it is reasonably apparent that the court meant to state to the jury not what the evidence was, or what it proved, but what the state claimed it was and established. To express this meaning the terms of the proposition contained in the paragraph must, it is true, be taken in an order which is inverted, and not the most natural. What should have been in the court's mind first was expressed last, but this does not vitiate the instruction if the meaning at which we have arrived is the true one, and we think it is.

8. In silencing the defendant's counsel touching an irrelevant fact not in evidence, which was as to the object of confining the accused in Fulton county jail, rather than that of De Kalb county, the presiding judge stated from his own knowledge what the object was; the confinement in that jail having been by the court's order. Undoubtedly this trivial matter is no cause for a new trial.

9. In charging the jury as to the form of their verdict, the presiding judge inadvertently omitted to say what form they should use in case they found the accused not guilty. On discovering the omission after the jury had retired to their room, he recalled them, and supplied the omission with the proper instruction. This was correct.

None of the points or questions raised by the motion for a new trial, whether mentioned in this opinion or not, furnish any legal reason for trying the case over. The court did not err in refusing a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO. v. CANDLER et al.

AMENDMENT OF VERDICT—CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROAD—CONTRACTOR'S LIEN.

1. A verdict finding and declaring a lien upon a part of a railroad is void, and is not amendable at a term of the court subsequent to that at which it was rendered, so as to make it assert a lien upon the whole of the railroad. The verdict not being amendable, a judgment conforming thereto is not amendable.

2. It creates no equity in favor of a railroad contractor, as against the lien of a mortgage upon the railroad, duly recorded and foreclosed, that the contractor, in performing his contract of building the road, supplied all the materials which went to make up its real value, and that the debt owing to him, and embraced in a general judgment against the company, junior to the mortgage, arose from the supplying of said materials and the performance of said work.

3. Judgment in the main case reversed, and, on the exceptions filed pendente lite, affirmed.

Error from superior court, Hall county; George F. Gober, Judge.

Contest between the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company and Allen D. Candler and another to establish priority of claims against the Gainesville & Dahlonega Railroad Company. From a judgment for Candler, the trust company brings error. Reversed in part.

Following is the official report:

This case was before the supreme court at the March term, 1891. 87 Ga. 241, 13 S. E. 560. At the July term, 1891, of the superior court, Candler filed a motion to amend his verdict and judgment of foreclosure of lien so as to embrace the whole, instead of a part, of the railroad. This motion was granted by a judge pro hac vice appointed by the clerk to preside in place of the judge of the circuit, who was disqualified. Before the present case was called, at the July term, 1892, Candler filed a supplemental petition or claim, and afterwards an amendment thereto, setting up additional reasons why the fund in court should be awarded to him. To these the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company demurred on the grounds that they set forth no sufficient cause why the money should be awarded to Candler, and that, the case having been once tried, and the questions of fact either agreed upon, or submitted to and passed on by a jury, it was too late to set up new grounds for relief, and moved that the court enter a decree awarding the money to movant on its mortgage, which had been foreclosed, on the ground that it was superior to Candler's judgment. This demurrer and motion were overruled by the presiding judge, and the movant excepted. At the same time the judge made the following ruling touching the amendment of Candler's verdict and judgment: "Under the ruling in 87 Ga. 241, 13 S. E. 560, there is no special lien. The motion to amend the verdict was not served upon the defendant to said verdict. It was not served on the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company. Neither is bound by it. As an original proposition upon the facts, I do not think it can be amended." To this ruling, Candler excepted pendente lite, alleging that no notice of a motion to amend the verdict was required by law; that on the facts the verdict could be, and was rightly, amended; and that the money should be applied to his amended special lien. Candler's supplemental claim sets up the following: On June 5, 1882, he entered into a contract with the authorities of the railroad company to build and construct its railroad to the Ochestatee river for $68,938. He soon entered upon the execution of the contract, laying out large sums of money, and doing a great deal of valuable work. The railroad company, finding itself unable, from lack of money, to carry out its part of the contract, afterwards agreed with him that his work should terminate at the Chattahoochee river, for which he should receive $16,348.03, which work he fully completed according to the contract on May 28, 1883, when all of said sum became due to him. The railroad company paid him a portion, leaving a balance due of $3,540, with interest. On June 23, 1883, as railroad contractor and material man, he filed, and had recorded, his claim of lien on all of the railroad. On January 29, 1884, he commenced his proceeding to enforce his lien. A verdict and judgment in his favor were rendered by consent at the August term, 1884, finding the sum due him to be $2,395.13 principal, and $195.00 interest, and finding him to be entitled to his lien. He waited for payment until 1889, when he undertook to enforce collection. The railroad, with its franchise and all its property, was sold by order of the court, and the litigation which was pending was transferred to the fund arising from the sale, and in course of the proceedings various parties were withdrawn, until, at the time of the trial, the only parties contesting for the fund were Candler and the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company. Upon said trial the fund was awarded first to the payment of fees and expenses, and, of the balance, $2,669.05 to Candler, and $719.40 to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, to which judgment that company excepted, and the same was reversed by the supreme court upon the sole ground that the verdict and judgment purporting to set up and declare a lien in favor of Candler as a railroad contractor and material man was void because it attempted to set up and declare said lien upon a part of the railroad, instead of the whole of it. Then Candler moved to amend the verdict and judgment in the foreclosure proceedings by making the same conform to the pleadings; that is to say, the claim of lien, as filed and recorded, and as set out in the declaration, was upon the whole of the railroad, and so was the declaration, and the prayer was for the foreclosure of the lien upon the whole road and its property, and by mistake, inadvertence, or other cause, the verdict and judgment, as originally entered, attempted to set up and declare the lien upon a part of the railroad. The motion was granted, reference being made to the proceedings, which are exhibited. Candler avers that whatever doubt the court might entertain as to the authority to amend the verdict, it is certain that the verdict does find the fact that Candler was entitled to his lien, and the judgment will be molded so as to give effect to said finding according to law. He further submits that the railroad derived all its value from the work which he did, and the material which he furnished, for which he has not been paid; that upon every principle of equity, justice, and right, the fund should be decreed to him in payment for the very property from the sale of which the fund in court was derived; that he had furnished and laid upon the road the iron and the spikes and fastenings from the terminus of the road, in Gainesville, to the Chattahoochee river, which iron and spikes and other fastenings constituted the sole object of value, without which the receiver would not have received any of the fund in court; and that the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company stood by, and saw him perform the labor and furnish the material in constructing the road, without any knowledge on his part that said company had any mortgage on the road or its property, and yet it delayed to enforce its claim, notwithstanding the failure to pay the interest on the bonds, until the railroad and all its property had gone into ruin and total worthlessness, except the iron, spikes, and fastenings which had been furnished and put upon the same by Candler. He therefore prays that the fund be awarded to him; that his lien as a railroad contractor and material man be declared superior to all other claims to the fund; that he be allowed to submit evidence to sustain the facts herein set forth, unless they be admitted; and for general relief.

Reid & Stewart, M. L. Smith, H. H. Dean, and H. H. Perry, for plaintiff in error. S. C. Dunlap, J. B. Estes, R. H. Baker, W. A. Charters, and W. P. Price, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The verdict in favor of Candler against the railroad company, which declared a lien upon a part of the railroad, was held by this court, in Trust Co. v. Candler, 87 Ga. 241, 13 S. E. 560, to be void. If this decision was correct,—and it must be taken to be so,—the verdict was not amendable, so as to make it assert a lien upon the whole of the railroad. The jury having expressly restricted the lien to a part of the railroad, the amendment made is absolutely repugnant to the verdict itself. If the verdict was not void, but only needed an amendment to make it certain, the pleadings could be resorted to for that purpose. But there is as much certainty that the verdict limits the lien to a part of the railroad as there is that any verdict was rendered. The amendment does not change uncertainty to certainty, but substitutes one certainty for another certainty. It is as impossible to doubt that the verdict, as found by the jury, did not declare a lien on the whole road, as it is to doubt that the amendment does declare such a lien. The judgment originally entered up conformed to the verdict, and, as the verdict is not amendable, neither is the judgment amendable; for the two must correspond as to the extent of the lien which the one finds, and the other seeks to enforce.

2. The scheme of the Code, §§ 1979, 1980, is to give to contractors for building railroads a lien for work done or materials furnished, on certain prescribed terms, and the mode of enforcing the lien is also prescribed. Id. § 1990. It seems to us plain that the object of the Code would be frustrated, and virtually defeated, if a contractor who has secured a lien, but failed to enforce it in the manner prescribed, can abandon that lien, and fall back upon an alleged equitable lien involved in the very same state of facts out of which his legal lien arose, and thereby postpone or defeat a mortgage upon the railroad, duly recorded and foreclosed; this mortgage being of older date than the general judgment which the contractor has obtained for the amount of his debt. We entertain no doubt that the law contemplates that a contractor to whom it gives a legal lien upon a railroad, and who has nothing to do in order to take the benefit of it but to enforce it in the way prescribed, shall have no other lien, either in addition to it, or as a substitute for it. He cannot cover his failure to comply with the statute as to the enforcement of the lien by abandoning that lien and asserting another one, nor can he assert his legal lien otherwise than in the mode prescribed. We need not rule, and do not, whether, if there were no statutory system of liens in behalf of railroad contractors, there would be any equity in favor of the contractor against the mortgage, under the circumstances of this case, or not. But with that system, and the relation to it which this contractor occupies, we deem it perfectly clear that he is restricted to his statutory lien, and must enforce that, or none at all. The judgment of the court below on the exceptions taken pendente lite is affirmed. On the main bill of exceptions, judgment reversed.

EVIDENCE—DEED RECORDED IN ANOTHER COUNTY.

1. In order for an issue as to the genuineness of a deed to be made up, under section 2712 of the Code, for separate trial, it is necessary that the deed should be recorded in the county in which the land in controversy lies. Its being recorded in an adjoining county, in which other land embraced in the same deed lies, is not sufficient, because such recording will not serve to render the deed admissible in evidence on the trial of the main case. Nor will it serve to admit in evidence on that trial a certified copy from the record after the original deed has been lost, even though this certified copy be recorded in the county in which the land in controversy lies, and in which suit for its recovery is pending; there being no statute which authorizes the recording of a certified copy of a deed, instead of the original, though it may be that an established copy could be recorded the same as the original.

2. As the whole proceeding was outside of the statute under which the issue was formed and tried, there was no error in setting aside the verdict; but, as a new trial would be idle and fruitless, direction is given that the affidavit raising the issue be dismissed.

Error from superior court, Gwinnett county; N. L. Hutchins, Judge.

Action in ejectment by William S. Harden and others against J. R. Kennedy. A special issue was joined, and tried separately, resulting in a verdict for defendant. This verdict having been set aside, and a new trial granted, defendant brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

The following is the official report:

An action of ejectment, upon the demise of Martha A. and Mary Bagley and William S. Harden, and upon other demises, against J. R. Kennedy, for certain land in Gwinnett county, came on to be tried; and, pending the trial, plaintiffs offered in evidence a certified copy of an agreement or deed made by the heirs at law and distributees of Robert Harkness to plaintiffs, as remainder-men, to the premises in dispute. Defendant filed an affidavit, under section 2712 of the Code, alleging that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the deed was a forgery, whereupon the trial of the case was arrested, and a special issue on the affidavit made up and submitted to the jury, and a verdict rendered, finding the deed to be a forgery. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial upon the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence, and because the court erred in overruling the motion of plaintiffs' counsel to dismiss the affidavit of defendant for the reason that a certified copy of an ancient registered deed or title paper could not be attacked in this way. This motion was granted, the court below, in the order granting the motion, stating that being in doubt as to the law of the case on the issue made, and the ends of justice seeming to require it, the motion was sustained. To this decision the defendant excepted. It does not appear what disposition has been made of the main case, or whether anything was done with it after the verdict on the special issue. There had been a previous verdict in favor of defendant upon his plea of the general issue, and a motion for new trial made by the plaintiffs was overruled, and the case brought to this court, by which the decision of the court below was reversed. 85 Ga. 703, 11 S. E. 1091. Upon the trial of the special issue as to the forgery of the paper, it was admitted that the courthouse and records of Gwinnett county, where the action was pending, were burned in 1871. The instrument in question purported to have been made in Forsyth county, by heirs and distributees of the estate of Robert Harkness, in settlement of the estate, making certain disposition of the lands which belonged to Robert Harkness, and which his widow acquired after his death, lying in Gwinnett and Forsyth counties; appointing R. W. M. Harkness trustee, etc., and bore date April 4, 1849. It appeared to be attested by one Connally, by Evaline E. Harkness, and by W. J. Lawrence, and to have been recorded in Forsyth county March 9, 1850, and in Gwinnett county July 25, 1887. The instrument was apparently signed by Dorcas, R. W. M., John C., and James P. Harkness, by W. J. and R. C. Lawrence, by William and E. A. Connally and W. J. Russell, former trustee, and appeared to have been attested by Gordon, a justice of the inferior court, as to Russell, separately from the attestation above mentioned. W. S. Harden testified that he believed the original of this agreement had been lost or destroyed; that the same was not in his power or custody; that the witnesses to it were all dead, except Connally, and he (witness) did not know whether Connally was dead or alive; that Connally moved from Georgia to Arkansas many years ago; that Elizabeth A. Harkness married William Connally; that the original never was in witness' possession, and he did not know that he ever saw it, but may have seen a copy. The following appeared from the evidence of W. S. and Harmon Bagley: Neither of them was present when the agreement was signed. R. W. M. and James P. Harkness and W. J. Lawrence, who married Rosanna C., stated to W. S. Bagley that they had made a settlement, and that R. W. M. Harkness had been appointed trustee, instead of W. J. Russell. They knew the persons who witnessed the agreement. Evaline Harkness is dead. Connally is alive, or went to Texas. W. J. Lawrence went to California, and they did not know whether he was dead or not. Gordon is dead. The witnesses did not know what had become of the original agreement, and Harmon Bagley did not remember ever seeing a copy of it. W. S. Bagley, to the best of his recollection, saw a certified copy of the original in possession of R. W. M. Harkness between 1865 and 1870. Evaline Harkness was R. W. M. Harkness' wife. W. J. Lawrence was a son-in-law of Robert Harkness. W. J. Russell was trustee for Dorcas Harkness and her children, appointed by the will, for the property of the estate of Robert Harkness willed to his wife, Dorcas, and her children. It further appeared that the certified copy had been compared with the original record in Forsyth county, and found to be an exact copy, and that W. J. Russell is dead. For the defendant, only one witness, E. A. Connally, was introduced. He testified that he had never heard of an agreement, and never signed any agreement whatever; that he never signed any title to the lands; that he was acquainted with Wils Connally, one of the alleged attesting witnesses, with Evaline Harkness and W. J. Lawrence, and they were all dead, so far as he knew.

T. M. Peebles, for plaintiff in error. Sam J. Winn, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The Code, in section 2712, provides that "a registered deed shall be admitted in evidence in any court in this state without further proof, unless the maker of the deed, or one of his heirs, or the opposite party in the cause, will file an affidavit that the said deed is a forgery, to the best of his knowledge and belief, when the court shall arrest the cause and require an issue to be made and tried as to the genuineness of the alleged deed." The issue which this provision contemplates can be raised only when there is a deed produced which is registered, and which, on account of its registration, is admissible in evidence on the trial of the main cause. Here no deed was produced which had been registered. The document produced was a certified copy of a deed registered in Forsyth county, the copy being authenticated as one made from the record of deeds in that county. This copy, as we infer from the transcript before us, had been recorded in Gwinnett, the county in which the suit was pending. But there is no statute, and never has been, so far as we are aware, authorizing a certified copy taken from the record of deeds in one county to be recorded in another county. The scheme of the recording acts is to record the originals of deeds, not copies of them, though, probably, in the case of lost or destroyed deeds, a duly-established copy might be recorded the same as an original. Although the deed recorded in Forsyth county conveyed land lying in that county, as well as the tract lying in Gwinnett, and now in controversy, the original, even if it had been produced, would not have been admissible in evidence as a registered deed, so far as the land in Gwinnett county is concerned, for it had not been recorded in Gwinnett, but only in Forsyth; and, while this record was good as to the Forsyth lands, it had no efficacy as to the Gwinnett land, for the place of recording deeds is the county in which the land lies. Code, § 2705. Where the same deed embraces land in two or more counties, it must be recorded in each of the counties, in order to render it admissible in evidence as to all the land it covers. If recorded in one county only, that recording is good as to the land lying therein, but not as to the other lands. It is manifest, we think, that the section of the Code above quoted has been misconstrued and misapplied in this proceeding, the facts not being such as to warrant the raising or the trial of a separate issue of forgery.

2. The whole proceeding being outside of the statute under which the issue was formed and tried, it was not error to set aside the verdict, but a new trial would be idle and fruitless. Therefore, direction is given that the affidavit raising the issue be dismissed. Judgment affirmed, with direction.

HEADEN et al. v. QUILLIAN et al.

TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTION—POWERS OF TRUSTEE.

A deed executed the 4th day of December, 1865, by which the grantor conveyed to E., his heirs and assigns, a tract of land in trust for the sole and separate use of H., the wife of the grantor, for and during her natural life or widowhood, and after her death to such children as she may have living by the grantor, "with power in the said H. to empower the trustee, by writing under her hand, to sell any part or the whole of said trust estate, and to reinvest the proceeds by her written consent in such other property, subject to the above described trusts, as he shall deem most for the interest of said trust estate," authorized the trustee, on the 4th day of May, 1877, with the written consent of H., to sell and convey, in fee simple, the land described in the deed; one or more of the children, at that time, not having arrived at majority.

Error from superior court, Banks county; N. L. Hutchins, Judge.

Action by Headley E. Headen and others against William H. Quillian and others to cancel certain deeds, and for other relief. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the petition, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Headen and others, by their petition, alleged: They are the children of B. V. Head-en and his wife, Eliza C. Their father is dead, and their mother is still living. Some time before his death, on December 4, 1865, their father executed a deed to M. Van Estes, by which, in consideration of his love and affection for his wife, he conveyed to Van Estes, in trust for her, certain land described, for her sole and separate use during her life or widowhood, and after her death to such children as she might have living by her said husband, share and share alike. By this deed, Van Estes was made trustee for Mrs. Headen, and no one else. She took an estate for life or widowhood, and was clothed with power to empower Van Estes, by writing, to sell any part or all of said trust estate, and reinvest the proceeds, by her written consent, in other property, subject to the trust. Neither Mrs. Headen nor Van Estes could legally sell or convey any larger estate than for the life or widowhood of Mrs. Headen. In May, 1877, Van Estes, as trustee of Mrs. Headen, executed a deed conveying in fee simple to one Owen part of the land, which conveyance purported to have the voluntary and unqualified written approval of Mrs. Headen. Owen went into possession, and made various improvements, and afterwards sold to Quillian & Co. Petitioners were not parties to these sales and conveyances in any way, and their estate in the property did not pass by them. The deed from their father was on record before either of these sales was made, and neither Owen nor Quillian & Co. were innocent purchasers. The execution of the conveyances to Owen and to Quillian & Co. were frauds upon petitioners. The petition contained various allegations of waste, value of the property for rent, etc., not necessary to be here set forth, and prayed for injunction, decree for damages, cancellation of the deeds to Owen and to Quillian & Co., except as to the estate of Mrs. Headen in the property, etc. The defendants named were Quillian & Co. and their tenants. A copy of the deed from Headen to Van Estes was attached as an exhibit to the petition. By this deed the land was conveyed to Van Estes, his heirs and assigns, "in trust, nevertheless, for the sole and separate use of Eliza C. Headen, wife of the said Blakely V. Headen, for and during her natural life or widowhood, and after her death to such children as she may have living by her present husband, Blakely V. Headen, share and share alike, with power of the said Eliza C. Headen to empower the said M. V. Estes, by writing under her hand, to sell any part or the whole of said trust estate, and to reinvest the proceeds, by her written consent, in such other property, subject to the above described trusts, as he shall deem most for the interest of said trust estate, and with the power to the said Eliza C. Headen to appoint and choose, by writing, another trustee, instead of the same M. Van Estes, whenever he, the said M. V. Estes, shall wish to resign said trust, or shall die, leaving the same unfulfilled, or shall remove out of the limits of this state without an order from court, said trustee so appointed taking said trusteeship subject to the trust limited." The petition was filed August 28, 1891. It does not aver the age of the petitioners, except as to one of them, whom it states to be a minor suing by her next friend. It was alleged that at the time of their father's death, on December 6, 1872, they were all minors. To this petition the defendants demurred upon the grounds: (1) The petition and exhibits attached showed that the fee to the land was conveyed to Van Estes, trustee, and that such fee was conveyed to defendants, and is now in them. (2) Plaintiffs' mother having a life estate in the land, and it being stated in the petition that she is still in life, plaintiffs have no right of action. (3) If petitioners ever had any right of action, it accrued more than three years before the filing of the petition, and the same is barred by the statute of limitations. This demurrer was sustained, and plaintiffs excepted.

W. L. Marler, for plaintiffs in error. W. I. Pike and F. A. Quillian, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, O. J. The contents of the deed on which this case depends are, so far as material, set out in the official report, and the words creating a power of sale are substantially recited in the headnote. It is of no consequence whether the trustee, as such, was invested with the legal title to the estate in remainder, beyond what is involved in a power to sell and convey in his own name, or whether the remainder in behalf of children was vested or contingent. It is clear that a power of sale was created, to be exercised by the trustee, or not exercised by him, at the election of Mrs. Headen, the tenant for life. She could only evidence her election for a sale by writing under her hand, but when this was done the power of sale was complete in the trustee, whether he had any title or not, beyond what was necessary for executing this part of his trust. By the express terms of the deed, she could empower him to sell any part, or the whole, of said trust estate, and to reinvest the proceeds, by her written consent, "in such other property, subject to the above-described trusts, as he shall deem most for the interest of said trust estate." There can be no rational doubt that by the terms "said trust estate," as an object of sale, the maker of the deed intended and understood the land itself, which the deed conveyed. Whatever may be the correct legal construction of the conveyance, with respect to the extent of the trust, it is quite certain he thought there was a trust for the children, as well as for their mother; for, in speaking by the deed of reinvestment, he says, "subject to the above-described trusts." He evidently thought there was more than one trust. To hold that he contemplated restricting the power of sale to the estate for life would attribute to him a technical narrowness utterly strange to his thoughts, and at complete variance with his real state of mind. He looked at the land as covered by a trust which could be contemplated as a double trust,—one for his wife, and one for his children,—and he applied the word "estate" to the land itself,—the thing that was the subject-matter of the trust, and might be, in whole or in part, the subject-matter of a sale. The power of sale was exercised in the lifetime of Mrs. Headen, and with her written consent, manifested both by signing the deed herself jointly with the trustee, and annexing to it or indorsing upon it a declaration of her assent and approval. To this declaration she subscribed her name. It may or may not be of importance to add that one of the children, at least, had not then arrived at majority; for one of them was a minor when the present suit was brought, and is represented in it by a next friend. Judgment affirmed.

DUTTON v. STATE.

HOMICIDE — PLEADING MISNOMER AFTER COMMENCEMENT OF TRIAL — REVIEW — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. It was too late to file a plea of misnomer as to the Christian name by which the accused was indicted, the plea not being offered upon arraignment of the accused, nor until after a plea of not guilty, and a trial on the same, up to the close of the evidence introduced by the state.

2. Several grounds of the motion for a new trial complaining that evidence was admitted over objection, but not stating what the objection was, these grounds of the motion are not sufficiently definite to be considered.

3. Although the evidence to connect the accused with the offense was wholly circumstantial, and in some degree conflicting, there was enough in support of the verdict to render it proper for the supreme court to acquiesce in the finding after its approval by the presiding judge, his approval being signified by his refusal to grant a new trial.

Error from superior court, Bartow county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

Will Dutton was convicted of murder, and, his motion for a new trial having been overruled, he brings error. Affirmed.

M. R. Stansell, for plaintiff in error. A. W. Fite, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The accused was indicted under the name of Will Dutton. On arraignment he pleaded not guilty. Upon this plea the trial proceeded until the state had submitted its evidence and closed, when the accused moved to file a special plea in abatement, setting up that his name was not Will, but John, Dutton. The court refused to allow this plea at that stage of the trial. Any one who seriously doubts the correctness of this ruling may readily solve his doubts by studying law.

2. Whether the court erred in admitting evidence over the objection made to its admission is so dependent upon the objection made that, unless the objection be disclosed to this court as it was to the trial court, it is impossible for this court to review the ruling intelligently. For this reason, the practice has been, and still is, to decline attempting any review in such instances. No good reason for departing from the practice in this particular case occurs to us, or has been suggested. All the complaints made in the motion for a new trial as to the admission of evidence are disposed of by these observations.

3. The fact of murder—murder most wicked and atrocious—was established at the trial beyond all possibility of question. The only problem for solution was, by whom was it committed? The evidence to connect the accused with the deed, and identify him as the perpetrator, was wholly circumstantial. In some respects it was conflicting, but, taken as a whole, while it leaves upon our minds some doubt and dissatisfaction, it was enough to support the verdict in so far as to render it proper, under the law, for this court to acquiesce in the finding; the same having been approved by the presiding judge, as conclusively appears by his refusal to grant a new trial. He was in the atmosphere of the trial, saw and heard the witnesses, heard the arguments of counsel, and was in a position to interpret and appreciate the evidence in all its shades of meaning better than we can do by merely reading and studying a written report of it. He had in his presence the living thing; we have but a dead image of it. We should be much more likely, in so close a case, to err by overruling his decision than by affirming it. The true spirit of the law requires us to do the latter. Judgment affirmed.

AUTHORITY OF HUSBAND—AGENT OF WIFE—TRUSTS.

A husband, when acting as agent for his wife, has no authority, merely by virtue of his appointment as agent, whether the agency be general or special, to receive in payment of a debt due to her real estate, and take the conveyance to himself individually, instead of to his wife; nor is the wife's debtor justified in accepting the bare word of the husband that his wife has authorized him so to do. Unless she has in fact given such authority, a conveyance by the debtor to the husband will constitute the husband a trustee for the debtor to hold or dispose of the title, but will neither discharge the debt nor constitute him a trustee for the creditor, unless the latter, with a knowledge of the facts, shall ratify the transaction. The court erred in not granting a new trial.

T. H. Whitaker and Longley & Longley, for plaintiff in error. P. H. Brewster, D. J. Gaffney, J. H. Pitman, and R. A. S. Freeman, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. These ladies, Mrs. Roberts and Mrs. Williams, dealt with each other chiefly through their husbands, respectively, as their agents. The result was that the distinction between principal and agent was sometimes lost sight of. There seems to be in husbands a strong propensity when dealing for their wives to take part as principals in the transaction, and the record now before us furnishes evidence that these husbands had that propensity, and wrought some mischief by it. Some of the controlling facts are beyond dispute. As the outcome of dealings with respect to the West Point property, Mrs. Williams put herself under obligation to convey that property to Mrs. Roberts upon the payment of a certain sum of money. The verdict in this case finds and directs that that conveyance be made, but there is no evidence that the money was ever paid. The transaction relied upon as payment was the conveyance by Mrs. Roberts to Williams, the husband of Mrs. Williams, of certain lands situate in Alabama. It is contended that the contract on which that conveyance was founded was made by Roberts as the agent of Mrs. Roberts with Williams as the agent of Mrs. Williams, and was to the effect that the conveyance should be a satisfaction of the debt owing from Mrs. Roberts to Mrs. Williams for the West Point property; either a satisfaction in and of itself, or as furnishing means whereby Williams through a sale of the land was to raise money to be paid to Mrs. Williams in satisfaction. But there is no evidence that Mrs. Williams ever authorized or ratified this transaction, except the declarations of Williams himself; and certainly these were not sufficient. The mere word of an agent cannot be accepted as evidence of authority to vest title in him as a payment, or as furnishing means of payment to his principal. Parties dealing with an agent must verify at their peril his authority to use his principal's assets for the purpose of acquiring title to property in his own name. If, in fact, he has no such authority, and therefore cannot hold the title for his own benefit, the trust which results is not one in behalf of his principal, unless the principal chooses to ratify, but is a trust in behalf of the maker of the conveyance. Under the most favorable view of the evidence in this case, Williams did not hold title to the Alabama lands for Mrs. Williams, but held either for himself on his individual purchase or for Mrs. Roberts if he made no purchase for himself. This is a necessary conclusion from the evidence, and the law applicable to it. Consequently the verdict of the jury is undoubtedly wrong, and the court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

WILSON v. WRIGHT.

MORTGAGE BY BENEFICIARY UNDER TRUST—RIGHT OF MORTGAGEE.

Land being in 1878 conveyed to a trustee in trust for the use, benefit, and advantage of a named woman and her children, and she having afterwards mortgaged the same to procure necessary supplies to carry on farming operations upon the premises, her interest in the land is subject to levy and sale under a judgment foreclosing the mortgage, as against a claim interposed by the trustee. If, by reason of the fund which paid for the land having been derived from assets disposed of by will, made prior to March, 1866, and covered by a trust which the will created, the interest of the woman consisted of an estate in her for life, with remainder to her children, according to the laws of distribution in Georgia, this life estate would be the interest subject to levy and sale under the mortgage fi. fa. The debt to secure which the mortgage was executed was a joint debt, contracted by the woman and her children, or some of them. This being so, it was her debt which the mortgage secured; and, even if she were a married woman, there being no restraint upon her power in the settlement, she would be competent to incumber her interest in the property so as to subject it, equitably at least, to the payment of the debt. In the present case there was equitable pleading on which equitable principles could be applied in molding the judgment.

Error from superior court, Greene county; H. McWhorter, Judge.

Action by John W. Wright against Julia A. Jackson and others for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Plaintiff had judgment, and to the property levied on in execution thereof J. P. Wilson interposed a claim as trustee for defendant Jackson and others. From a judgment adverse to the claim, claimant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

An execution issued upon the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by Julia A. Jackson et al. was levied on the life interest of Julia A. Jackson, and the remainder interests of the other defendants in execution, in certain land, and a claim was interposed by Wilson, as trustee for Julia A. Jackson and her children. The case having been submitted to the judge without a jury, he found that the life estate of Julia A. Jackson was subject to the execution, and ordered that it proceed to the extent of her life estate. To this ruling the claimant excepted. The land levied upon was purchased with funds arising under the will and codicils of Irby Hudson, the father of Julia A. Jackson. The other defendants are her children, and were 21 years of age when the mortgage was executed.

She has also several minor children. The claimant, trustee for her and her children, refused to sign the mortgage when the plaintiff asked him to do so, which was prior to furnishing the supplies for which the mortgage debt was created. The defendants other than Julia A. Jackson are married, and have children, save one. The consideration of the mortgage debt was supplies furnished by the plaintiff to the defendants in execution, who were the beneficiaries in the trust estate, for the use and benefit of that estate; the supplies being necessary to enable said beneficiaries, who were living on and cultivating the land levied on, to carry on a farm. If some other than the beneficiaries had not furnished such supplies, the farming operations could not have been conducted, and the beneficiaries could have realized no income or benefit from the estate. The claimant introduced a deed dated and recorded January 23, 1878, conveying the land levied upon to the trustee of Julia A. Jackson and her children "for the use, benefit, and advantage of the said Julia A. Jackson and her children, and at the decease of the said Julia A. Jackson to such child or children, or the representatives of child or children, as she may leave in life, * * * free from the debts, liabilities, and obligations of present or any future husband of said Julia A. Jackson." Also in evidence was the following codicil, executed before March, 1866, to the will of Irby Hudson: "I, Irby Hudson, being still of sound mind, and by way of codicil, wish to change the 3d and 4th items of my foregoing will, dated 6th September, 1863, so far only as to direct that the share given to my wife for life, and at her death to our children, be revoked, and that the same be left to her during life, to be disposed of by her at her death by will or otherwise; and I hereby now nominate and appoint her executor of my will and this codicil, and give to her as trustee and in trust the whole of my estate after the share to her is deducted, to and for the following use and trust, and so far as to alter the 3d item of my will, and revoke the bequest to our children, that she hold the same to their sole and separate use, free and exempt from the control of any husbands they may have, or the liabilities of their husbands during life, and at their death to their children, according to the laws of distribution in Georgia; and, in case of the marriage of my wife, then a competent trustee be appointed."

Columbus Heard, for plaintiff in error. H. T. Lewis and J. B. Park, Jr., for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. What the court found subject to sale under the mortgage fi. fa. against Mrs. Jackson was her life estate in the premises levied upon. These premises were purchased with funds arising from assets disposed of by the will of Irby Hudson, her deceased father. The terms of that will, so far as relevant, as well as the terms of the deed under which the trustee claims, are set forth in the official report. The two instruments are not necessarily inconsistent, for while the deed might be suggestive of a joint use in Mrs. Jackson and her children, and apparently adapted to the creation of a tenancy in common in the use during her life, the addition of the words, "and at the decease of the said Julia A. Jackson to such child or children, or the representatives of child or children, as she may leave in life," can be construed as indicating a purpose to conform the deed to the terms of the will so as to make the children's interest consist exclusively of a remainder, and leave the mother sole tenant for life, as the will provided. Be this as it may, as the fund which paid for the land now in question was a part of the trust estate created by the will, the will should govern as to the interest which the mother and children have respectively in the land. Tested thus, there can be no doubt that Mrs. Jackson has a clear life estate, and that the children have only a remainder. No reason exists under the law as it now stands in this state why Mrs. Jackson could not, with or without the consent and co-operation of the trustee, incumber her life estate in this property, at least equitably, by mortgaging the same to her own creditor. Whether a married woman or not, she has the right to mortgage her own property to secure her own debt; there being no restriction upon her power in the settlement. Under our claim laws an equitable title will suffice to support a claim, and such a title ought to suffice in like manner to defeat a claim. There can be no doubt that a woman who is the beneficiary of an estate is the equitable owner thereof, and with proper equitable pleading such estate as she has may be devoted to the payment of her just debts. In the present case there was such pleading, and equitable principles could be applied in molding the judgment thereon. The court committed no error. Judgment affirmed.

BRYAN v. SIMPSON.

LIABILITIES ON APPEAL BOND.

On the withdrawal of a claim in the superior court, the case having reached that court by an appeal from a justice's court, the claimant being the appellant, no judgment can be entered up on the appeal bond against the claimant and his surety, except for costs in the claim case. To include in the judgment the amount due on the execution which was levied upon the property claimed was erroneous.

peal to the superior court from a judgment for the execution creditor, claimant withdrew his claim. From a judgment on his appeal bond he brings error. Reversed.

Hoyl & Parks, for plaintiff in error.
Griggs & Laing, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, O. J. In a claim case, as well as in any other, the liability of the security on appeal is for the eventual condemnation money and costs. Code, § 3616. The eventual condemnation money is that, and only that, which is found by the verdict disposing of the appeal, or which becomes payable by some judgment of the court which can legally be entered up by the appellate court as a result of disposing of the appeal. In a claim case, whether the claim be withdrawn or tried, no judgment by the appellate court in favor of the plaintiff can possibly be rendered, except that the property levied upon is subject, and that the levy proceed, and that the plaintiff recover costs, unless damages for a frivolous appeal or for interposing the claim for delay, only, be awarded by the jury, in which case these damages can be embraced in the judgment. Here no damages were awarded, and the claim was withdrawn. Consequently, the appellate court could render no judgment whatever for money, either against the appellant or his security on the appeal bond, except for costs. Bryan, the claimant, did not owe any debt to the plaintiff in the mortgage execution. The debtors and mortgagors were G. C. & E. O. Melton. Why should Bryan pay their debt? It has never been heard of that, by interposing a claim to property levied upon under an execution, the claimant renders himself liable to pay the execution. The question which he proposes to litigate with the plaintiff is not his own liability for the debt, but his title to the property levied upon. He asserts that that property is not subject to sale under the execution. This was the question for trial in the justice's court, from which the appeal was taken. How could the question be changed in the superior court to one of personal liability of the claimant, and the security on his appeal bond to pay the whole debt, or any part of it? The court certainly erred in allowing judgment to be entered up declaring such a liability. Judgment reversed.

INJUNCTION—MANDAMUS—MISJOINDER.

The evidence adduced at the hearing not being briefed, and no attempt having been made to brief it, this court declines to scrutinize it minutely, immaterial matter being blended with the material. ANDREWS v. ATLANTA REAL-ESTATE CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

DEED—DESCRIPTION OF GRANTEES—SURPLUSAGE.

Where the vendees in a deed of conveyance, founded upon a valuable consideration paid by them, were described as trustees, no trust being declared and no beneficiary named, the word "trustees" is mere surplusage, and the vendees took the title for their own use, free from any trust whatsoever.

Action between the Atlanta Real-Estate Company and A. B. Andrews to construe a deed. From a judgment for the company, Andrews brings error. Affirmed.

N. J. & T. A. Hammond, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Hopkins & Sons, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, O. J. The deed to be construed purports on its face to have been made by Henry B. Plant and Margaret J. Plant, his wife, parties of the first part, in consideration of the sum of $102,625.70 to them in hand paid by William T. Walters, the same Henry B. Plant, and Benjamin F. Newcomer, trustees, parties of the second part. It purports to have been signed, sealed, and delivered by the two persons named as parties of the first part. The receipt of the consideration is acknowledged on the face of the deed. The property is conveyed to the persons mentioned as parties of the second part, the simple word "trustees" being added to their names, to have and to hold, unto them and their successors and assigns, to their only proper use, forever; and "the said parties of the first part, for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, the said tracts or parcels of land, with the appurtenances, unto them, the said parties of the second part, and their successors and assigns, against themselves, the said parties of the first part, and against all persons claiming under them, shall and will warrant and forever defend by virtue of these presents." There is no declaration of any trust, and no suggestion of any trust, except the bare use of the word "trustees" after the names of the parties of the second part, and the omission of any mention of their heirs, executors, and administrators, and in place thereof the use of the words "their successors and assigns." As Henry B. Plant, one of the vendors, is also named as a vendee, and is one of the declared usees, the question is whether there is an implied trust in favor of the other vendor, Mrs. Plant, or in favor of some unnamed person or persons. Code, § 2316, subd. 4, provides: "Where a trust is expressly created, but no uses are declared, or are ineffectually declared, or extend only to a part of the estate, or fall from any cause, a resulting trust is implied for the benefit of the grantor, or testator, or his heirs." Here no trust is expressly created. The premises are not conveyed in trust expressly, but the vendees are only described by the word "trustees." The conveyance is not even made to them as trustees. Besides, as Mrs. Plant, according to the face of the deed, has been paid for the conveyance, her husband both joining with his coveendees in paying the money and with her in receiving it, what ground is there for any conjecture that a trust for her benefit was intended, more especially as her husband was included amongst the declared usees of the deed, and she was not? We think the conveyance does not by its own terms fall within the third paragraph of the same section of the Code, that paragraph being in these words: "Where, from the nature of the transaction, it is manifest that it was the intention of the parties that the person taking the legal title should have no beneficial interest," trusts are implied. No transaction is brought in sight by this deed which indicates in the slightest degree an intention that the persons taking the legal title should have no beneficial interest. On the contrary, the transaction purports to be a sale for value to the vendees, and the deed itself declares expressly that the property is to be held for their use and the use of their successors and assigns. The word "successors" in this deed could well be construed as the equivalent of the word "heirs;" but it is not necessary to ascribe to it this meaning, for, as is well known, the use of the word "heirs" is wholly unnecessary in the conveyance of realty situate in this state, the statute declaring that, if a less estate is not expressed, any conveyance whatever passes an estate in fee simple. Code, § 2248. The result is that while we may conjecture from the use of the word "trustees," and the phraseology "their successors and assigns," that beneficiaries other than vendees themselves may possibly have been in contemplation,—for otherwise why the vendees were described as trustees is not easily accounted for without looking outside of the deed,—yet this bare possibility furnishes no legal ground for disregarding the use expressly declared in the deed, and for holding that the vendees were not the beneficiaries, and the sole beneficiaries, in whose behalf the conveyance was made. The better and safer construction is to hold that the word "trustees," wherever it occurs in the deed, is mere surplusage, and ought to be rejected in reading the conveyance and adjudicating on its legal effect. With this word rejected, there could be no doubt that the parties of the second part acquired the equitable, as well as the legal, title to the premises, as against any theory of implied trust. Having ascertained that no trust can be arrived at by mere construction of the deed itself, it remains to be considered whether any such result can be reached by means of the extrinsic facts brought to light in the record. Before the execution of the deed, the property conveyed belonged exclusively to Mr. Plant, Mrs. Plant having no proprietary interest in it whatever. His ownership was derived by purchase from a third person, and was not derived from or through his wife, by marriage or otherwise. This being so, it was wholly unnecessary for her to join with him in the conveyance, or to manifest her consent to it in any manner. It was not necessary even for the purpose of barring dower. Code, §§ 1763, 1764, subd. 5. As she had no title to the property, and no interest, legal or beneficial, in it, no question as to her capacity to deal with her husband without the sanction of the proper court arises. And certainly no trust in her behalf could arise by implication from the mere fact that she joined with her husband in executing the deed, whether the purchase money was in fact paid to both, as the deed recites, or not. The conceded facts in the record clearly show that no such trust could possibly have arisen out of the transaction, in behalf of her or of any one else. The property belonged to Mr. Plant, and to him alone. His associates, Walters and Newcomer, by some contract or arrangement with him became interested therein, and, all three desiring that a corporation thereafter to be created for their benefit should ultimately be invested with the title, this deed was made as the first step in the execution of the scheme. This accounts for the introduction of the word "trustees" in the deed, as descriptive of the parties of the second part. The vendees and the beneficiaries contemplated were thus the same natural persons, and consequently they were seised to their own use, as the deed declares. The contemplated corporation was only the formal means by which they expected to realize the use. Had the corporation never been formed, or, after its formation, had they declined to convey to it, there would have been no breach of trust unless they had induced other persons to become members of the corporation on the faith of this property as corporate assets, in which event the trust element would have been brought in, not by the deed itself, but by the use made of it in dealing with strangers. It may be added, finally, that according to the record the corporation was formed, and the title was conveyed to it, though not directly by Plant and his associates, but by Smith, to whom they made an intermediate conveyance, to enable him to pass title into the corporation. There can be no well-founded doubt that the corporation has an unclouded title, and can convey such to its own vendees. Judgment affirmed.

HART v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS AS TO CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.

Where the sole witness for the state is impeached, not only by evidence of bad character, and by contradictory statements with reference to the substance of his testimony, but by testimony tending to disprove the main fact on which guilt depends, the court should not charge the jury upon sustaining the witness by proof of good character, unless there is some evidence on which to base such a charge. In this particular case the error is cause for a new trial, as the jury may have understood that the court had reference to certain evidence tending to show that the witness was industrious and reliable as a work hand, and meant to treat this as evidence on which to base the charge.

Error from city court of Monroe; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

Orange Hart was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and, a motion for a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

The defendant was convicted of selling liquor in Monroe county. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he excepted. The first special ground of the motion is that the court erred in charging the jury in the language of section 3875 of the Code, there being no evidence to warrant such a charge, and the court not explaining what was meant by proof of general good character. According to the brief of evidence, the only witness for the state was Charley Waller, who testified that on the first Sunday in May, 1892, at a church near Montpelier Springs, in Monroe county, he saw the defendant sell Bob Davis 10 cents' worth of rye whisky, for which he saw Bob pay him 10 cents. Knew it was rye whisky because he (witness) drank some of it. Several witnesses were introduced by the defendant to impeach Waller, and they gave testimony tending to prove contradictory statements made by Waller. One of them testified that his general character was bad, and from a knowledge of it the witness would not believe him on oath, though as a work hand the witness had found him satisfactory. Another testified that he was a very good hand, but his morals were bad, and from a knowledge of his character the witness would not believe him on oath if he swore on any question alone. Never knew him on the stand to swear to a lie. As a work hand he was very good and reliable, but his moral character was very bad. Would not swear that he would not believe him on oath. The indictment charged that the defendant, "not being a practicing physician, did then and there sell a quantity of spirituous and intoxicating liquor, the same not being domestic wine." etc. The court charged the jury that if they believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, in Monroe county, at any time within two years prior to the finding of the indictment, did sell, directly or indirectly, any quantity of alcoholic, spirituous, or malt liquors or intoxicating biters, this would be a violation of the local prohibition law of that county, and the jury would be authorized to convict him. This instruction is assigned as erroneous, because the indictment charged the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquor only. The motion also alleges that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence, and that it was obtained on perjured testimony, as shown by an affidavit of Robert Davis, attached to the motion, stating that he never bought any whisky from the defendant on the first Sunday in May, 1892.

CRIMINAL LAW — NEW TRIAL — MISCONDUCT OF BAILIFF—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. That a bailiff attending upon the city court privately advised the accused to go to trial without counsel, and not to demand a jury, and expressed the opinion that he would not be convicted, is no cause for a new trial, the court having offered the accused to furnish him counsel, which offer was declined, and having fully informed him of all his legal rights.

2. The newly-discovered evidence was cumulative, of little probative value, and would not probably have produced a different result.

Error from city court, Monroe county; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

Bryant Vaughn was convicted of disturbing a congregation assembled for divine worship, and, a motion for new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

At the August term, 1890, of Monroe superior court, Bryant Vaughn was indicted for disturbing a congregation assembled for divine worship on July 10, 1890. The case was tried on April 25, 1893, in the city court of Monroe county. The evidence showed that the defendant disturbed the congregation assembled for divine worship at Brown's chap-

ed, in Monroe county, by standing about 30 or 40 yards from the church, with his coat and hat off, jumping up, cursing, and talking in a loud and boisterous manner, and acting as if he were intoxicated, attracting the attention of several inside of the church, who came out; this being on the day charged in the indictment. The defendant introduced a witness who testified that he was at Brown's chapel on the same day, and was with the defendant and Babe Keith, who had a difficulty at the spring. Witness did not think this could have been heard at church. Remained about the spring when they went towards church. Did not know what they did after leaving spring. They would have to go by the church to go to their homes. After conviction, the defendant moved for a new trial on the general grounds, because of newly-discovered testimony, and because he was induced by the misrepresentations of one Williamson, bailiff of the city court, to waive his right of trial by jury, and to go to trial without being represented by an attorney, and not to have witnesses present to sustain his defense. In support of this ground he brought forward a number of affidavits to the effect that the bailiff had represented to him and his friends that he knew defendant was not guilty; that he would be a witness for defendant; that he knew all about the charge; that defendant need not have any witnesses subpoenaed, and must not employ an attorney nor talk to one; that the bailiff was first cousin to the judge, who would do what he desired, etc.,—by which representations the defendant was misled and deceived. As to this ground the court makes the following statement: "When the defendant appeared in court for trial he was asked by the court if he was ready to go to trial, to which he responded, 'Yes.' He was then asked if he had a lawyer, to which he responded, 'No.' The court then told him, if he was not able to employ counsel, that he would appoint him counsel, to which he replied that he did not wish a lawyer, but preferred to go to trial without one. He was then asked if he wished a jury to try him. He replied, 'No;' that he wished to be tried by the court, and get through with it. Being asked again by the court if he was ready, he replied, 'Yes.' He was formally arraigned, and pleaded not guilty. He gave the solicitor general the name of the witness, and he was called and sworn with the state's witnesses. The trial was proceeded with regularly. The defendant, Bryant Vaughn, cross-examined the state's witnesses at length, and with such shrewdness as to impress the court with the fact that he realized his position, and was doing everything to make a good showing. He introduced his own witness, and examined him, great latitude being allowed him in the examination. The court does not believe that he could have possibly been misled, or that he labored under a misapprehension as regards the result of the trial. Every right was zealously guarded for him by the court, and fully explained to him." The newly-discovered evidence was to the effect that the only disturbance created by the defendant or by Keith was some trouble they had at a spring about 250 yards from the church, which could not have been heard at the church, and that one of the witnesses for the state, who testified that he saw the disturbance near the church, was not present.

CRIMINAL LAW—PLEADING GUILTY ON ADVICE OF BAILIFF.

The fact that a bailiff of the city court privately advised the accused to enter a plea of guilty, and that he acted upon this advice, is no ground for a new trial, it appearing that the court fully explained to the accused his legal rights, and that he deliberately entered the plea of guilty under circumstances that would charge him with knowledge of its consequences.

Error from city court, Monroe county; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

Babe Keith was convicted of disturbing a congregation assembled for religious worship, and a new trial was denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Babe Keith was indicted at the same time, and for the like offense with that for which Bryant Vaughn was indicted, both indictments referring to the same time and place where the alleged offense was committed. (18 S. E. 550.) The court certified that Keith was present in the court room during the entire trial of Vaughn, and was familiar with the result of Vaughn's trial before he was tried. He was offered counsel by the court, and refused to allow counsel to be appointed for him, or to employ any himself, saying he would represent himself. He waived jury, and said he wanted the thing over, and wished the judge to try him at once. He was formally arraigned, and, when asked if he was guilty or not guilty, said, "I am guilty of a part of it." The court had the indictment read over again for him, explained to him fully its meaning, and told him he must either plead guilty or not guilty, or, if he preferred to remain silent and not reply at all, the court would have a plea of not guilty entered, and go ahead and try him. He then said he would plead guilty. There could have been no misunderstanding; everything was explained to him. He was given a similar sentence to that of Vaughn,—$25 fine, or eight months in the chain gang. He moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and because the plea of guilty was made under a misapprehension of the facts, he having been misled by Williamson, the bailiff of the court, by whom he was deceived into believing that if he entered the plea he would be discharged without punishment; also, because the judgment is contrary to law, for the reason that he did not intend to plead guilty to the offense with which he was charged, but only that he was guilty of having a disturbance at the spring about 300 yards from the church. He made similar allegations as to the misconduct of the bailiff, and referred to the same affidavits in support thereof, as were made in the Vaughn Case.

HOMICIDE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Clear and undoubted evidence of the corpus delicti will serve to corroborate a confession made by the accused, and his confession thus supported will serve as sufficient corroboration of the evidence of an accomplice.

2. The evidence warranted the verdict, and the newly-discovered evidence would not be likely to change the result. There was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Henry county; C. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Jim Schaefer was convicted of murder, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Jim Schaefer and Ben Bivins were indicted for the murder of Adam C. Sloan. Schaefer was convicted, with a recommendation to life imprisonment. A new trial was moved for, and refused, and the defendant excepted. The grounds of the motion are that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence, and on account of newly-discovered evidence tending to show that one Tomlinson did the killing. The evidence was voluminous and conflicting. Bivins gave testimony to the effect that he and Schaefer made a plot, and went at night, together with Henry Harrison, to Sloan's residence, for the purpose of burglary; that, on arriving at the premises, Bivins refused to go in, and Schaefer went alone; that Bivins saw Schaefer endeavoring to enter through a window, and walked away from the house a little distance, where he waited until, in a few moments, he heard the firing of a pistol, and ran off. It appeared that Bivins had on previous occasions sworn falsely about the matter, if his testimony at this trial was true. Other evidence tends to show that the house was actually entered through the window, and that Sloan was shot while asleep by the burglar, who made his escape unseen. There was some testimony, of a contradictory nature, tending to show admissions by Schaefer that he had done the killing, and numerous circumstances appeared to support this theory. The only ground for new trial, besides the general grounds, is based on newly-discovered evidence, in brief, as follows: Bivins was tried and convicted, and, while a motion for a new trial in his behalf was pending, he told his counsel, in a consultation relating to a prosecution of this motion, that he knew Jim Schaefer had nothing to do with the shooting, but that he saw Ras. Tomlinson do the shooting. After this consultation, his counsel dismissed the motion. On the night before the killing, Ras. Tomlinson was seen in the town where Sloan resided, and seemed to be rather shy. In the month before the murder, he was heard to say that Sloan, calling him a vile name, was the cause of his serving out two terms in the chain gang and that he intended to kill Sloan. In support of this ground appeared, also, affidavits to the effect that certain tracks, appearing to have been found leading from Sloan's premises, in the direction in which Schaefer probably went, might as well have been made by Tomlinson, in going towards the house of some of his relatives.

Will Stanley, having been convicted of murder, and a new trial denied, brings error. Affirmed.

The defendant was convicted of murder. He moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and "because the court erred in failing to give in charge to the jury the law touching voluntary manslaughter, and in failing to instruct the jury at all upon this grade of homicide." The motion was overruled, and exception was taken. The evidence was in conflict. That in behalf of the state made a strong case of murder, while a number of witnesses introduced by the defense gave testimony tending to prove an accidental shooting. According to the defendant's statement, also, the shooting was unintentional.

ADAMS v. STATE.

PERJURY—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—TAKING EXHIBITS TO JURY ROOM.

1. On a trial for perjury, a witness for the state, after reciting what the accused testified when the alleged perjury was committed, may say that it was false, at the same time stating facts which conclusively show that it was false.

2. Unless it appears from the motion for a new trial or the bill of exceptions what the evidence was which was admitted, or what the fact was which was proposed to be proved, the admission of the one, or the rejection of the other, is no cause for a new trial.

3. There was no error in allowing the articles of clothing to which the testimony related to go in evidence, and afterwards to be delivered by the sheriff to the jury with the caution not to lose them. Nor was it error to allow evidence that the pants had been cut off after they were stolen.

4. The evidence warranted the verdict, and the motion for a new trial was properly overruled.

Error from superior court, Whitfield county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

Cy Adams, having been convicted of perjury, and a new trial denied, brings error. Affirmed.

Following is the official report:

The defendant was convicted of perjury, and excepted to the refusal of a new trial. The indictment is not a part of the transcript of record sent to this court, and hence it does not appear otherwise than from the brief of evidence what the defendant was charged to have sworn falsely. There is testimony to the effect that he was sworn as a witness for the defense at the trial of Napoleon Moss, who was charged with burglary of the house house of one Smith, and with stealing therefrom a pair of pantaloons belonging to Smith; that the defendant was sworn, and testified on that trial that he found the pantaloons, among other clothing, in a valise, three or four years previously, and gave them to Savannah Moss, the mother of Napoleon Moss. In addition to the general grounds, the motion for new trial alleges that the court erred in permitting Smith and his wife to testify that when the defendant swore on the trial of Moss that he, defendant, found the pants in Florida, four or five years before, and gave them to Savannah Moss, he swore what was not true. Objection was made to this testimony on the ground that it was a conclusion of the witness' mind, and that it was for the jury to say whether the defendant had sworn falsely. Another ground is that the court, over defendant's objection, permitted his witness S. P. Maddox to testify on cross-examination what Savannah Moss testified on the trial of Napoleon Moss, where the defendant is accused of having committed perjury; the objection being that this testimony was not admissible to affect the rights of defendant. This ground does not state what testimony given by Maddox was objected to. Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to permit Hamp Moss, the husband of Savannah Moss, and father-in-law of the defendant, to testify what the defendant said to Savannah Moss when he gave her the satchel or valise containing the clothes. It is insisted that this evidence was part of the res gestae of that transaction, and explained where he got the clothes, and was part of his testimony on the trial of Napoleon Moss. It is further assigned as error that the court permitted the state's witness to testify, over the objection of defendant, that the pantaloons had been cut off at the bottom; the objection being that this was not material. The court admitted the testimony on the question of identification of the pantaloons. It appears that a pair of pantaloons were identified by several witnesses in the presence of the jury as the pantaloons which were stolen from Smith's house, and which the defendant, on the trial of Moss, had sworn he gave to Savannah Moss. The last ground of the motion for a new trial alleges that the pantaloons were handed by the sheriff to the jury after they retired, with direction to take them, and be sure not to lose them. It is insisted that the court erred in allowing them to go to the jury as evidence, and that their being carried by the sheriff to the jury room after the jury had retired may have had an influence on the jury unfavorable to the defendant.

HOOD v. STATE.

HOMICIDE—CONTINUANCE—EVIDENCE—SENTENCE AS GROUND FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Inasmuch as it did not clearly appear by the showing for a continuance that more than one of the absent witnesses resided out of the county, and what that witness would testify being fully admitted by the state, there was no error, under sections 3847, 3848, of the Code, in denying a continuance.

2. There being no evidence that the deceased sent any message by his brother to the accused, requesting the accused to meet him (the deceased) at a certain bridge, the fact of the oral delivery of what purported to be such a message was immaterial, and the exclusion of evidence on that subject is not cause for a new trial.

3. The exclusion of what was said by the prisoner's child on reaching a neighboring house, whither she had been sent by her father, cannot be held erroneous, it not appearing what the child's declarations were. If they were a part of the res gestae at all, it would be on the ground that they were explanatory of some relevant act, and whether they had this character or not is unknown.

4. The sentence of the court, with reference to the term of punishment, cannot be looked to as a ground for a new trial.

5. In view of the presumption of law that a voluntary homicide by the use of a deadly weapon is felonious unless shown to be justifiable, the evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Fayette county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Dan Hood was convicted of manslaughter, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Code, § 3847, provides that, on application of defendant in a criminal case, subpoenas shall be issued to obtain the attendance of witnesses in his behalf. Section 3848 provides that "no party failing to use the means provided in the preceding section, when within his power, shall be entitled to a continuance because said witnesses are not in attendance at the term of court when his case is called for trial, if he is prosecuted for the same criminal act."

The following is the official report:

Dan Hood was indicted for the murder of Charles R. Watts, and was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was made, and was overruled. In addition to the grounds that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence, the motion complains that the court erred in refusing to continue the case on the showing made by the defendant. It appears from the record that the killing occurred in December, 1892. The indictment was found at the March term, 1893, of Fayette superior court. The case was called for trial about 10 o'clock on March 23d, and the defendant moved that the case be continued on account of the absence of various witnesses, stating what he expected to prove by them; that they lived in Fayette and Coweta counties; that he did not make the motion for the purpose of delay, but to get these witnesses to testify in his behalf, and expected to get them at the next term of court; and that he had had no time to consult with his lawyers as to line of his defense since they were appointed, and could not go safely to trial without further preparation. He further stated that when he was first arrested he employed Mr. Clark, an attorney of Newnan, to defend him, and depended on him to have his witnesses subpoenaed; that Clark left, and defendant did not know where he went to; that he then tried to get other attorneys, who would do nothing until he could get their fee fixed, which he could not do; that he made other efforts to get his witnesses summoned, etc. His counsel stated that they had just been appointed to defend him; had had only a few minutes to confer with him; had not seen his witnesses, nor had time to talk to him about his case; and were wholly unprepared to go to trial, and give him justice in his defense, on so short notice. At this juncture the court ordered the sheriff to get subpoenas for the witnesses, and serve them, and remarked that the case would be passed until the next morning. On March 24th the case was again called at 10 o'clock, and the defendant's counsel asked to amend their motion for continuance. The defendant was sworn, and gave the names of other absent witnesses whom he expected to get by the next term of court,—among them, Henry and Ellen Page and John Morrow. He stated that Henry Page lived on Hunnicutt's place, in Fayette county. "They tell me he lives in Carrollton. Expect to prove by him that he was next to the first man that came to my house after this took place; that he saw Mr. Watts lying there, and pistol with him, and the pistol was lying by his side. Ellen Page is wife of Henry Page. Expect to prove by her that she heard the three shots made; that there was two shots made right together, and then, in about twenty-five or thirty minutes, the last was made; that she was about 500 yards from the place. * * * The Pages and Mr. Morrow, Gale's brother, live in Coweta county. Why I did not give these names yesterday, was, I could not remember them. After I went back to jail, I went to where I put the names. I gave these names to Mr. Gollightly, lawyer, yesterday, before twelve o'clock. He came over to jail after I went back, and got the names. * * * Mr. Morrow lives at Mr. Pat Carmichael's place, just about a mile from where Mr. Watts lived, in Coweta county. * * * Mr. Martin and Jerry Morgan, last of my account, lived in Coweta county. After I went to Fulton jail, do not know whether they moved or not. Henry Page and Ellen Page live in Carroll county. Henry Page saw the pistol. * * * Expect to prove by Ellen Page and Milly Reaves that they heard the reports from three shots, and that they were about 500 yards from me. I expect to prove by Henry Page, Ellen Page, Milly Reaves, Mattie Martin, and Jane Bailey that they heard the three shots. * * * I suppose all here will testify to the same, to wit, Jane Bailey, Jane Reed, Tillman Sims, and Joe's wife, if she is here." The defendant also swore: "Dick Bridges lives in Senola. Expect to prove by him that he heard these parties, at Mr. Watts' gin house, making up their plans to come and kill me. * * * No other witness here that I can prove the same thing by that I can prove by Dick Bridges. Henry Page was the first man that got to Mr. Watts, and no other witness here that I can prove by that there was a pistol by Mr. Watts. * * * What reason I have to believe Dick Bridges will swear about the plot, I have reason to believe he will swear the truth about it. The day I left Senola to go to Fulton jail, he told me I had enemies talking about me."

It further appeared from the testimony of the sheriff and of the prisoner's counsel that on the previous day the counsel had gone to the jail to talk with the defendant; asked him about his witnesses, and got the names of those just mentioned by the defendant; was let out of jail about 3 o'clock, and immediately gave the sheriff subpoenas for the witnesses, and asked him to have them brought. The court stated that, as he understood the showing, all the witnesses called on the previous day were present, except Morgan and Morrow; that by Morrow the defendant desired to prove that a pistol was found by Watts after he was killed, and, by Morgan, that Watts told him his brother wanted to see him at the creek next morning, and he declined to go. The solicitor general stated that it was admitted that the pistol was found, and was Charles Watts' pistol. Two grounds of the motion alleged that the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to prove by Jerry Morgan and two others that on Sunday before the killing of Watts, on Monday, they were at the house of defendant, and that Bud Watts went there, and told defendant that deceased had sent him to tell defendant to meet deceased and Bud Watts the next day at the creek; that they would have some whisky; that defendant told Watts he would go, or send his boy, and Watts remarked, not to send the boy; he wanted defendant to go in person. The defendant first offered to prove this by Reed, a witness for the state, on cross-examination, and before the state rested its case. The court held that the defendant could not make such proof, unless it could first be shown that Bud Watts was the agent of the deceased, and refused to allow the defendant to ask Reed such questions. Reed was not put upon the stand again, nor was he offered by the defense, nor did the court, at any time after this, mention to defendant that he could make such proof by Reed, although the court did afterwards, and while the defendant was offering his proof, change the ruling, and allowed him to make proof of these facts by Perry Gay. The defendant also mentioned such a conversation in his statement. After the defendant closed, the state offered Bud Watts in rebuttal, and he denied any such conversation, this being the first denial offered by the state. After the state had again closed, the defendant offered in surrebuttal John Morrow and others for the purpose of proving that such a conversation occurred on Sunday, and that Bud Watts did tell the defendant to meet him and Charles Watts at the creek the next day. The court held that such testimony was not then admissible, which ruling is assigned as error. While Jane Morgan was on the stand, she testified that the defendant's little girl came to the house of Joe Reed, running and crying, and that Joe Reed's house was in hollowing distance of the defendant's. His counsel proposed to ask her what the child said when she first reached the house of Joe Reed. The court held that she could state that the child told Reed that defendant sent for him, but that any other words spoken by the child at the time were inadmissible. This ruling is assigned as error. It is further alleged as a ground for a new trial that the sentence imposed by the court was cruel and unusual, the same being imprisonment in the penitentiary for 20 years.

Error from city court of Savannah; A. H. MacDonell, Judge.

A. M. McGarr having been convicted of being a common cheat and swindler, and a new trial denied, brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

McGarr was found guilty of being a common cheat and swindler, and his motion for a new trial was overruled. The indictment charges that by falsely and fraudulently representing to George Derst that a check purporting to be signed by W. J. Gibbons for $51.60, drawn on the National Bank of Savannah, and dated about May 6, 1893, was good and would be paid when presented to the bank, the defendant obtained from Derst the sum of $5, and did thereby defraud and cheat Derst out of that amount. The case was tried on accusation in the city court of Savannah. The motion for new trial contains the following grounds: "(1) The admission, over the defendant's objection, of secondary evidence as to an alleged fraudulent check, without showing that the same was lost, destroyed, or, if in the hands of the defendant, that notice had been served on him to produce it. (2) The admission, over the defendant's objection, of the evidence of one Snelson as to a certain check, not produced, but seen by him some time in the spring, in the possession of the defendant, the witness not remembering the date of its presentation to him, the date of the check, the initials of the drawer, or the bank on which it was drawn. (3) That the defendant was practically charged and convicted of forgery in a court having no jurisdiction of felonies. (4) Variance between the allegations and the proof, for that the accusation charges that the defendant did defraud and cheat Derst out of $5, (five dollars,) whereas Derst testified, and the defendant showed by Derst's receipt, that at the time of his arrest he owed Derst but $2.25, (two dollars and twenty-five cents.) (5) That the verdict was contrary to law, contrary to the evidence, and wholly unsupported by it, the state having utterly failed to show any intent to defraud, or to establish the identity of the alleged fraudulent paper on which the accusation is founded." George Derst testified that he was a storekeeper, and at one time McGarr was in the habit of trading with him. In May, 1893, McGarr came to his store with a check for $51.60 on the National Bank of Savannah, signed by one Gibbons. Derst did not remember the initials of Gibbons or the date of the check. McGarr desired Derst to cash it, stating it was after banking hours, and that he needed the money. Derst refused to cash the check. McGarr then requested him to advance $25 on it, which was refused; but finally he let McGarr have $5.25 on it, McGarr to indorse the check, and leave it with him for collection. McGarr told him the check was perfectly good, and would be paid. This was Saturday afternoon, after banking hours. On Monday Derst went to the bank to cash the check, and was refused payment. He went to see McGarr, who told him there must be some mistake about it, and agreed to go to the bank with him to look into it. They drove to the bank, and at the door Derst handed McGarr the check for presentment. He presented it, and payment was refused, they being informed that Gibbons had no account there. They went out, McGarr retaining possession of the check, and saying there must be some mistake; that he would go over and see Mr. Stovall, who he knew did have money in the bank, and that he would make it all right. The two started off in Derst's road cart, and had not gone far before Derst remembered there was a party he had to see. He got out, and told McGarr to stay there, and hold the horse until his return. He returned in a few minutes, but McGarr had gone, and carried the check with him. Afterwards finding him, Derst told him he did not want to have any more fooling, and that he must have his money. McGarr told him it would be all right, and referred him to Gibbons, a railroad contractor for whom he said he had worked, and who had drawn the check. McGarr then left, and Derst drove out to see Gibbons, who told him that McGarr had worked for him, but was not then employed by him, and that he had given him no check on any bank. Derst did not see McGarr for several days afterwards. When he did see him pass on the other side of the street he followed him, driving the road cart, but McGarr saw him, and eluded him by turning into a narrow lane into which he could not go with the cart. Derst went several times to find him at a house where he was staying, but without success. Finally he came up with him one day in the street, and told him that this thing had gone far enough, and he wanted his money. McGarr again assured him it would be all right; upon which he let him go. Several days after this McGarr came to his store, and paid him three dollars on the amount due, with which he was pretty well satisfied, as he thought he had done well to get anything; did not consider this a settlement of the crime. W. G. Gibbons testified that he was a railroad contractor, and the defendant had worked for him as foreman of his hands. He never had any money in the National Bank of Savannah, and never paid McGarr off in a check on that or any bank. He did not owe McGarr anything, nor have any money in trust or keeping for him. Morgan testified that he was county detective, and arrested McGarr after a chase. When he caught up with him he showed some signs of resistance, but surrendered on Morgan's drawing his pistol on him, saying that if he had his "thirty-eight" along he would not have been taken so easily. Morgan searched him, and took from him two papers in the form of bank checks,—one dated December 27, 1892, for $25, payable to the order of John W. Crolley, and drawn on the National Bank of Savannah by D. P. Riggins & Co.; the other dated April 17, 1893, for $41, payable to A. M. McGarr or bearer, and drawn on the Savannah Savings Bank by W. G. Gibbons. Snelson testified that he was a colored doctor; that McGarr had approached him some time in the spring, and requested him to cash a check, which he refused to do; that the check was drawn by one Gibbons, but that he did not remember his initials, the date of the check, or the bank on which it was drawn, though he believed it was on the National Bank of Savannah. The prisoner stated that he got the money from Derst as a loan, and intended to pay him back, but was not able to do so; that to secure the loan he left with Derst a check which was not on Gibbons, but on W. G. Riggins, another contractor for whom he had worked; that he did refer Derst to Gibbons, because he was a stranger and had worked for Gibbons, not referring to Gibbons as the man who gave him the check, but that Derst might find out who he was; that he tried to avoid Derst because he had no money to pay him, and as soon as he was able he went and paid Derst $3 of the $5.25 due, for which he held his receipt; that he did not know Morgan, and when Morgan arrested him he was in citizen's clothes, and did not at first say who he was, hence his attempt at "resentment;" but when the officer drew his pistol, and informed him who he was, he offered no further resistance.

DEAN v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

1. Where there is no affidavit by the accused or his counsel that the alleged newly-discovered evidence was unknown at the time of the trial, a new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence.

2. The evidence warranted the verdict. There was no error in any of the rulings or charges of the court complained of, nor in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county;
O. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Jim Dean was found guilty of burglary, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The defendant was convicted of burglary, and excepted to the refusal of a new trial. The motion for new trial contains the general grounds, and sets up newly-discovered testimony as contained in an affidavit of Fannie Hill. There was no evidence for the defendant at the trial. From the cross-examination of the state's witnesses, and from the defendant's statement to the jury, it appears that the theory of the defense was that Henry Calhoun, and not the defendant, was the burglar. This was contradicted by the testimony of Calhoun and his mother. The evidence further disclosed that the burglary was committed in a hardware store, and that the articles stolen were knives, etc., some of which were recovered from the defendant and others, to whom he had delivered them, and some were never recovered. The affidavit of Fannie Hill is to the effect that she saw Henry Calhoun's mother in possession of certain new knives and forks about two or three months after the burglary, which she gave to a colored man, who took them away, this man having just remarked that she would get herself into trouble if she did not quit having negroes around her; that two days afterwards she whipped her son Henry, took from him a new pocketknife, and concealed it in her own pocket; and that the affiant did not communicate this information to defendant or his counsel, because she was not asked about it, had no connection with the case, and did not know until after the trial that the defendant had been arrested or charged with burglary. No other affidavit accompanies this ground. Henry Calhoun was introduced as a witness in rebuttal of the defendant's statement. On cross-examination he testified: "I have never been to the chain gang. I was found guilty of stealing chickens in the city court, but was paid out." This testimony was admitted without objection at the time it was given. Afterwards the solicitor general moved to rule it out, on the ground that there was higher evidence of the trial and conviction of the witness. The court asked counsel for the defendant what he had to say to that. He replied that he had no objection, as he would send and get the record. It is now insisted that the court erred in ruling out the evidence, as the defendant was entitled to the benefit of the impeachment of the witness, brought about by his own statement of his conviction. The court charged: "If the house was closed with blind shutters, and fastened or closed, and they were prized open, and the window raised out of its place, that would be such a breaking as the law would denominate a breaking in the case of burglary." It is said that under this charge the jury could have found the defendant guilty of burglary, although he did not enter the house, the effect of the charge being that prizing open the blind shutter, and raising the window, would amount to burglary. The court charged: "Possession of stolen goods, in case of burglary, recently thereafter, goods that were stolen at the time of the burglary committed, with no explanation by the defendant, or no satisfactory explanation by the defendant how he came by them, with clear proof of a burglary having been committed, and clear identification of the goods, may authorize the jury to convict the defendant upon such possession of stolen goods."

If that evidence satisfies their minds beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt." It is contended that this was error, because the court gave the jury no legal standard for judging of recent possession; that the court stated a series of facts in an argumentative way, and following out the theory of the state, and then instructed the jury that these facts would authorize a conviction, whereas the court should have merely laid down the abstract rules of law governing this point, and left the jury to determine whether these facts constituted burglary. The court charged: "You see what he said about it when he was found in the possession of any property, if he said anything. See what he did with the property that was stolen at the time it was found in his possession, if any was stolen and found in his possession soon thereafter; what account he gave of it, if any." This is claimed to be erroneous, for the reason that the court did not instruct the jury as to the law of confessions, it being contended that the state sought to prove certain statements by the defendant at the time of his arrest, which statements he claims were in the nature of confessions. It does not appear from the brief of evidence that the defendant made any statement in the nature of a confession, or intended to make any. Policeman Jenkins testified: "When I arrested this boy, he didn't say anything about seeing Henry Calhoun in a hole with his feet up. He did not say anything about buying a dozen knives from him. He said he bought the knives he had from him. He said he had not sold any knives. We asked him about the knife he sold to Mose Green, and he said he hadn't sold any."

CRIMINAL LAW—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—TIME OF SETTLEMENT.

The act of September 7, 1891, "To provide for the more speedy determination of criminal cases," having made the practice in reference to bills of exceptions in cases of injunctions applicable to bills of exceptions in criminal cases, the latter must be signed and certified within 20 days from the date of the judgment complained of; and it having been repeatedly ruled by this court, in cases of injunction, that this provision of the law is imperative, and that no excuse will be heard for a failure to comply with the same, it follows that where a judgment refusing a new trial in a criminal case was rendered on the 2d day of August, and the bill of exceptions was not signed and certified until the 9th day of September thereafter, the writ of error must be dismissed, although the judge certifies that he was absent from the state from August 22d to September 7th, and that the bill of exceptions was presented to him immediately upon his return. *Gray v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 24, 1893.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—ILLEGAL SALES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—NEW TRIAL.

1. An allegation in an indictment that the offense charged was committed in the "714th district, Georgia militia," is sufficiently established by proof that the offense was committed in the "714th district, G. M." The initial letters "G. M." are commonly recognized and employed in this state as a proper abbreviation of "Georgia militia." Indeed, the act under which the indictment was found itself makes use of this identical abbreviation. Acts 1880-81, p. 591, § 1.

2. It was unnecessary, in order to justify a conviction, that the state should show that the accused did not come within the exception "that the provisions of this act shall not apply to any licensed physician in the regular practice of his profession, who may use liquors in making up his prescriptions, or compounding his medicines in cases of actual sickness." Proof of justification under this exception was a matter which properly devolved upon the accused, it being within his power to readily and easily establish the truth in this regard. Amos v. State, 34 Ga. 531.

3. Due diligence was not exercised to procure the evidence alleged to have been newly discovered.

Error from superior court, Carroll county: S. W. Harris, Judge.

Bob Hines was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Bob Hines was indicted for selling and furnishing malt and intoxicating liquor and intoxicating bitters in Carroll county on the 1st of August, 1892. He was tried on the 5th of December, 1892, and was found guilty. He moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and for newly-discovered evidence. The motion was overruled. At the trial, one Mitchell testified that about the first part of 1892, or the latter part of 1891, he went to the defendant's barber shop to be shaved. Asked defendant if he knew where witness could get any whisky. Defendant said there was some in Stewart's wagon yard; that a man from Alabama had some blockade there. Witness begged defendant to go and get him some whisky. Defendant consented, and witness gave him 20 or 25 cents. Defendant left, and in a short time returned with half a pint of whisky. He charged nothing for going. Witness did not pay or offer to pay him anything for going. This occurred in Carroll county. Ben Crider testified that on Sunday morning, about the latter part of September, 1892, he and others were in his room, and he saw defendant on the street. He told defendant to go and bring some liquor up there, and after a while defendant came in, set a bottle on the mantel, and went out. Witness did not pay defendant anything for the whisky, or for going after it, nor did he know of any one else paying him. He had no whisky in defendant's barber shop on the night before. Did not know whether any of the others who were in his room had or not. Recalled, Crider testified it was not true that, a few nights, or at any time, before the furnishing of this whisky by defendant to him and the others, he had left any whisky in defendant's shop. He did not know where defendant got the whisky from. One Stewart testified that he was a member of the grand jury at the October term when this indictment was found; that in the case of Bill Benson the defendant swore to the grand jury that he had never sold or furnished Mitchell or Crider any whisky, and that he had never carried or furnished them with whisky. The defendant stated that the whisky he got for Mitchell was some he bought for him in Stewart's wagon yard, from a man who had it in a jug covered up in a wagon, and who said he lived in Alabama. This man was soon afterwards arrested for selling whisky. Two witnesses gave testimony tending strongly to corroborate this part of defendant's statement. As to the whisky he carried to Crider, he stated that Crider had been in his shop a night or two before the time he was told by Crider to go and get him that liquor, and had left some there in a bottle, and that, when Crider told him to get him some liquor, he went to his shop, got the liquor Crider had left there, carried it to his room, set it on the mantel, and left immediately. Several other boys were in the room. The newly-discovered testimony was embraced in an affidavit of Crider that on Sunday morning, in September, 1892, from his room, he saw the defendant on the street, called him, and told him to go to Bill Benson's and get him a pint of liquor; and that he had talked to defendant's counsel prior to that time, but never told them of that fact. As to this testimony the defendant made affidavit that, when Crider was on the stand, defendant thought he was testifying about a different transaction from the one he testified to, which was when Crider, or some one in his room, called defendant to go to his shop and get some whisky left there the night before;

that he was not thinking of the time Crider told him to go to Benson's and get whisky, as he thought the arrangement about the whisky obtained from Benson for Crider had been made beforehand; that he had entirely forgotten this, and never thought of it until after his trial, when Crider reminded him of it. There was an affidavit by defendant's counsel that they had been diligent in the preparation of his case, and did not know of the fact embraced in Crider's affidavit until after the trial, and an affidavit by W. I. Cobb that Crider's character was good, and he would believe him on oath.

INJURY TO RAILROAD BRAKEMAN—LOW BRIDGE—SUFFICIENCY OF DECLARATION.

A declaration alleged that plaintiff's intestate was employed by defendant railroad company as freight brakeman; that it was his duty to obey signals given by the engineer, and that in so doing he was compelled to pass over the tops of the cars; that, on a dark and stormy night, the signal was given to apply the brakes in order to stop the train; that deceased responded to the call; that the brakes were defective, and would not stop the train as quickly as if in good condition, and that consequently the train ran under a low bridge, which deceased did not see on account of the darkness, and of his being busily engaged in his duties; and he was knocked down thereby, and killed; and that the accident was caused by the defective condition of said brakes, which it was defendant's duty to keep in good repair. Held, that the declaration stated a good cause of action. Lacy, J., dissenting. Clark's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 78 Va. 709, distinguished.

Error to circuit court, Alleghany county.

Beard's administrator sued the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company in an action of trespass on the case for negligently causing the death of his intestate. Defendant demurred to the declaration, and the court sustained the same, from which judgment the plaintiff brings this appeal. Reversed.

John L. Lee and B. T. Gordon, for plaintiff in error. R. L. Parrish and Wm. J. Robertson, for defendant in error.

FAUNTLEROY, J. The petition of John P. Beard, sheriff of Amherst county, and, as such, administrator of E. T. Beard, deceased, complains of a judgment of the circuit court of Alleghany county, entered at its August, 1891, term, in an action of trespass on the case therein pending, in which said petitioner is plaintiff and the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company is defendant. It appears from the record exhibited that the defendant company demurred to the declaration and to each of the four counts thereof, and that the court, by its judgment aforesaid, sustained the said demurrer, and dismissed the suit. The facts of the case, as they are alleged in the declaration and admitted by the demurrer, are substantially and materially as follows: E. T. Beard, the plaintiff's intestate, some time in the year 1889 was employed by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, and assigned to duty as a front brakeman on its freight trains passing through the county of Alleghany. One of the duties of the said Beard was to respond to and obey the signals given by the engineer of the locomotive propelling any freight train to which he might be assigned, and in so doing to pass over the tops of cars when in motion, in order to apply the brakes thereto attached whenever necessary to stop or check the speed of said train. At an early hour—3:35 A. M.—of the 26th day of February, 1890, it being then dark and cloudy and stormy, one of the defendant company's freight trains, upon which the said E. T. Beard, deceased, was employed as a brakeman, was approaching from the west a station upon the said company's railroad called Backbone, in Alleghany county, when the engineer in charge gave, in quick and rapid succession, certain alarm whistles, signals which implied and were a command to the deceased to apply the brakes to that part of the train to which he had been assigned, in order that the said train might be stopped and brought to a standstill as quickly as possible, when the deceased, responding to the signals so given him, proceeded to apply the brakes to his section of the train, and in doing so was obliged to pass, and did pass, over the tops of the cars from the front towards the rear end of the train. The brakes attached to sundry cars in his section of the train were in a worn, broken, and defective condition, and incapable, when applied, of stopping the train as surely and quickly as they would have done had they been in good and effective working order. Owing to the defective and inefficient condition of the said brakes, the train, instead of being stopped, was carried, despite the brakes, with great speed and force, under a low bridge spanning the railroad track, by collision with which the deceased, who was in the active and diligent discharge of his duty, obeying the signal and command to apply the brakes, was knocked from the top of the car on which he was so engaged, thrown to the track beneath, run over by the train, crushed, and killed. But for the worn, broken, and defective condition of the brakes aforesaid, the train, or that part of it on which the deceased was stationed, would have been stopped and brought to a standstill before reaching the bridge, and the plaintiff's intestate would not have been killed. His death was occasioned by the negligence of the defendant company in permitting the brakes on its cars aforesaid to become worn, broken, and inefficient, and in consequence of the said death the plaintiff was injured and damaged to the extent of $10,000.

The question presented for the determination of this court is whether the facts distinctly and pointedly set forth in the declaration (which is admittedly faultless in form) entitled the plaintiff to maintain his action. The gravamen of the action is the negligence of the defendant company, specifically charged in the declaration to consist in the nonperformance of a legal duty owing by the defendant company to the plaintiff's intestate, by commission or omission, and the injury resulting to the plaintiff's intestate by the defendant company's nonperformance of that duty. Patt. Ry. Acc. Law, 6, 7. It is averred in the declaration that there was a legal obligation resting upon the defendant company to provide and maintain safe, sound, and suitable brakes on the cars upon which Beard might be assigned to duty, and that it was in consideration of this obligation that the deceased went into the service of the defendant company; that the defendant company was guilty of negligence, and of the nonperformance of its legal and contract duty, in suffering the brakes attached to the cars of the train on which the deceased was employed on the night of his death to become and be in such a worn and broken condition as to be incapable of stopping the train as quickly as otherwise they would have done, and that the death of the said Beard, plaintiff's intestate, directly resulted from this negligence and nonperformance of duty on the defendant company's part. Every essential fact requisite to constitute actionable negligence is distinctly charged in the declaration, and admitted by the demurrer. Notwithstanding these positive and sufficient averments in the declaration, the circuit court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The facts in the case of Clark's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 78 Va. 709, were wholly dissimilar from the facts of the case under review, the only point of resemblance being that in both cases the death of a brakeman was occasioned by collision with an overhead bridge. It was held in Clark's Case that his negligence in failing to observe the bridge under which the train had to pass, upon a moonlight night, and his failure to stoop down and avoid the collision when there was no occasion or necessity for standing in an upright posture while coming to and passing under the bridge, were the proximate cause of his death, and that the bridge was a peril incident to the employment, contemplated by the contract, the open, obvious, and dangerous character of which the deceased had an opportunity to ascertain, and the risk of which he assumed, and it did not appear that he was, at the time he was struck and killed by the bridge, engaged or engrossed in the active discharge of any duty or requirement which prevented or hindered the exercise of his mental and bodily caution. In this case, Beard is alleged in the declaration to have been struck and thrown from his train and killed by an overhead bridge which he could not see, on a dark night, and because his back was turned towards the bridge, and his mind and body actively engaged in the effort to apply the brakes, and stop the train before it reached the bridge, in obedience to the rapidly repeated alarm whistle signals given by the engineer. He had the right to assume that the brakes, when applied, would stop the train before it reached the bridge, and it is expressly averred in the declaration that they were out of order, worn, and inefficient, and that they would have stopped the train, and would have saved the life of the deceased, if they had been in due order; that he was ignorant of the inefficiency of the brakes; and that the negligence of the defendant company in failing to keep the brakes upon its cars in safe condition was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased. "The duty of inspection is affirmative, and must be continuously and positively performed." Goodman v. Railroad Co., 81 Va. 586. In the case at bar the brakeman, Beard, did not, by his contract of service, assume the risk of injury caused by defective machinery, which it was the duty of the defendant company to keep in good repair, of the broken condition of which it is averred he was ignorant, and which he had a right to assume had been duly inspected. The circuit court of Alleghany erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the plaintiff's suit, and our decree is to reverse the judgment complained of, and to remand the case, with instructions to the circuit court to overrule the demurrer, and try the case upon its merits. Reversed.

LACY, J., dissenting.

TURK v. SKILES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 11, 1893.)

VENDOR'S LIEN—ENFORCEMENT—PARTIES—JUDICIAL SALE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—PERSONAL DECREE AGAINST MARRIED WOMAN.

1. In a suit to enforce a vendor's lien reserved in a conveyance of land, a trustee in a deed of trust, though subsequent to the conveyance reserving the lien, is an indispensable party, as he holds the legal title.

2. Though, generally, the beneficiary in such deed of trust, as it is subsequent, need not be a party, yet if there be a question whether the holder of the vendor's lien has by his act waived his lien as to the debt secured by the trust, the beneficiary is a necessary party.

3. A purchaser at a judicial sale is not protected upon reversal of the decree by section 8, c. 132, of the Code, when the record shows that necessary parties interested in the land sold, having liens thereon, were not parties when the sale was ordered and confirmed. So when a trustee holding the legal title to the land is not a party.

4. A personal decree against a married woman for a debt contracted during coverture is erroneous and void, and a clause in the decree that it is to be levied of her separate estate and goods and chattels, not limiting it to the property before the court in the suit, does not cure error. This, before chapter 3, § 15, Acts 1893.

Appeal from circuit court, Pocahontas county.

Action by R. S. Turk, trustee, against Jannie B. Skiles and others, to enforce a lien on land. Plaintiff had decree, and defendant Jannie B. Skiles appeals. Reversed.

H. S. Rucker, (Frank Woods, of counsel,) for appellant. R. S. Turk, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. J. R. Apperson conveyed to Jannie B. Skiles an acre of land in Pocahontas county, and in the deed reserved a lien for unpaid purchase money. This unpaid purchase money was $1,500, for which Jannie B. Skiles executed to Apperson three bonds of $500 each, but there was no mention of them in the deed. On August 25, 1880, Mrs. Skiles and her husband and Apperson executed to R. W. Baldwin, trustee, a deed of trust conveying the said one acre to secure to Richard Baldwin a bond of $1,200, executed to him by Mrs. Skiles and her husband, which deed of trust was recorded September 8, 1880. On September 7, 1886, Apperson assigned to R. S. Turk, trustee, said three bonds so executed by Mrs. Skiles and husband, to be collected and applied to various debts against Apperson in the written assignment to Turk specified. Afterwards Turk, as trustee, brought a chancery suit in the circuit court of Pocahontas county against Mrs. Skiles and others, setting up the assignment of said bonds to him, and the lien under the conveyance from Apperson to Mrs. Skiles, and praying that it be enforced by the sale of said one acre for the payment of said bonds. Neither Baldwin, trustee, nor Baldwin, creditor, under said deed of trust was made a party to Turk's suit. Mrs. Skiles and her husband filed an answer, in which they alleged the execution of said deed of trust from them and Apperson to Baldwin, trustee, and exhibited the same, denying the existence of Turk's lien, and suggesting that both said Baldwins be made parties, and praying that the bill be dismissed. A personal decree in the case was made against Mrs. Skiles for $1,796.27 in favor of Turk, trustee, on account of said bonds, and, in default of payment, that said land be sold; and the land was sold under the decree to W. R. Tyree, and the sale confirmed. Jannie B. Skiles appeals.

In the investigation of the questions arising in this case the first matter which naturally calls for consideration is the absence of Baldwin, trustee, and Baldwin, the creditor, under the trust from Skiles and wife to Baldwin, trustee. That instrument vested in the trustee legal title to the land. The decree and sale would not vest in the purchaser legal title, because it was outstanding in the trustee. It will not do to say, as is said in argument, that if the purchaser do not object to the sale on this score no one else can. He is not the only one interested in the procedure. Mrs. Skiles, the debtor, has right to demand regularity of proceeding, so that the property be not sold under such serious defect as the absence of the party holding the legal title, which would tend to produce sacrifice. Who would pay full price for a title so vitally imperfect? Without this trustee a party, the court acquires no control over the land to sell it. Under several decisions this must reverse the decree. Norris v. Bean, 17 W. Va. 655; Baker v. Oil Tract Co., 7 W. Va. 454; Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 657; Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 653, 11 S. E. 68; Bensimer v. Fell, 35 W. Va. 17, 12 S. E. 1078. The creditor under said deed of trust is not a party. But it is said that Turk's suit being one to enforce a purchase-money lien, it is not necessary to make any subsequent lienor, whether by judgment or deed of trust, a party, and we are cited to Neeley v. Ruleys, 26 W. Va. 686, and Arnold v. Coburn, 32 W. Va. 272, 9 S. E. 21. Generally, it is true that in such a suit it is not necessary to make them parties; but where special reasons exist it is otherwise, and such is the case here. While the vendor's lien is older than the Baldwin deed of trust, yet the then owner of that lien, Apperson, united in the deed of trust, and thereby, it is claimed, subordinated his lien to the lien created by the deed of trust, and thus made Baldwin's debt under the trust prior to Apperson's vendor's lien. Clearly, to go on and sell would expose the purchaser under the decree to assault from Baldwin, claiming priority by reason of his deed of trust. Would not this serious cloud inevitably produce sacrifice of the appellant's property? And then again, this deed of trust provides that the proceeds of sale under it shall go first to the Baldwin debt, and the balance to Mrs. Skiles. Does this release the vendor's lien? The money that would otherwise go to Apperson is by Apperson's deed directed to be paid to the debtor. Is the lien any longer existing against that debtor? If there is no longer a lien, the corpus could not be sold; if there is, it could be sold. Again, does the deed of trust discharge the debt against Mrs. Skiles, or only the lien? If it discharge the lien only, and not the debt, her separate estate would be liable to the extent of rentals; otherwise not. Has not the appellant the right to have the creditor, Baldwin, present, that these matters may be conclusively settled and given rest? If we look at it only from the point of Baldwin's interest, we may say he is not injured, because he is not affected; but the very fact that the decree is void as to him (McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 725) renders it all the more important that he be a party, looking to the interest of Mrs. Skiles and the purchaser, because Baldwin may any moment assert a prior demand. Baldwin has an interest in the land as creditor. It is hardly necessary to cite many authorities to show it error to proceed without him. Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 702, and authorities cited by Judge Wood. Even where it is uncertain whether a party has an interest in land to be sold, he ought to be made a party before sale. Donahue v. Fackler, 21 W. Va. 124. In the absence of the trustee and beneficiary under said deed of trust, we do not deem it proper to decide the merits as between said Baldwins and Turk and Mrs. Skiles.

Next, as to the purchaser's title. I think it clear that the title of William R. Tyree, as purchaser under the sale under the decree, must fall with the reversal of the decree, and that notwithstanding section 8, c. 132, of the Code,¹ because of the want of the said trustee and creditor, the two Baldwins, as parties. We are referred to the case of Gray v. Brignardello, 1 Wall. 627, asserting the doctrine that a right acquired under a judicial sale while the judgment or decree is in force will be protected, notwithstanding its reversal afterwards; that it is sufficient for the buyer to know that the court had jurisdiction; and that he has nothing to do with the court's errors. This doctrine has been long and uniformly asserted by the United States supreme court, and generally elsewhere; but in Virginia it has not been recognized, and while the decisions are not settled, the leaning has been against the doctrine. See Voorhees v. Bank, 10 Pet. 449; opinions in Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Grat. 528, and Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 30. It has always seemed to me that the doctrine of the United States supreme court, sheltering the bona fide purchaser, is just, and according to the behests of sound public policy and principle; and, as I understand it, our Code section cited above has carried that doctrine into statute law. But that doctrine and the line of decisions applying it do not hold that, where essential parties holding or having vital interests in the cause and the subject sold are absent from the case, the purchaser is protected. There is want of jurisdiction as to parties and subject acted on. The decisions of this court leave no room for question as to this point, and plainly show that the sale must be set aside in this case. The decision in Underwood v. Pack, 23 W. Va. 704, is that "a purchaser at a judicial sale is not protected by section 8 of chapter 132 of the Code when the record shows that necessary parties interested in the property sold, having liens thereon, were not before the court when the sale was ordered and confirmed." In Newcomb v. Brooks, 16 W. Va. 77, it is said that this provision of the Code cannot possibly transfer to the purchaser title vested in one not before the court. See Capehart v. Dowery, 10 W. Va. 142; opinion by Judge Woods in Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 712, and by Judge Green in Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 30; McNeel v. Aldridge, 25 W. Va. 118.

¹The section provides: "If a sale of property be made under a decree or order of a court, and such sale be confirmed, though such decree or order be afterwards reversed or set aside, the title of the purchaser at such sale shall not be affected thereby, but there may be restitution of the proceeds of sale to those entitled."

There is a personal decree for the debt against Mrs. Skiles. There cannot be a personal decree against a married woman. White v. Manufacturing Co., 29 W. Va. 385, 1 S. E. 572. The decree provides that it shall "be levied of her separate estate, goods, and chattels." This does not cure the error. Shall an execution issue on it? Against what goods? The separate estate of a married woman can only be made liable for a debt by equity, and that only on the estate before the court,—the particular property which is proceeded against.

A chancery suit of Peter Beverage et al. v. J. R. Apperson et al. was pending in said court, and the case in which this appeal was taken was heard on several occasions with it; but it has no such connection with this suit as to require more than mention. Therefore the decrees of the 18th of October, 1888, and 23d of October, 1889, and so much of the decree of 17th of June, 1890, as directs said property to be resold, and the decree of 21st of October, 1890, are reversed, and the sale to William Tyree is set aside and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, in order that proper new parties be made, and for further proceedings.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Nov. 15, 1893.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW.

Where the trial judge, during the progress thereof, in overruling objections to the admission of testimony, expresses an opinion as to the material facts in issue, in the presence and hearing of the jury, so prejudicial that the error cannot be cured otherwise than by granting the party injured thereby a new trial, in case the verdict is against him, notwithstanding such opinion was not objected to at the time it was so expressed, it may be taken advantage of on the hearing of a motion for a new trial, and if the motion is overruled, and proper exceptions taken, the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial awarded, for such error alone.

Error to circuit court, Ohio county.

Action in attachment by Neill & Ellingham against the Rogers Bros. Produce Company. To the property seized on the attachment, the First National Bank of Santa Barbara interposed a claim. From a judgment on the claim for plaintiffs, the intervening bank brings error. Reversed.

White & Allen, for plaintiff in error.
Henry M. Russell, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. On the 20th day of November, 1890, the First National Bank of Santa Barbara, in the circuit court of Ohio county, filed its petition claiming a certain car load of prunes, attached in the suit of Neill & Ellingham against the Rogers Bros. Produce Company, by virtue of an assignment to it, made by the latter company, of the draft drawn for the price of the prunes and the bill of lading. The firm of Neill & Ellingham contested this claim, insisting that the claimant did not purchase the draft, but only took it for collection, and, after notice of dishonor, had sufficient funds of the Rogers Bros. Produce Company to satisfy the draft, and that this claim was only made to aid the said produce company to defeat the attachment proceedings. To try this claim a jury was sworn, the evidence was heard, and a verdict was found for the defendant in error. The plaintiff in error then moved the court to set aside the verdict, and award a new trial, for three alleged errors: (1) Because of a certain improper remark made by the court during the progress of the trial, to the counsel, in the presence of the jury, which remark so made was not objected to until after the verdict of the jury; (2) because of the admission of improper testimony; and (3) because the verdict was contrary to law and evidence. The court overruled the motion, and gave judgment against claimant, who filed its bill of exceptions, and obtained a writ of error to this court, and here relies on the same assignment of errors as in the circuit court.

Concerning the first assignment, the bill of exceptions uses the following language, to wit: "After the depositions aforesaid of A. L. Lincoln and others, and the said answers of the petitioner to the said bill of discovery and interrogatories, which answers were sworn to by the same A. L. Lincoln, had both been read to the jury as aforesaid, the plaintiffs propounded to said G. W. Eckhart, their said witness, at the point where that question appears in the testimony, the following question: 'Mr. Eckhart, not confining yourself to your own bank, but speaking about banks generally, what would be the custom in a case where the draft was taken as a cash item, sent on for collection, and presented to the drawee, and was returned unpaid, and was taken back to the drawer, and he refused to give a check for it, but had then deposited to his credit in the bank a sufficient amount to pay the debt?"—to which question the petitioner objected. During the argument of said objection, counsel for plaintiffs insisted that the said deposition of A. L. Lincoln, and said answer to the bill of discovery, which was sworn to by the same A. L. Lincoln, were contradictory, and counsel for the petitioner insisted that they were not contradictory; and the court, in the presence and hearing of the jury, during the progress of the discussion, made to counsel the following remark: "They are clearly contradictory;" and, when the argument of the objection was concluded, overruled said objection. To the making of said remark by the court the petitioner, neither at the time, nor afterwards, before the verdict was rendered, objected nor excepted; and no instructions having been asked or given for either party, and the jury having returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, as shown by the record, the petitioner, immediately upon the return of the said verdict, moved the court to set the same aside and grant it a new trial upon the following ground, to wit: That the court erred in expressing an opinion as to the weight of evidence, as hereinbefore set forth." This remark was "clearly" error on the part of the court. The witness' testimony was material in the case, and the only evidence in relation to the real point in issue, to wit, the purchase of the draft, and the whole contention of the defendant's counsel was directed to showing that his evidence was contradictory, and therefore unworthy of belief. If he could make the jury believe this, his case was won, and, if not, they could do nothing else than find a verdict for the claimant. And during, no doubt, an acrimonious discussion as to the admissibility of evidence, the counsel for the defendant insisting that it was admissible because the positive testimony of this witness was contradictory, and the claimant's counsel insisting to the contrary, the court cuts the Gordian knot by holding that the testimony of the witness is "clearly contradictory," and the evidence offered therefore admissible, overrules the objection, and allows the evidence to go to the jury, all of which the jury sees and hears. The claimant might as well have surrendered at this point, and allowed the jury to find a verdict in accordance with the ruling of the court; but its counsel held bravely on to the end, although the result of the trial could have been easily foreseen.

The fundamental law of this state guarantees the right of trial by jury where the amount in controversy exceeds $20, exclusive of interest and costs. Const. art. 3, § 13. "The courts have always guarded with jealous care the province of the jury." State v. Hurst, 11 W. Va. 54; State v. Thompson, 21 W. Va. 756. "If the question depends upon the weight of testimony, the jury, and not the court, are exclusively and uncontrollably the judge." Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. (Va.) 88; Keel v. Herbert, Id. 203; Gregory v. Baugh,

2 Leigh, 665. The doctrine is firmly established "that, where the evidence is parol, any opinion as to the weight, effect, or sufficiency of the evidence submitted to the jury, any assumption of a fact as proved, or even an intimation that written evidence states matter which it does not state, will be an invasion of the province of the jury." 1 Rob. Pr. 338-344. "The opinion of the court as to the weight, effect or sufficiency of the evidence submitted to the jury is a good ground for reversal of a judgment, according to all the authorities. Such an opinion is certainly calculated to mislead them, whether it be communicated to them in the form of a construction, or be merely expressed by the court in their presence in the progress of the trial. In either case they are authentically informed of the opinion, and it must have an influence upon their judgment,—probably as much in the one case as in the other; but whether the same, or more, or less, the principle involved is not affected." McDowell's Ex'r v. Crawford, 11 Grat. 377. It is held in People v. Bonds, 1 Nev. 38: "There is nothing in the point made by respondent's counsel that this was not a formal instruction, but merely a remark made to counsel. Such a remark, made by the presiding judge in the hearing of the jury, would have precisely the same effect as if given in a formal instruction;" and in the case of State v. Harkin, 7 Nev. 381: "It is evident that the opinion of the court can be as effectually conveyed to the jury by expressing it in their hearing, while ruling upon an objection to evidence, as by embodying it in what purports to be a declaration of the law for their instruction. Accordingly, and we think correctly, it has been held that the judge has no more right to volunteer before the jury his opinion upon a material fact in controversy, while deciding a question of law on the trial, than he has to charge the jury in respect to such fact. * * * The right to a decision on the facts by a jury, uninfluenced and unbiased by the opinion of the judge, has been deemed worthy of a constitutional guaranty. It cannot be lawfully denied by the simple evasion of looking at the jury, or foisting the opinion into a ruling upon the testimony;" and in McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300, 319: "From the high and authoritative position of a judge presiding at a trial before a jury, his influence with them is of vast extent, and he has it in his power by words or actions, or both, to materially prejudice the rights and interests of one or the other of the parties. By words and conduct he may, on the one hand, support the character or testimony of a witness, or, on the other, may destroy the same, in the estimation of the jury, and thus his personal and official influence is exerted to the unfair advantage of one of the parties, with a corresponding detriment to the cause of the other."—as was the result in the present case. The counsel for the de-defendant in error, in his brief, insists that the objection was not made in time, and says: "It is enough to say that the remark was not objected to when it was made, nor at any time before the verdict. If the remark was objectionable, and the bank had intimated in any way that it objected to it, the court might have told the jury not to regard it, or might otherwise have done away with any improper influence which the remark may have exerted. But what harm can have come to the bank from the statement by the court of what was obviously true? The two statements of the witness were in writing, and were before the court and jury. No one could hear them both without perceiving at once that they were contradictory, and the court merely stated what was patent to every one who listened to the evidence." As to the last proposition, it is sufficient to say this court might differ with the learned and shrewd counsel for the defendant in error, yet it would not be proper to so state, because of the influence it might have on a jury on retrial of this case. Where, at different times, a witness makes statements apparently contradictory, the law requires that they be reconciled, if possible; and, if the jury had been left unbiassed by an expressed opinion of the court, under the light furnished them by counsel they might have been able to do this. But this was a question for the determination of the jury, and not for the court.

The general rule is that an objection must be made, and an exception reserved, at the time of an erroneous ruling or other error committed by the court, and cannot be taken advantage of after verdict, and on motion for a new trial. Nadenbousch v. Sharer, 2 W. Va. 285; Robinson v. Pitzer, 3 W. Va. 335; Wickes v. Railroad Co., 14 W. Va. 157. The reason for this rule is given in the opinion of Judge Daniels in the case of Telegraph Co. v. Hobson, 15 Grat. 138, as follows: "It is incumbent on him to show that he saved the point, or took the exception in the manner already indicated, or in some more solemn form, either at the time when the opinion of which he complains was given, or at least before the verdict of the jury was rendered. In the absence of such showing, justice to his adversary would require that he should be held to have yielded to said opinion. It is not just or reasonable that he should be allowed to take his chances before the jury, and, in the event of defeat, then deprive his successful opponent of the benefits of the verdict by an exception which, if insisted on during trial, might have been met and counteracted by the latter." But these reasons do not apply where the exception is not to a ruling on a point of law, but as to the expression of the court on a question of fact at issue before the jury, so material to the case that the error cannot otherwise be cured than by discharging the jury, and awarding a new venire. In this case the plaintiff in error's claim depended entirely on the evidence of the one witness. He was neither impeached nor contradicted by other evidence. If the jury believed him, it was bound to find for the claimant; if it disbelieved him, the usual custom of banks as to receiving and disposing of such drafts would be potent in determining their verdict. The question of this belief depended on whether he had made contradictory statements alone. But the court settles this question by virtually instructing the jury that the witness' statements are "clearly contradictory," and for that reason permits them to hear testimony as to the customs of banks that would not otherwise be admissible. Here, both by his statement and conduct, taken together, he prejudices the claimant's case. Suppose the counsel had at once objected; could the court have made any statement to the jury that would have cured the error? He could not change his ruling, and tell the jury the court was mistaken, and cure his conduct by ruling out the testimony, because then he would prejudice the opposite party to the same extent, besides placing himself in a false position. To tell the jury to disregard his remarks would amount to nothing, especially if the testimony objected to was not withdrawn. Hence, the error was incurable, and could only be obviated by discharging the jury and ordering a new venire. By permitting the case to proceed without exception, the verdict of the jury might have proved the remarks of the court to be harmless error, and the party injured could avoid the necessity of placing the judge in the humiliating position of acknowledging that his inconsiderate remarks had made it necessary to discharge the jury and start the trial anew. Neither could the opposite party complain, because it could make no possible difference to him whether the jury was then discharged, and a new venire directed, or wait until a verdict was rendered in accordance with the finding of the judge, and then submit to a new trial. The effect would be the same, as in either case the battle had to be fought from beginning to end.

The authorities agree in holding that the court cannot cure inconsiderate remarks of this character by any statement he may make to the jury, because of "their proneness to ascertain the opinion of the judge, and to shift their responsibilities from themselves to the court." State v. Ah Jong, 7 Nev. 152. He should exercise great care not to intimate in any manner his opinion upon any fact at issue. "He cannot do so directly or indirectly, neither explicitly nor by innuendo; and the effect of such an opinion cannot be obviated by announcing in distinct terms the jury's independence of him in all matters of fact." State v. Dick, 2 Winst. 47; State v. Ah Jong, 7 Nev. 152. In the case of State v. Tickel, 13 Nev. 510, the court says: "Whether or not appellant had succeeded in showing the witness to be unworthy of belief was a question to be decided by the jury upon legal proofs, admitted without comment or instruction by the court, upon questions of fact. It is true, the court did not address the jury personally; but it might as well have done so, for no one else had aught to do with the question of fact then before the court, and no one else could have been influenced against appellant, or in favor of the state, by the remark. It is entirely natural that jurors do, and proper that they should, listen attentively to, and be greatly influenced by, all remarks of the court. They have the right to confide in its expressed opinions, and it is their duty to obey its legal instructions. It may be said that jurors may be presumed to know the law that the court has not the right to instruct them or give its opinions upon questions of fact, and that therefore they ought not to be, and will not be, influenced thereby. In my opinion, experience does not justify such conclusion; but, at any rate, courts cannot presume against the natural result of remarks or instructions improperly made. If the court in this case had informed the jury it had no right to comment or instruct them upon questions of fact, and that they must not be influenced by what it might say, still its expressed opinion must have influenced them. They would have known the opinion of the court then, as now, and it would have left its impression upon their minds, however hard they might have tried to escape it." These remarks are as applicable to this case as to the one before that court. The judge had expressed his opinion; the jury heard it, and nothing could eliminate it from their minds. The remarks and ruling of the court were equivalent to instructing the jury that the witness was unworthy of belief, as under the law astute counsel could easily convince a jury that, when a witness' testimony is "clearly contradictory," it is unworthy of belief, and therefore should be disregarded in making up their verdict. Thus the claimant's constitutional right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury was destroyed, and the whole trial was rendered nugatory, and there appears to be no good reason why the prejudiced party should not take advantage of the wrong on a motion to set aside the verdict.

There is no intention to intimate in the slightest degree that the circuit judge purposely committed the error complained of, but that he inconsiderately did so. The effect, however, was the same in either case; probably stronger in the latter, as the jury would regard it as an unbiased opinion of the court. That it was a grievous mistake, he himself must admit on a dispassionate consideration thereof, and it is only to be regretted that he did not, by the exercise of his plenary powers, obviate the unpleasant necessity of this court commenting on and correcting the error. The case having to be remanded for a new trial, it would not be right for the court at this time to pass upon the weight or admissibility of the evidence, as by so doing it might be led into the same error committed by the circuit court, to the prejudice of one or the other of the parties to this controversy. The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case is remanded to the circuit court, to be therein tried before a fair and impartial jury.

UNITED STATES COAL, IRON & MANUFACTURING CO. v. RANDOLPH COUNTY COURT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 11, 1893.)

TAXATION — ASSESSMENT OF MINING PRIVILEGES.

1. Section 4, c. 36, Acts 1891, providing for the reassessment of lands where it mentions coal privileges or interests held by a party or parties or any company or association, exclusive of the surface, and providing for a separate assessment of the surface and coal privilege or interest, in using the word "held" meant and intended "owned" by such party or parties or any company or association.

2. Where either the surface or the coal or mineral underlying the same is leased to a party, it is the duty of the commissioner in reassessing the land under chapter 36 of the Acts of 1891, to assess such land and coal to the owner thereof.

3. Where a stratum of coal underlies a tract of land, and the owner thereof sells and conveys the coal underlying his land, it is the duty of the commissioner in reassessing said land under chapter 36 of the Acts of 1891, to assess the coal separately from the surface, charging the surface and coal to their respective owners.

Error to circuit court, Randolph county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

Action by the United States Coal, Iron & Manufacturing Company against the county court of Randolph county to correct certain assessments for taxation. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

L. D. Strader and Dayton & Dayton, for plaintiff in error.

ENGLISH, J. In the month of September, 1892, the United States Coal, Iron & Manufacturing Company applied to the county court of Randolph county to have certain coal rights held by it as assignee of certain leases or contracts stricken from the assessment books as improperly charged against it, and as improperly assessable. The petition was predicated upon the following facts: In the year 1872 one Isaac Carpenter by contract took from Crawford Scott and several others the right to mine the coal from several different tracts of land aggregating 1,151 acres, all of which contracts were identical in the conditions and provisions contained therein, leasing to the party of the second part all of the coal and veins of coal in, under, and upon said respective tracts of land, with the right of entering upon said land and boring and exploring for said veins, and also the right to cut timber from the said lands for mining purposes, for such term of years as should be required to mine and remove all the merchantable and marketable coal under and upon said tracts of land which could be mined and taken out without extraordinary expenses and outlay; and for all coal mined and taken out under said leases the parties of the first part should be paid at the rate of 10 cents per ton for each and every 2,400 pounds semiannually on the 1st day of January and July in each year; and in case no coal should be mined under said lease for the term of 10 years from the date thereof the party of the second part might, at his or their option, declare the terms of said leases at an end, and surrender the same to the party of the first part, but after the expiration of the said 10 years the said party of the second part should pay for 500 tons of coal annually, whether any coal was mined or not, as long as said respective leases continued in force; and in case any coal should be paid for under that clause before any coal should have been mined and removed, said party of the second part, his assigns, etc., might mine and remove all coal so paid for and not mined during any subsequent year or years while said leases continued, without any charge therefor, etc.; all of which leases were assigned and conveyed by said Isaac Carpenter to said United States Coal, Iron & Manufacturing Company, and said company had no other interest than such as was conveyed to it by said Carpenter; and said county court held, upon construction of said agreements, that said coal privileges or rights were properly assessable to said petitioner, although not before assessed as separate interests, and refused to strike the same off of the assessment books, to which action of the court the petitioner excepted, and applied for and obtained an appeal to the circuit court of said county, and upon a hearing the said petition and appeal were dismissed, and the said company applied for and obtained this writ of error.

A copy of one of said agreements was exhibited with said petition, and, as before stated, it was agreed that said agreements were identical. An examination of this agreement, which was executory, and under which nothing appears to have been done, (although more than 20 years have elapsed since it was made), shows that it was not under seal, and our statute (Code, § 1. c. 71) provides that no estate of inheritance or freehold or for a term of more than five years in lands shall be conveyed unless by deed or will, etc. In this case, however, an attempt seems to have been made to confer upon the grantee the right for an indefinite time to mine and remove the coal underlying these lands, and, although nearly 20 years had elapsed at the time this attempted assessment was made, without anything having been done by the party of the second part or his assignee in compliance with its terms, yet said company was assessed as being the holder of a coal privilege or interest in said lands. It is apparent from the face of said agreement that it was contemplated that it should continue for more than 10 years, for it is provided that, in case no coal should be mined under said lease for the term of 10 years from its date, the party of the second part might, at his or their option, declare the terms of said lease at an end, and surrender the same; but that after the expiration of said 10 years said lessee should pay for 500 tons of coal annually, whether the same should be mined or not. In view of the statute, then, can we say that when this assessment was attempted to be made, in the year 1892, the plaintiff in error was the holder of any coal interest in said lands, or that it was properly assessed as such? At best these contracts could only be regarded as leases of the mineral rights under the respective tracts of land, not under seal, for a term of more than five years, in direct contravention of the statute, which provides that "no estate of inheritance or freehold or for a term of more than five years in lands shall be conveyed unless by deed or will;" and, more than 10 years having elapsed since the date of said contracts, the plaintiff in error might, at his option, declare the terms of the lease at an end, and surrender the same to the party of the first part. If the plaintiff in error should seek to enforce the right to mine and remove the coal from said lands in pursuance of the terms of said contract, it might be met and defeated upon the ground that the contract was not under seal, and more than five years had elapsed since the execution of said contract; and should the party of the first part seek to enforce the terms of said contract against the plaintiff in error, it might be met and defeated by the fact that the party of the second part had the right, after the lapse of 10 years, to declare the terms of the lease at an end, and surrender the same to the party of the first. At the time, then, this assessment was sought to be made, it could not be said that the plaintiff in error held any coal or mineral right in said lands which could be enforced by it in a court of law; and, more than 10 years having elapsed since the date of said contract, the fair presumption would be that the plaintiff in error had availed itself of the provision contained in said contract, and declared the terms of said lease at an end, and surrendered the same to the party of the first part; but if such was not the case, and the lease was a valid one in all respects, and in full force and effect, our construction of section 4, c. 36, of the Acts of 1891 is that in the language: "When mineral, mineral water, oil, gas or coal privileges or interests are held by a party or parties, or any company or association exclusive of the surface, the same shall be assessed separately to such party or parties, company or association, at its cash or market value at the time of such revaluation,"—the word "held" does not contemplate the holding of a lessee who pays a royalty for the coal mined and removed to the landowner, the title remaining in the lessor, but it does contemplate a case in which another party has become the owner of the mineral or coal, and holds it as such. It is frequently the case that the mineral and coal in a tract of land are held by one party while the surface is held and owned by another, and it is when this is the case that the mineral and coal shall be assessed separately. The owner of the land owns it from the center of the earth to the heavens, and the coal is but a part of the land, and if a man rents a part of his land the law does not require the lessee to be assessed with the taxes on the portion leased, but the assessment is made to the owner. That section, 4, c. 36, of the Acts of 1891, in providing for the reassessment of lands, in speaking of coal privileges or interests held by a party or company exclusive of the surface, meant and intended coal privileges or interests owned by such party or company, is apparent from the context, for the same section provides that the commissioner, in order to assist him in ascertaining and fixing the value of said lands and mineral, shall, when practicable, examine the owner of said lands, not the lessee, under oath, etc. Section 8, c. 29, of the Code provides that the clerk of the county court, in making out the land books, shall correct errors and mistakes which he may discover in any such land books as to the names of persons properly chargeable with taxes on any tract or lot of land entered therein, and enter and charge the same, with taxes thereon, to the person or persons properly chargeable therewith, whether such correction be rendered necessary by the conveyance of such tract or lot by the person last charged with taxes thereon or otherwise; and section 25 of the same chapter provides that "when a tract or lot of land becomes the property of different owners in several parcels, or one person becomes the owner of the surface and another of the minerals under the same, the assessor shall divide the value at which the whole had before been assessed among the different owners having regard to the value of each interest compared with that of the whole," etc. This section is a part of the chapter which provides for the assessment of taxes generally, and is not repealed by chapter 86 of the Acts of 1891, which provides for the reassessment of lands, and, being read in connection with said chapter of the Acts of 1891, shows that the word "held," as used in section 4 of said last-named chapter, was to be construed as if the word "owned" had been used in its place. For these reasons my conclusion is that the circuit court erred in refusing the plaintiff in error the relief prayed for in its petition, and in dismissing its appeal. The judgment complained of is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court of Randolph county for further proceedings to be had therein, with costs to the plaintiff in error.

HARRISON et al. v. BREWSTER.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 22, 1893.)

PARTITION—PLEADINGS.

Where the pleadings contain no proper prayer therefor, it is error to decree affirmative relief. Middleton v. Selby, 19 W. Va. 168.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, McDowell county.

Action for partition by William T. Harrison against Elizabeth Harrison, R. C. Brewster, and others. From the decree rendered, defendant Brewster appeals. Reversed.

W. E. Chilton and Okey Johnson, (A. F. Mathews, of counsel,) for appellants.

DENT, J. At the August rules, 1889, William Harrison, plaintiff, instituted his suit in chancery in the circuit court of McDowell county against the heirs of Henry Harrison, deceased, and others, asking for the partition of certain lands among those entitled thereto. The bill concedes that R. C. Brewster, one of the defendants, is entitled to one-eighth of the land sought to be partitioned. R. C. Brewster files his answer, admitting the allegations of the bill, and, setting out more fully his one-eighth interest, joins in the prayer for the partition. Publication is taken against certain nonresident defendants, and at the October term, 1890, the circuit court hears the cause, and appoint commissioners to make the partition. January 22, 1890, the commissioners make their report. To this report J. G. Watts, H. Newberry, William Bandy and wife, and William A. Whitley and wife except, for the reason that they deny that R. C. Brewster has interest therein. At the May term, 1890, Watts and Newberry file their petition, as nonresidents, under section 25, c. 106, of the Code, praying that the decree of October 9, 1889, be set aside and annulled, and that they be permitted to defend. A decree is entered setting aside and annulling the decree of October 9th, and the parties are permitted to file their answer, to which the plaintiff replied generally, and leave was granted them to file a special replication to the answer of R. C. Brewster, to which he rejoined generally, and the cause was continued. On the next day, for some reason that does not specifically appear, this last decree is set aside, and a new decree is entered, allowing the same parties to make defense, filing their answer, and granting them leave to file their special reply, in writing, to the answer of R. C. Brewster, to which he rejoins generally. R. C. Brewster indorses an exception on the answer of Watts and others, which exception is not noticed in any of the orders or decrees. The record also contains a special rejoinder to the replication of Watts and others, with an exception indorsed thereon, not noticed in any of the orders or decrees. In this state of the pleading, both R. C. Brewster and the other defendants took depositions; and on the 12th day of October, 1891, the court heard the case on the pleadings, demurrers, and depositions, and decreed that R. C. Brewster had no interest in the lands, and therefore refused to allow him any part or parcel thereof, and further decreed "that the portion of land allotted to R. C. Brewster belongs to the heirs at law of Henry Harrison, deceased, and to the assignees of said heirs," and adjudged cost against said Brewster. From this decree, Brewster, the appellant, appeals, and assigns as error improper pleadings and erroneous decree entered thereon.

The decree of partition being interlocutory, and on bill taken for confessed, it was not necessary for the nonresidents to file their petition asking permission to make defense, as they had the right to appear and file their answers at any time before final decree. Code, c. 125, § 53. This was, however, harmless error, and appellant is not prejudiced thereby. The answer filed by the nonresidents sets up matters for affirmative relief, but does not pray for the same; hence it does not matter whether the affirmative allegations are sufficient or not; no relief can be granted, as the prayer is wanting. Middleton v. Selby, 19 W. Va. 168. The answer of R. C. Brewster, while it unites in the prayer of the bill, is not in the nature of a cross bill setting up new matter as the foundation for affirmative relief, and the court erroneously permitted the nonresident defendants to file a special replication thereto, as the answer contained no prayer for relief against them. Nor do the settled rules of practice, under the provisions of the Code, permit new matter for affirmative relief to be set out in a special replication, with or without prayer to that effect. This can only be secured by an amended bill, a cross bill, or an answer in the nature of a cross bill. With this state of pleadings, without prayer, proper or improper, the court, in its final decree, grants affirmative relief to the heirs of Henry Harrison, deceased, and virtually decrees to them the interest of R. C. Brewster in the lands of his father, William Brewster, deceased. The pleadings are wholly insufficient to justify any such decree, according to the laws of this state and the decisions of this court. McMullan v. Eagan, 21 W. Va. 234; Alleman v. Kight, 19 W. Va. 201; Middleton v. Selby, Id. 168; Code, c. 125, § 35. The practice under the Code in relation to answers, cross bills, special and general replications has been so often passed upon by this court that it is nothing but a waste of time and labor to keep repeating what has heretofore been so well settled. Familiarity with repeated decisions and statutory law might be of assistance to counsel, and beneficial to their clients. This suggestion is without authority. So far as the record shows, the court has not yet passed upon the report of the commissioners appointed to make partition of the lands. The decree of October 12, 1891, is therefore reversed, and this cause is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the principles of law and equity.

RILEY v. RILEY et al.

Nov. 18, 1893.)

PERSONS IN LOCO PARENTIS—LIABILITY FOR SERVICES.

1. Where a minor lives with his uncle as a member of his family, the uncle furnishing him with food, raiment, and shelter, and the minor rendering to his uncle his services, without any contract or mutual understanding as to compensation for support or wages to be paid, such minor cannot recover from the uncle, nor from his personal representative, the value of the services thus rendered, though the value of such services may have been greater than the value of such support.

2. But the uncle may give or release to such minor the right to his wages earned elsewhere, if it affirmatively appear, or may fairly be inferred from the nature and circumstances of the case, that such was the understanding of the parties,—a question of fact to be determined by the jury subject to the proper control of the court.

3. A case in which these two principles are applied.

Error to circuit court, Hancock county.

Action in assumpsit by Isaac Riley against William H. Riley and another, executors. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

W. J. Huff and Ewing, Melvin & Riley, for plaintiffs in error. John J. Jacob, (J. R. Donehoo, of counsel,) for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. The common-law system of pleading, as modified by statute, still prevails in this state. This is an action of assumpsit, brought in the circuit court of Hancock county on the 10th day of January, 1891, by Isaac Riley, defendant in error, against William H. and Frederick J. Riley, as executors of the will of Enoch Riley, deceased; the declaration containing two of the common counts in assumpsit,—one for work and labor, and the other for money had and received. Plaintiff also, according to the requirement of section 11, c. 125, Code, filed with his declaration an account or bill of particulars, stating distinctly the several items of his claim, amounting to the sum of $1,200, as sued for and set out in the declaration. It was composed of two items, viz.: The price paid for plaintiff's labor in the East Liverpool potteries, and received by defendants' testator, from March, 1878, to February, 1887; (2) the value of the work done by plaintiff for testator during the same period, when he was not at work in the potteries. On November 12, 1891, defendants appeared by their attorneys, and entered the plea of non-assumpsit, issue was joined, and a jury impaneled and sworn to try the same. Twelve witnesses were examined on behalf of plaintiff; none was called by defendants. During the progress of the trial, defendants moved to exclude parts of the testimony of certain witnesses on the ground of incompetence, but the court overruled the motions, and defendants excepted, and, at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, defendants moved to exclude it, without saying upon what ground. This motion the court overruled, and defendants excepted. Defendants offered no testimony, and, the case being submitted to the jury, they brought in a verdict for plaintiff for $1,100. The defendants then moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and because of the rulings made during the trial; but the court overruled the motion, and rendered judgment for the damages found by the jury, viz. $1,100, with interest from the 5th day of December, 1891, and costs, and signed and certified, as part of the record, defendant's bill of exceptions setting out all the evidence.

Passing by, for the present, the question raised during the examination of the witnesses, and considering the motion for a new trial, the question is, what are the facts proved, or what does the evidence fairly tend to prove? For unless the verdict is without evidence to support it on some essential point, or plainly insufficient to warrant the finding of the jury, the ruling of the court below must be sustained. For our purpose, and in the present attitude of the case, the record discloses the following facts: The plaintiff, Isaac Riley, was born in England. His parents came to Trenton, N. J., where his mother died December 2, 1875, and his father on the 2d day of February, 1878. He was 12 years old on the 19th day of February, 1878. He came to the house of his uncle, Enoch Riley, the testator of defendants, in March, 1878, where he made his home as a member of his uncle's family until he was 21 years of age. His uncle, in 1879, obtained work for him, where some of his sons were at work, in the East Liverpool potteries, across the Ohio river, where he worked about 300 weeks at an average of $4 per week, which was paid to him in money every two weeks, and which he took home and delivered to his uncle, amounting in the aggregate to about $1,200. He began this work at 7 in the morning, quitting sometimes at 5, and sometimes at 6, o'clock in the evening. A full week was six days, but the potteries ran on an average, in his kind of work, only about ten days of the two weeks. He was honest, of good habits, and industrious. It was his business to help milk the cows of his uncle, take the milk, and sometimes vegetables, across the river to the customers, and, when not engaged at the pottery, he was employed in sawing wood and doing various kinds of work about the house and farm of his uncle. During the time, Enoch Riley said he intended to provide for (the plaintiff) Isaac just the same as for his own children. The money from the potteries was brought home in an envelope, and he would sometimes refer to it as Isaac's money. He induced his nephew to buy a lot from him, and to build a house on it, he furnishing the money and taking a mortgage, which is still subsisting; but he said to one of the witnesses that he intended to leave the house to Isaac,—to release the mortgage. This was when Isaac was not present, but he did sometimes in his presence speak of his nephew being a good boy, and of his turning over his wages to him. To another witness he frequently said that "he intended to recompense Isaac for his work." On the part of defendants it is claimed that Enoch Riley, the testator, stood in loco parentis to the plaintiff from the time he was taken into his family as a member thereof until he attained the age of 21, and was entitled to his services and his earnings. On the other hand, it is claimed for plaintiff that the relation of father and son did not exist in contemplation of law, as to the matter here involved, and that, if it did, there is enough in the testimony to warrant the jury in saying that plaintiff had been emancipated as to the right to the wages earned by him in the potteries, or that there was enough to warrant them in drawing the inference that Enoch Riley promised plaintiff that he would receive and hold such wages for plaintiff's use and benefit, to be paid over or accounted for when he attained his majority; and that such promise was in no view a merely gratuitous promise, but was supported by a sufficient consideration; that he took upon himself the character of a trustee of the fund, receiving it under such circumstances as made him legally responsible therefor. It appears from the testimony that Enoch Riley told one of the witnesses that he and Isaac had had a falling out; that Isaac had his clothes tied up, and said he was going to leave; that he told Isaac that he could not leave because he was adopted, and that he would follow him; that the trouble amounted to nothing; that he found Isaac truthful and honest in every respect; and that he intended to provide for him as he did for his own children when he came of age.

By chapter 122 of the Code, as amended by act of March 20, 1882, and as the law now stands, he could have adopted his nephew, in which case he would have been invested with every legal right in respect to obedience and maintenance on the part of the child as if said child had been born to him in lawful wedlock; and the child would have been invested with every legal right, privilege, obligation, and relation, in respect to education, maintenance, and the right of inheritance in the estate of such adopting parent or parents, as if born to them in lawful wedlock, with certain exceptions not material here. See Code W. Va. p. 773, c. 122, § 4. So, under chapter 81, Code 1891, p. 671, plaintiff might have been bound as an apprentice to his uncle, to continue until he had attained the age of 21 years. But neither of these things was done. Plaintiff worked first in the pottery of Knowles, Taylor & Knowles, but at what wages, if any, and for what time, does not appear, except that it did not extend into the latter part of the year 1879, for at that time he went into the pottery of Laughlin, when he did work, "running molds" for about two years, up to Christmas, 1881, receiving during the first year $3.50 per week, and the second year $4 per week, working about ten days in the two weeks, and receiving his pay in money every two weeks, which he carried home and delivered in the package or envelope to his uncle. From that time he worked in the pottery of West, Hardwick & Co. for eleven months at $4 per week, averaging about ten days' work in every two weeks. He worked in Barnes' pottery about seven months, between July, 1882, and August, 1883, receiving $4.50 per week. He worked in the pottery of C. C. Thompson & Co. from the 4th of August, 1883, until February 26, 1887, when he had attained his majority, (February 22, 1887,) and he was paid therefor in all, by this firm, the sum of $620.00. So that during the nine years in controversy he worked three years, say 900 working days, wholly for his uncle, and six years, say 1,800 working days, in the potteries, during the same time cutting wood, etc., and milking and carrying milk across the Ohio river for his uncle, and receiving during that time, as his wages in the potteries, not less than $1,100, which, as received from time to time, he turned over to his uncle. The evidence tends to show that he was permitted to earn this money for himself. He evidently contracted himself with all the pottery firms and companies except the first. The pay rolls and accounts, as far as they appear, were made and kept with him, and the wages were paid directly to him. For instance, the witness B. C. Simms, a member of the firm of C. C. Thompson & Co., where plaintiff worked for about four years and six months, produces a copy of his pay roll, with the itemized payments, amounting to $620.00, saying: "Everything on that paper was paid to Isaac Riley himself, and I do not know whether the moneys, or any of them, paid to Isaac Riley, were by him paid to Enoch Riley;" showing that he evidently regarded himself as dealing with Isaac Riley, but with the knowledge and consent of the uncle where Isaac lived. The evidence also tends to show that Enoch Riley regarded himself as a kind of savings bank or safe-deposit of these earnings for the use and benefit of Isaac Riley. More than once, with the package or envelope containing plaintiff's two weeks' earnings, he said, "This money or this envelope is Isaac's," which, under the circumstances, is at least fairly capable of the meaning that he regarded himself as holding it, not as his own, but as trustee for his nephew who had earned it. He labored constantly for his uncle when not at work at the pottery, and did a very considerable amount of work for his uncle, day by day, after his work at the pottery was over in the evening, and before it commenced in the morning. The evidence does not show that he attended school at all. There was nothing to compel him to remain with his uncle, and nothing to induce him, so far as his own interests were concerned, except upon the theory that he was paying his board among his kinsfolk by extra labor, and laying up, for a start in life, his earnings at the pottery. It is only on some such theory that the facts and circumstances of the case can be explained, and the conduct and declarations of the parties given an intelligible meaning. It is not probable from the evidence that any such understanding or agreement was come to between them in the beginning, but that the young orphan boy was taken into the home of his uncle among his kindred as a member of the family, and that his uncle, during the first year at least, stood to him in the place of a parent; and there is nothing in the record that has the effect to exclude the inference of the continuance of such quasi parental relation down to plaintiff's attainment of his majority. But, whether it continued or not, there evidently came a time when there was a more definite understanding as to what each was to do and receive. Some time, perhaps in 1882, he and Isaac had some trouble. Isaac had his clothes tied up, and said he was going to leave. In a conversation with a neighbor about it, testator said that he had told Isaac that he could not leave, because he was adopted, and that he would follow him. This was not true, but Isaac for some reason became reconciled, and remained until he was 21 years of age.

There are but few Virginia and West Virginia cases bearing upon the points of law directly involved. The doctrine is well settled that the father is entitled to the labor and services of his minor child, and may maintain an action to recover for the services of such rendered to any third person. Halliday v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 424, 1 S. E. 821, and 6 Amer. St. Rep. 653; 2 Kent, Comm. 193, (13th Ed.) notes. But the father may emancipate the child whenever he chooses to do so. This right is not within the control of his creditors, and they cannot prevent an insolvent father from relinquishing all right to the future earnings of his child. Penn v. Whitehead, 17 Grat. 508; Trapnell v. Conklyn, 37 W. Va. 242, 16 S. E. 570. The emancipation may be inferred from circumstances, and whether the circumstances establish an emancipation is a question of fact for the determination of the jury. Beaver v. Bare, 104 Pa. St. 58; Ream v. Watkins, 27 Mo. 516. The emancipation may be complete, though the child continue to reside with its parents. Rush v. Vought, 55 Pa. St. 437. See note to Halliday v. Miller, [1 S. E. 821,] 6 Amer. St. Rep. 653-664. He may give the child his earnings. Monaghan v. School Dist., 38 Wis. 100; Bish. Cont. § 230. The father's consent for the son to receive his own earnings is put on the same footing with a gift delivered, (Benson v. Remington, 2 Mass. 113-115; Jenney v. Alden, 12 Mass. 375-378; Whiting v. Earle, 3 Pick. 201;) and the consent may be implied, (Burlingame v. Burlingame, 7 Cow. 92; Johnson v. Silsbee, 49 N. H. 544.) See Hammond's Bl. Comm. notes, p. 797; Cloud v. Hamilton, 11 Humph. 104, 53 Amer. Dec. 778, and notes; Schouler, Dom. Rel. §§ 273, 274; 2 Kent, Comm. (13th Ed.) 193, note b; 1 Minor, Inst. 437, 438. Ordinarily, where one person renders services for another which are known to and accepted by him, the law creates an obligation, called an "implied promise," on his part, to pay for such service a reasonable compensation, unless there be something in the relation of the parties or the circumstances of the case which precludes the idea of such compensation, in which case there would be an implied agreement or understanding that such compensation was not to be paid. See Hurst v. Hite, 20 W. Va. 183-204, 205; Rea v. Trotter, 26 Grat. 585; Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Grat. 52. "But where it is shown that the person rendering the service is a member of the family of the person served, and receiving support therein, either as parent, child, or other near relative, a presumption of law arises that such services were gratuitous. The conditions are not such as show a mutual intention to contract, according to the ordinary course of dealing and the common understanding of men. Therefore, before the person rendering the service can recover, the express promise of the party served must be shown, or such facts and circumstances as will authorize the jury to find that the services were rendered in the expectation by one of receiving, and by the other of making, compensation." 17 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p.

336, and cases cited. It applies to those who occupy the relation of parent and child, and to those who occupy the quasi parental relation, as a nephew living with his uncle, and a natural son living with his father. In Broderick v. Broderick, 28 W. Va. 378, it was held that, in the absence of direct proof of an express contract, the surrounding circumstances authorize a natural son to recover from his father pecuniary compensation for work and labor done for, boarding and nursing furnished to, and money advanced, paid out, and expended for, the father in his lifetime. Yet I take the law to be if the nephew, as in this case, come to live with his uncle, "and live in his family for years as a child lives with his parents, rendering services, and receiving in return shelter, clothing, and subsistence, without any distinct contract as to wages, the latter cannot thereafter recover wages of the former, or of his executor or administrator, although the value of the services rendered may have been greater than the value of the clothing and subsistence received; and the reason is that for the law to raise such a promise would be to raise a promise directly opposed to the obvious understanding of the parties." 1 Thomp. Trials, 894. Therefore, I am of the opinion that from the understanding to be inferred from the quasi parental relation, if not from the express understanding to be drawn from the facts and circumstances, the plaintiff, Isaac Riley, was not entitled to recover anything from the estate of his uncle, Enoch Riley, on his first account, for the work, care, and labor, etc., performed and bestowed in and about the business of Enoch Riley, because he has failed to overcome by affirmative evidence the presumption which prevails by reason of the existence of the family relation. See McGarvy v. Roods, 73 Iowa, 363, 35 N. W. 488.

For the same reason, among others, I think the finding of the jury for plaintiff on the second count, for money had and received by defendants' testator for the use of plaintiff, was not an unwarranted verdict, caused by their sympathy in a hard case, but was justified by the application of the principles and rules of law already mentioned to the facts and circumstances of the case: (1) Plaintiff was not the son, but only the nephew. (2) The work was away from home, across the Ohio river, in another state; the amount received was small, about 66½ cents per day, and, when it was delivered to the uncle, the evidence tends in some degree to show that he considered himself as holding it for his nephew's use and benefit. (3) When not engaged in the potteries, say one-third of his time, he was constantly and faithfully at work for his uncle, and when at work in the potteries he did every day a considerable amount of work for his uncle about his house, farm, and dairy. (4) He was induced by his uncle to buy a lot and build a house upon the supposition that he had money coming to him that would enable him to pay, so that the mortgage thereon would be lifted or released. It is further said, on behalf of defendants that, if plaintiff had been entitled to a verdict, the one rendered was excessive. In the estimate of plaintiff's counsel of the amount of earnings, the first year is properly left out, for there is no evidence of the amount. They make the aggregate, as justified by the proof, $1,216.47. Counsel for the defendants make it $835. I make it, on the same basis, $1,050.09. The evidence leaves no guess work about it, and $1,100, the amount found by the jury, is a safe, as well as a close, approximation. No interest thereon was found or allowed.

Twelve witnesses were examined by plaintiff, and cross-examined by defendants, but no witnesses were called on their behalf. Both examinations are brief and to the point. No spirit is shown to make captious or hypercritical objections to questions, but, during the examination of the witnesses, defendants moved to strike out the testimony of the witnesses Rigby and Barnes as to the industrious habits of the plaintiff. The first count was on a quantum meruit, which involved the worth of plaintiff's services, and the character of plaintiff's habits, skill, etc., was pertinent and admissible. Abb. Tr. Ev. 368. Defendants moved to exclude that part of the testimony of the four witnesses, Stephenson, Robinson, and the two Jacksons, which gave the declarations of Enoch Riley to befriend and requite his nephew. This was relevant, and it was for the jury to give it its proper weight in determining the issues of fact involved. Defendants also moved to exclude the testimony of the witness Metz, giving the conversation of the testator during his last illness, after plaintiff had ceased to live with him. Testator told witness that he had raised Isaac, that he was a good boy, that he had made a man of him, and that he intended to do well by him. This was admissible, together with the other evidence, as tending to prove an agreement to compensate, or at least as tending to show the relation between the parties which was in issue. In conclusion, as to all these exceptions to evidence, all the evidence is set out and certified in the bill of exceptions, and it appears affirmatively that they were merely cumulative, and, even if defendants' motion to exclude were improperly overruled, the defendants could not have been prejudiced by such rulings. See Hall v. Lyons, 29 W. Va. 410-421, 1 S. E. 582.

With the growth of business and the increase in the number and prolixity of trials, the modern tendency is very decided to let well enough alone; if the court can, from the record, clearly see that substantial justice has been done, notwithstanding some trivial or technical error of the trial court in a ruling on such questions, necessarily decided on the spur of the moment, to treat such error as harmless,—as something which did not, and could not, affect the general result. For the reasons given, we think the judgment complained of should be affirmed.

JOHNSON v. CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 11, 1893.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—VIOLATING RULES OF MASTER.

1. A printed rule of a railroad company says, among other things: "Entering between cars, while in motion, to uncouple them, and all such imprudences, are dangerous, and in violation of the rules of this company."

2. A brakeman who willfully and unnecessarily violates a reasonable precautionary rule, known to him, or which he must be taken to have known, cannot recover for an injury, of which such violation of the rule is the direct, efficient cause.

3. An employe, having knowledge of the danger about him, must use prudence and care to protect himself from harm; and if he willfully and imprudently encounters such danger the employer is, generally, not responsible for the injury caused thereby.

Error to circuit court, Cabell county.

Action for personal injuries by E. E. Johnson against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

For report on former appeal, see 14 S. E. 432.

Simms & Enslow, for plaintiff in error.
Gibson & Michie, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. This is an action in case brought in the circuit court of Cabell county on May 3, 1890, by E. E. Johnson against the railway company, for negligence in failing to keep the car coupling in proper order, whereby plaintiff, a brakeman, while engaged in uncoupling the cars, had his left hand caught and mashed so as to require amputation of all except the forefinger and thumb. It was, on the issue of "Not guilty," tried by the jury on December 10, 1890, who found for plaintiff $3,500 damages; and, the defendant moving for a new trial, the court overruled the motion and gave judgment. From this, defendant appealed. The cause was heard in this court at the January term, 1890, when the judgment was reversed, the verdict set aside, a new trial awarded, and the cause remanded. See Johnson v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 73, 14 S. E. 432. On the 12th of September, 1892, it was again tried by a jury on the same pleadings, and the jury found for plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $3,300, but subject to the opinion of the court on defendant's demurrer to the evidence; and the court, being of opinion that the law on the demurrer was for plaintiff, overruled the same, and gave judgment for the damages found by the jury, and defendant excepted, and has brought the case up again on writ of error.

Plaintiff was a brakeman with the shifter of freight trains in the yard of the company at Huntington. On the 16th day of January, 1890, while the freight cars drawn by the yard engine or shifter were moving forward slowly, about three miles an hour, he went in between them to pull the pin, in order to uncouple car No. 2,616. He caught the pin, but found it tight in the hole, and grabbed it around with his whole hand. Just then the drawhead went back under the car, and caught his hand between the pin and the dead block, and held him there, by the hand, until it was loosened by the slack that had been given by the engineer at plaintiff's signal going out. The train was still moving forward, and carried him along 40 or 50 feet. His hand was thereby so badly mashed that all but the forefinger and thumb had to be amputated, leaving a stiff wrist and a badly-crippled hand. He did not examine the spring,—had no opportunity to examine it,—but from what he saw, took it to be a spring about six inches long, which had been straightened to some extent,—weakened in the power of recovery of length by recoil,—as the result of having been at some former time severely jammed. He had seen the rules of the railway company more than once, as printed on the back of the schedules, and among them was rule No. 142, an extract from which reads as follows: "Every employe is required to exercise the utmost care to avoid injury to himself or to his fellow employes, especially in switching, or other movements of cars or trains. * * * Entering between cars, while in motion, to uncouple them, and all such imprudences, are dangerous, and in violation of the rules of the company." This is from plaintiff's testimony on his own behalf, and one of his witnesses says: "The men have always been notified not to go between the cars, to couple or uncouple, while in motion, but a man frequently goes in between them when in motion. That it was not necessary to do so, in order to uncouple, but it can be caught at the slack better by going in. Yet it is dangerous, every time a man goes between them while they are moving."

There is nothing to show that the company knew, or ought to have known, that the coupling apparatus of the car in question was out of order. In fact, as plaintiff's own testimony on this point may be said to be only conjectural, and as one of his witnesses said the spring was all right, it may be said, without contradiction of it, that it was inspected in about an hour after the accident, and found to be in good order. But conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the defendant did not take due care to keep safe this coupling apparatus, yet it appears from his own testimony that, if he did not in fact read this rule of the company, he frequently had it in his hands, with opportunity to read it, and, from the testimony of one of his witnesses, that "the men are always notified not to go in between the cars to uncouple, while they are in motion, and that it is unnecessary, and obviously dangerous at all times;" and it is equally clear from plaintiff's own testimony, and that of his witnesses, that his violation of this rule was the direct, proximate cause of his injury, without which it would not have happened. To hold otherwise would be giving the party advantage of his own wrong. The rule was reasonable, and made for his own safety and protection. He knew the rule, or ought to have known it. There was no urgent necessity, no higher rule calling for the violation of this one. Furthermore, his own and other testimony introduced on his behalf shows that he was wanting in reasonable care and prudence, in the manner and time in which he caught hold of the coupling pin. And when the plaintiff undertakes to point out, as he must do, how the duty arose which is supposed to have been neglected, he shows a violation on his own part of this precautionary rule prescribed for his own protection from danger. That such is the doctrine on the subject, see Karrer v. Railroad Co., 76 Mich. 400, 43 N. W. 370; Cullen v. Roofing Co., 114 N. Y. 45, 20 N. E. 831; Railroad Co. v. Kerr, 25 Md. 521; Sedgwick v. Railway Co., 76 Iowa, 340, 41 N. W. 35; Id., 73 Iowa, 158, 34 N. W. 790; Railway Co. v. Barber, 71 Ga. 644; Goulin v. Bridge Co., 64 Mich. 190, 31 N. W. 44; Railway Co. v. Rice, 51 Ark. 467, 11 S. W. 699; Lockwood v. Railway Co., 55 Wis. 51, 12 N. W. 401; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 364. A servant cannot recover if his injury is the direct result of his own disobedience of orders, (Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. 999,) or of a reasonable rule, (Overby v. Railway Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. 813.) And as to the manner and the time of taking hold of the coupling pin, under such dangerous circumstances, he must use circumspection and care in protecting himself from harm, and be himself blameless about the business which caused the injury; otherwise, he cannot recover.

We are cited by counsel for plaintiff to a number of cases which lay down the doctrine that it is the nonassignable duty of the railway company to provide the employe with a suitable and safe place and appliances, not as an insurer, but as a prudent and careful employer, and use due care to keep them so. Railroad Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 6 Sup. Ct. 590; Hough v. Railway Co., 100 U. S. 213. See, also, Kane v. Railway Co., 128 U. S. 91, 9 Sup. Ct. 16; Jones v. Railroad Co., 128 U. S. 443, 9 Sup. Ct. 118. And, on the subject generally, see Railway Co. v. McDade, 135 U. S. 554, 10 Sup. Ct. 1044; 2 Thomp. Neg. 969, 972; Cooley, Torts, 657; Bish. Non-Cont. Law, § 642 et seq. Upon grounds of public policy, as well as of private right, no duty of the railroad company should be more unrelentingly exacted than the duty of constant watchfulness to make and keep the track safe and clear; to have suitable appliances, and have them kept in good order and repair. No cases lay down this doctrine more fully and broadly than the cases of Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 37; Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 145; Madden v. Railway Co., 28 W. Va. 610; and Criswell v. Railway Co., 30 W. Va. 798, 6 S. E. 31,—a duty due to their employes as well as to passengers, and, though not requiring the same degree of care, yet often not separable from it. These cases show that it was the personal, nonassignable duty of the railroad company to furnish, and keep in repair, a reasonably suitable and safe coupling apparatus; but, whether it did so or not, it does not relieve plaintiff from the observance of a reasonable precautionary rule, prescribed in the main for his own safety, nor from the discharge of his duty to take care to protect himself from harm, and not willfully encounter such a danger. His own evidence shows that his own negligence was the direct, efficient cause, without which the injury would not have happened; and the demurrer to the evidence should not have been overruled, but judgment should have been rendered thereon, according to the conditional verdict of the jury, for the defendant. Therefore, the judgment complained of is reversed, and the judgment which should have been given is now entered.

JACKSON v. HOUGH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1893.)

ASSUMPSIT—PLEADINGS—CONSIDERATION FOR CONTRACT—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—BROKERS—WHO ARE.

1. On the facts the action was properly indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received, not for services rendered. The common count for money had and received was proper.

2. The action of assumpsit is an equitable action, and applicable to almost every case where money has been received by one, which in equity and conscience ought to be refunded or paid to another.

3. Where a plaintiff has done everything which has to be executed on his part, and nothing remains to be done but the performance of a duty on defendant's part to pay money due the plaintiff under contract, the plaintiff may recover on the common counts in assumpsit, and need not declare specially.

4. On the facts the consideration was sufficient to render the defendant's promise enforceable.

5. Against a demand for money had and received by one for the use of another, the period under the statute of limitations is five years, and it begins on the receipt of the money.

6. Where a question is not allowed to be answered by a witness, and the question does not itself import that its answer will prove a fact material, and it does not otherwise so appear, the refusal to allow it to be answered will not be ground of reversal.

7. One single sale of land for reward by one for another, taken alone, without anything to show that the former professed to follow or practice the business of a broker, buying or selling for others stocks, securities, or other property for commission or reward, will not make him such broker, under section 2, c. 32, Code.

Error to circuit court, Marion county.

Action in assumpsit by Oliver Jackson against Thomas Hough. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John W. Mason and U. N. Arnett, Jr., for plaintiff in error. A. B. Fleming, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Jackson brought assumpsit against Hough, recovered judgment, and Hough brought the case up by writ of error. Hough wanted to sell his farm. Jackson thought he could make something by selling it. He knew Adams wanted to buy a farm, and, without knowledge or request of Hough, Jackson went to Adams, and negotiated with Adams a sale of the Hough farm for $6,000, payable in six bonds on Sharpneck of $1,000 each, given to Adams. After this agreement between Jackson and Adams, Adams sent for Hough. Hough's price for his farm was $5,000. When Hough came, Jackson asked him whether he would take five $1,000 bonds on Sharpneck, indorsed by Adams, for his farm, and Hough answered that he would. Then for the first time Jackson told Hough that he had, without his knowledge, sold his farm over 30 days since for six notes of $1,000 each, and that he would do better by Hough than his first proposition; he would divide the proceeds of the last due Sharpneck bond, and Hough agreed to it. Jackson then caused a deed to be drawn from Hough to Adams, which was executed, and committed it to Jackson's hands, to be delivered to Adams when the transaction should be consummated, and Adams met Jackson, delivered to him the six Sharpneck notes, and received the deed. Adams assigned the notes not to any one by name, but simply indorsed his name on them. Hough was not present, and had no participation in the delivery of the notes and deed. It was between Jackson and Adams only. Hough needed the money, and hesitated to take notes for his farm, but he and Jackson concluding in their interview above mentioned that the notes could be discounted, Hough agreed to take them as above stated. After Jackson received the Sharpneck notes he handed them over to Hough, in order that Hough might have them discounted by a certain person named by Hough, who, as he thought, would buy them. Both Jackson and Hough tried to sell the Sharpneck notes. They made together a fruitless trip to Wheeling for the purpose. Finally Hough sold the last note. Learning this, Jackson demanded half its proceeds. Hough refused to pay. Jackson sued, and recovered a verdict and judgment for half its proceeds.

For the appellant it is contended that, as the declaration, which contains only the common counts, contained no count for work, labor, and service, there could not properly be a recovery, as Jackson's claim, legally viewed most favorably to him, is for services in selling Hough's farm, and the agreement to pay half its proceeds to Jackson only a measure of compensation. If such were the character of Jackson's claim, this would be true. But I think his demand can properly be regarded as for half the proceeds of the sale of the last due Sharpneck note,—that is, for money received by Hough which he should ex aequo et bono pay Jackson,—and therefore recoverable under the count for money had and received by defendant for the use of the plaintiff. I regard the services as settled by the agreement to take half the proceeds of the note. Suppose, before sale of it, Jackson had sued on the quantum meruit for services only, could he recover, having agreed to take pay out of the note, and just half of its proceeds? After sale of it, could he sue only for services? If, on Hough's refusal to pay, Jackson might fall back on his services, it would be because Hough would be deemed to have repudiated that contract; and even then it would give Jackson election as to the form of his demand. He might sue for half the money for which the note sold. It is immaterial whether Jackson and Hough were joint owners holding equitable title to this note itself, or Jackson became owner of half the money from its sale; for in either case Jackson could go for half the amount arising from its sale. Here is money in one man's pocket received under circumstances which call upon him ex aequo et bono to pay, and we need not refine as to the title to the note, whether in one or both parties; and, the action of indebitatus assumpsit being an equitable action, relief can be had by it for money had and received. If for my services to you we agree that I shall be paid by half the proceeds of the sale of your horse, which we agree shall be sold, and you sell it, why may I not sue for half the money? Such was our contract. Did we not both contemplate or realize that the effect would be to give me right to half this money? Plaintiff is not suing for the note, but, as his account filed with the declaration and giving specification plainly of the nature of his demand clearly shows, he is suing for money had and received,—for half the proceeds of the Sharpneck note; and, assumpsit being an equitable action, he can recover under the count for money had and received, it being applicable to almost every case where money has been received which in equity and good conscience ought to be paid or refunded to another. Thompson v. Thompson, 5 W. Va. 190. As Jackson had done all on his part, and nothing remained but for Hough to pay over the money, no special count was needed, but only the general count. Moore v. Supervisors, 18 W. Va. 630; point 10 of syllabus in Davissan v. Ford, 23 W. Va. 619; 4 Rob. Pr. 497. I, however, do not understand counsel to contend for a special count, but for one for service performed. I hold, therefore, that Hough held the note in trust for Jackson as to half its proceeds when sold, and that Jackson can sue for money as coming from this trust property. It grows out of a trust, and is one enforceable at law by assumpsit.

But it is said that no consideration supports the promise of Hough to sell the Sharpneck note and pay half its proceeds to Jackson; that it is simply an unexecuted promise to make a gift, and not enforceable. I think the consideration is quite apparent. Jackson's knowledge, influence, and business capacity found a purchaser and effected an oral agreement for the sale of the farm. True, this was not at Hough's request, but he ratifies and adopts it, and that probably would validate the act of agency ab initio. Hough avails himself of it, and derives a positive benefit ultimately in the consummation of the sale. That is enough, but it is not all. Jackson reports his action under this self-assumed agency to Hough, who, approving it, authorizes Jackson to complete the sale of his farm, and after this Jackson went on applying his capacity, influence, and care to the preparation of a deed and the full consummation of the sale. Here is service and talent applied by Jackson in making a sale; here is benefit to Hough; here is plainly valuable consideration on both sides, and constituting valid consideration as defined in all the books. 3 Minor, Inst. 17; 2 Kent. Comm. 465; 2 Bl. Comm. 297. Trouble of the party to whom the promise is made and benefit to the party making it will make binding consideration. We find no injustice in the claim. By the sale effected by Jackson, Hough realized $500 more than he asked for the farm. What does he lose by paying Jackson? Nothing that is not justly Jackson's. Perhaps, without Jackson's aid, he could not have sold at all, or not so well.

As to the point that the demand is barred by limitation. Suit was begun within five years from the sale of the note by Hough, the time when Jackson's right to sue for his money first accrued. Scott v. Osborne, 2 Munf. 413; 1 Rob. Pr. 485.

Is there error in refusing to allow Jackson to be asked as a witness the question whether he had license to engage in the business of real-estate agent or broker? No evidence had been given or was proposed to show that he carried on the business of real-estate broker, save this single sale. Is it possible that one sale of real estate by a party not professing to practice the business will make of him such broker? The statute says no one shall without a license "practice the business of a stock or other broker by buying or selling for others stocks, securities or other property for commission or reward." Code, c. 32, § 2. If a person sell one drink of liquor without a license, he violates the statute on that subject, as it says he shall not sell; but here the word "practice" is used, meaning to exercise or follow a profession or calling as one's usual business to gain a livelihood; and the word "business" is used as the object of the verb "practice," and there is hardly to be found a word more strongly conveying the idea of a permanent calling for a support. If one should undertake or profess to follow that business, no doubt one sale would be sufficient to bring him within the letter and spirit of the statute; but one is not within its letter or spirit who, without any manifestation of carrying on such vocation, merely makes one sale. I suppose that the purpose of the question was to elicit the fact that Jackson had no such license, and then contend that he could not recover because to allow him to do so would be against the policy of the law, as it would enforce a demand in favor of a party violating the license law arising from a transaction which he was prohibited from doing. The question proposed to call out the answer that he had no license, I assume, and thus prove that isolated fact, which, in connection only with this one sale, would not make Jackson a broker, and would therefore be immaterial. This question does not itself, like that in Gunn v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 165, 14 S. E. 465, import proof of anything but that single fact, which itself would be immaterial. There was no intimation that it was to be followed up by other questions or evidence that Jackson practiced the business of broker. If we should think that an unlicensed broker could not recover his commission, yet the single fact that Jackson had no license would not bring him within the rule. Suppose we should for this reverse. For what good, when we see no probability that further evidence is in the possession of appellant? We affirm the judgment.

WILSON v. WEST VIRGINIA, C. & P.
RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE'S COURT—WHEN LIES.

Where a justice in a suit involving a matter merely pecuniary has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, and renders a bona fide judgment on the merits clearly wrong, but within the scope of his legitimate powers, the circuit court will not, upon a writ of certiorari issued in the exercise of its original supervisory jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, review and reverse such judgment, but will dismiss the writ as improvidently awarded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Tucker county;
Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

v.188.E.no.14—37

Action by Martha I. Wilson against the West Virginia, Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company to recover the value of an animal killed by defendant. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

C. W. Dailey, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Scott and Dayton & Dayton, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. On the 28th day of April, 1891, M. Parsons, a justice of the peace of Tucker county, rendered a judgment in favor of Martha I. Wilson, plaintiff below, against the railway company, defendant below, and plaintiff in error, for $14, with interest from date, the amount of her claim for damages for the wrongful killing of a steer worth $14. The only evidence of value was that she had paid $6 for the steer, and had kept it nine months before the killing by the railway train. The defendant presented its petition to the circuit court for a writ of certiorari,—when, the record does not show, but the writ was awarded on May 6, 1891. The petition claimed that section 2, c. 110, of the Code, prohibiting the awarding of the writ of certiorari unless the amount in controversy exceeds $15, is unconstitutional and void; that section 12, art. 8, of the constitution makes it the duty of the circuit court, and gives it jurisdiction, to supervise and control all proceedings before justices and other inferior tribunals by mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari. On the 2d day of December, 1891, plaintiff, by her attorney, moved the court to dismiss the writ as improvidently awarded, and the court, having taken time to consider, on March 12, 1892, sustained the motion, and dismissed the writ, to which ruling this writ of error was obtained.

The only ground of error assigned in the petition is that the court erred in dismissing the writ of certiorari as improvidently awarded. In the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, it is argued that section 2, c. 110, of the Code, as far as it says that "no certiorari shall be issued in civil cases before justices where the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest, does not exceed fifteen dollars," is unconstitutional, so far as it attempts to impose such limit on the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court conferred by section 12, art. 8, of the constitution. Section 12, art. 8, of the constitution reads as follows: "The circuit court shall have the supervision and control of all proceedings before justices and other inferior tribunals by mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari. They shall, except in cases confined exclusively by this constitution to some other tribunal, have original and general jurisdiction of all matters at law where the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest, exceeds fifty dollars; of all causes of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, and prohibition; and of all cases in equity and of all crimes and misdemeanors. They shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases civil and criminal where an appeal, writ of error or supersedeas may be allowed to the judgment or proceedings of any inferior tribunal. They shall also have such other jurisdiction, whether supervisory, original, appellate or concurrent, as is or may be prescribed by law." Section 2, c. 110, of the Code reads as follows: "Of the writ of certiorari. In every case, matter or proceeding in which a certiorari might be issued as the law heretofore has been, and in every case, matter or proceeding before a county court, council of a city, town or village, justice or other inferior tribunal, the record or proceedings may, after a judgment or final order therein, or after any judgment or order therein abridging the freedom of a person, be removed by writ of certiorari to the circuit court of the county in which such judgment was rendered, or order made; except in cases where authority is or may be given by law to the circuit court, or the judge thereof in vacation, to review such judgment or order on motion or on appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, or in some manner other than upon certiorari, but no certiorari shall be issued in cases of judgment rendered by justices in civil actions for not exceeding fifteen dollars, exclusive of interest and costs." Section 12, art. 8, of the constitution (1) gives the circuit court a general supervisory jurisdiction of all proceedings before justices and other inferior tribunals by mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari. (2) It gives such court (except in cases confined exclusively by this constitution to some other tribunal) original and general jurisdiction—First, of all matters at law where the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest, exceeds $50; second, of all cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, and prohibition; third, of all cases in equity; fourth, of all crimes and misdemeanors. (3) Appellate jurisdiction in all cases, civil and criminal, where an appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas may be allowed to the judgment or proceedings of any inferior tribunal. (4) Such other jurisdiction, whether supervisory, original, appellate, or concurrent, as is or may be prescribed by law. The latter part of section 28, art. 8, Const., (Code, Ed. 1891, p. 43), reads as follows: "Appeals shall be allowed from judgments of justices of the peace in such manner as may be prescribed by law." Chapter 50 of the Code (sections 163-175) regulates appeals in certain civil cases from the judgment of a justice, and section 163 reads as follows: "In all cases an appeal shall lie under the regulations herein prescribed from the judgment of a justice to the circuit court of the county when the amount in controversy on the trial before the justice exceeds fifteen dollars exclusive of interest and costs." The constitution (section 12, art. 8) leaves the appellate jurisdiction in all cases where an appeal, etc., may be allowed by law to the judgment of the justice, and no appeal is allowed by law in such cases except where the amount in controversy exceeds $15. Now, the constitution plainly does not mean that the supervisory jurisdiction shall be an appellate jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction given in such case by writ of certiorari, in section 2, c. 110, is plainly an appellate jurisdiction, after a trial by jury, before the justice, and hence is also limited to cases where the amount in controversy exceeds $15; and so it has been held where the point was directly presented, and also the constitutionality of the limitation to $15, as prescribed by section 2 of chapter 110 of the Code. See Fouse v. Vandervort, 30 W. Va. 327, 331, 4 S. E. 298; Farnsworth v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 815. Therefore the meaning of section 2 of chapter 110 is that the writ of certiorari shall not issue where the suit involves matters merely pecuniary, and the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, does not exceed $15. See Love v. Pickens, 26 W. Va. 341; Farnsworth v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 815, 816. With this reading of the statute,—evidently the correct one, giving the meaning intended,—it does not trench upon the original supervisory jurisdiction by certiorari conferred upon the circuit court by the constitution. Upon the remedy by the common-law writ of certiorari, and as modified by the various early English statutes, see 2 Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 242; 2 Com. Dig. 310; 2 Bac. Abr. 162; 1 Tidd. Pr. 399; 4 Hammond's Bl. Comm. 321, note 31. Upon the remedy as modified by recent English statute, see Crepps v. Durdin, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. (9th Amer. from 9th Eng. Ed.) 979, 986. Upon the subject generally, but especially upon the writ as used in the various states,—first, as the mode of supervising and controlling the judicial and quasi judicial proceedings of inferior tribunals; second, as a writ of review on quasi appeal,—see 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 60; Harris, Certiorari, § 4 et seq.; 2 Spel. Extr. Relief, p. 1560 et seq.; Duggen v. McGruder, Walk. (Miss.) 112; State ex rel. Matranga v. Judge, 42 La. Ann. 1089, 8 South. 277; 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, top page 329. Upon the law and practice in this state, see the cases generally, especially the case of Poe v. Machine Works, infra, our leading case on the subject; also, 2 Bart. Law Pr. (2d Ed.) § 296. In Farnsworth v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 615, and Fouse v. Vandervort, 30 W. Va. 327, 4 S. E. 298, the distinction between the common-law writ used as a remedy by original supervisory jurisdiction and the writ of review, as a quasi appeal, provided by chapter 110 of the Code, (Ed. 1891,) is clearly pointed out. I am not sure but that the writ of appeal and review by certiorari is given as matter of right by the present statute, or is required to be so given by the constitution, which would put it more closely in harmony with chapter 50 of the Code of the justice, but this is only thrown out as a suggestion.

I take it for granted, therefore, for the purpose of this case, that this supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court in cases involving matters not merely pecuniary does not depend on the amount, except, perhaps, where the maxim de minimus might apply, or some other appropriate remedy come in. If the justice refused to act at all where his duty as justice required him to act, the circuit court would compel action by mandamus; if he were usurping power, or abusing or exceeding his legitimate powers, the circuit court would forbid and prohibit the justice by prohibition; or, if such action had passed into judgment or final order, the circuit court would supervise and control it by certiorari, and undo and set right what had thus been done amiss, but in the latter case, not if the judgment of the justice could be reviewed by appeal, writ of error, or in some other law-appointed manner. So that the only question in this case is, did the justice usurp and abuse power when he had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy or of the person, or, having such jurisdiction, did he exceed his legitimate powers? If that, or some action on his part falling properly into the same category, such as fraud, did not exist, then it was not a case for the circuit court to exercise its supervisory jurisdiction in, but a case of damage or loss, without injury to any legal right. The suit before the justice was brought by plaintiff on the following account: "The West Va., C. & P. R. R. Co. 1890. To the killing of one steer, of the value of $14.00." The defendant was summoned, appeared before the justice, and, on the trial, put in its evidence. The evidence is all certified by the justice and made part of his record, removed and sent up. Plaintiff's evidence was: She had bought the steer nine months before the killing, had paid six dollars for it with her own money, and she did not get it off her husband; that she had a separate estate, which at that time embraced all the cattle on the place. The steer was killed. Defendant's train killed it. The engineer could have seen the steer 100 yards either way. There was no controversy about the value of the steer or the killing of it; but was the company guilty of negligence? On behalf of the defendant, the engineer testified: At the time and place mentioned, 9 or 10 o'clock at night, he was running engine No. 1, (without any train,) which had been at the shops, going at speed of 18 or 20 miles an hour. It was dark. Had headlight. Saw lot of cattle. Applied air brakes. After he had passed the cattle, he saw this steer lying in the ditch on the right, 40 or 50 yards ahead of the engine. He was looking his best. Could not have seen the steer sooner. Already had the air brakes on. Could not have stopped under 75 yards running as he was. Had been in the business 3 years. Thus, the company seems to have made a strong case in defense, but the justice had jurisdiction of the subject-matter in general and in this instance of defendant. There was no usurpation or abuse of power or excess of his legitimate powers; only an error or mistake of judgment as to the weight of evidence, at the most. There was no want of jurisdiction,—no defect of jurisdiction. The most that can be said is that he exercised such jurisdiction wrongly, and, if that would be sufficient, it would be, in effect, substituting the circuit court for the justice, to whom the law has committed the right and duty of trying the case. One of the modes of proving negligence in killing stock is to show that it would not have occurred if reasonable and proper watchfulness had been observed; so that, however slight, it cannot be said to be wholly without evidence on that essential point; so that it is only a case of the exercise of a conceded jurisdiction wrongly, and comes within the rule laid down in Meeks v. Windon, 10 W. Va. 180, and cited with approval in Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517, 521: "Although it may be possible that the merits of the case have been erroneously decided, the writ of certiorari cannot be made a substitute for the inhibited appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, to review the case upon its merits." We are referred to the case of Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89. That was a contest for the office of clerk. It was the only remedy by which the proceedings of the county court in such cases could be supervised and controlled, as no writ of error or supersedeas would lie in such cases, and, having unquestioned supervisory jurisdiction, the court may review and correct the errors of law in their proceedings, as well as errors on question of jurisdiction. So in this case, if the justice had usurped jurisdiction when he had none of the subject-matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, had exceeded his legitimate powers, so as to call for and justify the supervision and control of the circuit court, then the argument of counsel, based on the ruling in Dryden v. Swinburne, might apply; but, as we have already seen, the facts of this case do not bring it within the supervision and control of the circuit court, within the meaning of section 12 of article 8 of the constitution, and for that reason the writ was properly dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

VAN DORN et al. v. LEWIS COUNTY COURT et al.

Nov. 18, 1893.)

ACCOUNTING—REMEDY AT LAW.

Where the specific facts stated in a bill in equity, notwithstanding vague and general allegations as to equitable jurisdiction, show that there is a plain, adequate, legal remedy as to the matters in dispute, the demurrer to such bill should be sustained, and the plaintiff remitted to his legal remedy.

Appeal from circuit court, Lewis county.

Action in equity by J. H. Van Dorn and others against the county court of Lewis county, P. M. Hale, and A. A. Arnold for an accounting and other relief. The bill was dismissed, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed in part.

Wm. E. Lively, for appellants. Linn & Withers, for appellees.

DENT, J. This is a chancery suit founded on the following assignment and acceptance filed with the bill as—

"Exhibit R.

"Order No. 6461. Name, Lewis County. Weston, W. Va. Order of P. M. Hale. State of West Virginia, Lewis county, to wit: At a county court continued and held for the county of Lewis, at the courthouse thereof, on the 4th day of January, 1887. P. M. Hale having this day presented to the court a certain order in writing, directing and authorizing the court to pay certain moneys to J. H. Van Dorn out of the money due and to become due him on his contract for building the courthouse and jail, which said writing is as follows: 'To the County Court of Lewis County, W. Va.—Sirs: I hereby assign to J. H. Van Dorn, of Cleveland, Ohio, the sum of three thousand dollars of the money due me, or to become due me, upon my contract for the building of the courthouse and jail of Lewis county, W. Va., and I authorize and direct you to pay the same out of said moneys, as follows: At each monthly estimate of money to be paid me upon work completed, the supervising architect is to make a separate estimate of the value of the ironwork completed, and, this estimate for ironwork so completed, the said county court is authorized and directed to pay to said Van Dorn the sum of eighty per cent., (80%.) And if, in said estimate of ironwork, any sum of money is included as estimate for girders, said court is authorized and directed to pay out of any other moneys due and payable to me out of that monthly estimate, or any subsequent estimate, to said Van Dorn, a sum sufficient to pay him the full price of said girders. And said court is further authorized and directed to pay to said Van Dorn, at the completion of said courthouse and jail, and out of any money or moneys that may be due and payable to me over and beyond the 80 per cent. payable by monthly installments, a sum sufficient to pay all balances due said Van Dorn for said iron and girders, not to exceed to him the said sum of $3,000.00 in full for all iron furnished. Witness my hand and seal this 4th day of January, 1887. P. M. Hale. [Seal.]' It is therefore considered that the court doth accept said order, and agree to pay

said Van Dorn, according to the terms thereof, said sums on said iron: provided, that said court shall in no event be liable to said Van Dorn or to said Hale in any sum beyond that contemplated in the original contract with said Hale for building the said courthouse and jail, which said original contract shall remain intact, and in no manner altered or changed by any acceptance of said order of said Hale to said Van Dorn; and this acceptance is to be considered only as a means of paying to said Van Dorn said sums of money that may be payable to said Hale without the intervention of said Hale.

"The state of West Virginia, county of Lewis, to wit: I, E. A. Bennett, clerk of the county court of said county, do certify that the above writing is a true copy from the records in the office of the clerk of said court appearing in Order Book No. 2, p. 474 & 475. Given under my hand and the seal of said court this 7th day of January, 1887. E. A. Bennett, Clerk."

"Exhibit Q. (Duplicate.) Weston, W. Va., Dec. 22, 1886. To the Honorable Board of Commissioners of Lewis County, West Va.—Gentlemen: I hereby authorize and direct you to pay J. H. Van Dorn the sum of ($3,000.00) three thousand dollars, in full for ironwork for new jail and courthouse, the same to be paid as follows, to wit: 80 per cent. on all ironwork on monthly estimates of architect or superintendent, except beams, which is to be paid in full when delivered. The balance to be paid on completion of building, not later than Oct. 1st, 1887. You to deduct the same from my contract. Respectfully, P. M. Hale. E. A. Bennett, Clerk of County Court."

The allegations of the original bill are to the effect that the county court has not faithfully complied with the obligation assumed by it towards plaintiff; that it did not have proper estimates made by the right party, but that it had improper ones made, and paid the money that should have been paid plaintiffs to others, not entitled to receive it. It also asks for certain discoveries as to the expenditures, and what defense the county court has to make to plaintiff's claim, and that an account be had between them. The amended bills convene other parties who have similar claims, and set out various other after-discovered facts as to the moneys expended by the county court in the construction of the new courthouse at Weston. The county court answered the original bill, and demurred to all the bills. The demurrers were overruled. A. A. Arnold files an answer setting up a claim he holds against the court. Depositions were taken, and on the 27th day of October, 1891, the circuit court rendered a decree dismissing the bills at the cost of the plaintiff. From this decree the plaintiff appeals.

The first question presented is, did the court err in overruling the demurrers for want of equity in the bills? The bills allege the want of discovery. But this is a mere pretense, as the defendant is a public corporation, required to keep records of all its doings open to the inspection of the public, so that, if plaintiff really wanted to know as to the expenditures of the court, he could find this out by an examination at the clerk's office. He also prays for an account between himself and the county court. "It is well established that if the bill, on its face, shows that the specific account can be fairly determined in a court of law, and that no discovery is necessary to the relief sought, the simple fact that the bill contains vague and general statements of complications of the accounts between the parties, without giving specific facts to show that such complications exist in the particular accounts to be adjusted, or a statement that the remedy at law is inadequate, or that some discovery is required from the defendant, will not support the jurisdiction of a court of equity. In such cases such statements will be considered merely as colorable, and employed as pretexts for foisting a jurisdiction upon equity courts which does not pertain to them, and they will be disregarded, and jurisdiction declined." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 458a; Lafever v. Billmyer, 5 W. Va. 33-41; Gratton v. Reed, 26 W. Va. 437.

In this case the plaintiff claims a fixed balance due him, of $1,947.40, on the price of iron furnished by him for the new courthouse; and the only question to be determined is whether the county court is liable to pay this sum, or any part thereof, by virtue of the agreement made with the plaintiff, with the consent of P. M. Hale, by its order entered of record on the 4th day of January, 1887, heretofore herein copied. There can be no dispute as to the amount due plaintiff, nor as to the obligation of the county court to assume and pay the same, provided it had the funds applicable thereto under its undertaking aforesaid; and it does not make any difference to the plaintiff how the county court disbursed these funds, or on what estimates, if not properly made. If proper estimates were not made according to the agreement, it is not the plaintiff's fault, as the person required to make them was the agent and in the employ of the county court for this purpose, and it cannot escape liability by neglectful or wrongful acts on his part. If it paid out the money to parties not entitled to receive it, this would be no defense to a rightful claim on the part of the plaintiff. The county court was directed by the contractor, Hale, in his order: "At each monthly estimate of money to be paid me upon work completed, the supervising architect is to make a separate estimate for ironwork so completed, and on this estimate for ironwork so completed the said county court is authorized and directed to pay eighty per cent., (80%.) And if, in said estimate of ironwork, any sum of money is included as an estimate for girders, said court is authorized and directed to pay out of any other moneys due and payable to me out of that monthly estimate, or any subsequent estimate, to said Van Dorn, a sum sufficient to pay him the full price of said girders." This order the county court accepted, and agreed to carry out, subject to Hale's contract; and if it failed to do so the plaintiff has a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law. It is certain that this plaintiff ought not to bear an undue proportion of the loss occasioned by Hale's failure to complete his contract, if he should bear any part thereof; which, however, are questions to be raised in a proper suit before a proper tribunal, and not for this court to determine at this time. The specific facts stated in the material allegations of these bills fail to show that the plaintiff has not a complete legal remedy, and therefore the demurrer to them should have been sustained, and the bills dismissed, for this cause alone. The bills being demurrable for want of equity, there could be no decree between codefendants. Alleman v. Knight, 19 W. Va. 201. The circuit court apparently heard the case on its merits as to this plaintiff, and, while it reserved the rights of the defendants, as to all parties, in its decree, only reserved the right of the plaintiff as to P. M. Hale, which would bar him as to any suit he might see proper to institute against the county court; and to this extent the decree will be reversed and amended, and in all other respects affirmed, with costs to the appellee, as the party substantially prevailing.

STATE v. OHIO RIVER R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1893.)

NUISANCE—OBSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY BY RAILROAD COMPANY—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION.

Where a railway company takes and occupies a part of a county road without having condemned it, yet with the consent of the county court duly given, but on the condition that the company shall restore the county road to its former state, or to such state as will not unnecessarily impair its usefulness, and fails to comply with the condition, the railway company may be proceeded against by indictment for maintaining a nuisance, and fined for obstructing and injuring the county road.

Error to circuit court, Cabell county.

Under indictment brought at the instance of the state of West Virginia, the Ohio River Railroad Company was found guilty of obstructing a public highway, and brings error. Affirmed.

Vinson, McDonald & Thompson, for plaintiff in error. T. S. Riley, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOLT, J. This is an indictment found in the circuit court of Cabell county on August 7, 1889, against the railroad company, for obstructing a public road, to which defendant, by its attorneys, appeared and entered the plea of not guilty. By consent it was submitted to the court, who found defendant guilty, but at the same term set aside the finding and judgment, and ordered trial by jury. The jury found defendant guilty. There was a motion to set aside the verdict, but the court, overruling the motion, fixed the fine at $50, and gave judgment therefor. Defendant excepted, and filed a bill of exceptions setting out all the evidence; also, one setting out all the instructions given for defendant, those refused, and the one given as modified over defendant's objection,—both signed and made parts of the record. The law involved and the material facts are as follows: By the constitution all railroads are declared public highways. Section 9, art. 11, Const. Under clause 6, § 50, c. 54, of the Code, the county court of Cabell, by order of March 12, 1887, authorized and empowered the Ohio River Railroad Company to construct its railroad as now located in Cabell county, where it interferes with county property, roads, etc., across, along, and upon such county property and roads which the route of such railroad shall intersect or touch; but such company shall restore such county roads thus intersected or touched, at its own costs and expenses, to their former state, or to such state as not unnecessarily to have impaired their usefulness, and shall keep the crossings of such county roads in repair. Four commissioners were appointed on behalf of the county, any three of whom could act to accept and receive the road from the railroad company when completed by it as therein indicated, etc. Under this authority the Ohio River Railroad Company, in 1887, constructed its roadbed along the county road at certain points in the county above the town of Guyandotte, laid their track, and now occupy and use the same. The company built another, called the "Substituted Road," at various points generally back from the river, between the railroad and the hill. The evidence on behalf of the state is that such substituted road is not as good as the one taken, not built according to the agreement and as required by the order of the county court, and was never received by the commissioners. The evidence on the part of defendant tends to show that the substituted road is as good as the old road, in some respects better, by being moved back from the river bank, but, again, being necessarily on ground more likely to get muddy in the winter time; that the commissioners were satisfied with the substituted road. But the jury found against the defendant, and, unless misled by some erroneous instruction, we must, in that state of the testimony, take it that they found correctly. The grounds of error relied on by the defendant are (1) statute of limitations; (2) modifying the instructions of defendant; (3) the jury disregarding the court's instructions; (4) the court refusing to grant a new trial.

I agree fully, with counsel for defendant, that railroads should not be needlessly harassed, nor dealt with harshly. They are indispensable in these times as highways; such our constitution makes and calls them.

They indicate the character and reach of modern civilization. The proceeding by indictment is awkward and stiff at best, and it is at least doubtful whether, on conviction, the railroad track could be torn up and removed as a nuisance, for it was laid down in that very place with the sanction of the general statute and the consent of the county court. At any rate, the criminal proceeding has no capacity of adaptation or direct efficiency to bring about the restoration of the county road. One of the civil remedies suggested in City of Moundsville v. Ohio River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 92, 16 S. E. 514, is better suited to bring about directly what we must infer to be the main purpose,—the restoration of the road. Nevertheless, we have to deal with this case as we find it, seeing only that the rules of law as settled in such cases have been given to the jury correctly, according to what the testimony tended to prove. In the case of City of Moundsville v. Ohio River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 92, 16 S. E. 514, there is a full discussion of this subject by Judge Brannon, delivering the opinion of the court, in which the obstruction of ordinary public streets and roads by railroads, under authority of law and with the consent of the town and county authorities, is fully discussed in all its bearings, both as to the offense and the civil injury, and the mode of dealing with it by indictment, mandamus, and mandatory injunction in the nature of a bill for specific performance; and this is followed by the case of State v. Monongahela River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 108, 16 S. E. 519, an indictment and state of facts similar to the indictment and facts in this case, in which it is held that if a railroad company, under authority from a county court giving it license to build its road upon, along, or across public highways, upon the express condition that it shall restore such highways to their former state, or to such state as not unnecessary to impair their usefulness, takes possession of a part of a highway, and constructs its road upon it, but fails to restore the highway to such state as is required by law, it is guilty of maintaining a nuisance, and may be indicted under section 45, c. 43, of the Code, notwithstanding it has such authority from the county court. This indictment is founded on section 45 of chapter 43 of the Code, (Ed. 1891, p. 330:) "Any person * * * who shall without lawful authority * * * obstruct or injure any road, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars." See State v. Chesapeake & O. R. R. Co., 24 W. Va. 809. This has been the law since July, 1850. See Code 1849, c. 97; Code 1860, p. 490. See Dimmett v. Eskridge, 6 Mumf. 308. Counsel for defendant quote from State v. Chesapeake & O. R. R. Co., 24 W. Va. 809, 811, as follows: "Before the defendant could be convicted, it was incumbent on the state to establish by competent evidence that How-ell's lane road, [the road in question] mentioned in the indictment, was, at the time the same was alleged to have been obstructed, a public road; that the same had been obstructed within a year next before the finding of the indictment; and that it had been obstructed by the defendant. Failing to prove either of these facts, the defendant was entitled to an acquittal." Defendant claims that this was not shown to be a public road. But this defendant recognized it to be a county road when on March 12, 1887, it moved the county court for leave to occupy it, and was by order of that date authorized and empowered to construct its railroad as then located, on, along, and across the said county road. Other evidence shows that it was the public road leading from the town of Guyandotte up the Ohio river, through Cabell county, to the Mason county line, and has been used and worked and recognized by the county as a road for many years.

2. As to the statute of limitations. The act complained of, in its inception, was in March, 1887, and this indictment was found at the August term, 1889, and defendant claims that it was barred. If it were not shown to have been a continuing offense, it would have been barred. But in State v. Monongahela River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 108, 16 S. E. 519, a case very much like this, the defendant was held to be guilty of maintaining a nuisance; that the giving of leave to occupy and use the said road for the railroad track was upon the express condition that the company should restore it; that the company cannot enjoy the grant, and dispense with the condition; that such authority affords no protection for excess beyond departure from, or failure to comply with, the conditions. See City of Moundsville v. Ohio River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 92, 16 S. E. 514, and cases there discussed. People v. Dutches & C. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 152, 165; 2 Wood, Nuis. c. 23, § 753. It is a continuing offense, and the defendant is under a legal obligation to remove it, and indictable when he suffers it to continue. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, (8th Ed.) § 433; Elliott, Roads & S. 490, 493. The instruction No. 1, given on motion of defendant, is based on Ratcliffe's Case, 5 Grat. 657,—that if defendant entered upon the road set out in the indictment under a claim of right, believing it to be its own, and that it had a bona fide right thereto, then the jury should find for the defendant,—and has no application to the case as a defense in bar; for this offense consisted, not in the act of occupying the old county road, (the company had a license to do that,) but it was on the condition precedent that the new road substituted for that part of the old one taken should be such a restoration as the law and the order of the county court contemplated and required. The failure of defendant to make such restoration of the old road is the gist of the offense, and it requires no other criminal intent than the intentional occupation of the old road, and the willful neglect or refusal to restore it.

This also disposes of the second ground assigned for error, viz. in improperly modifying instructions of defendant; for the court properly added that, to constitute a defense, the defendant must show that it had complied with the conditions under which it was permitted to enter and occupy, set out in the order of consent; and such modification made it consistent with instruction No. 4 given the jury on motion of defendant, which reads as follows: "No. 4. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this cause that the defendant made the alterations and changes in the county road where its track occupied the old road, and such alterations and changes restored the county road to its former state, or to such state as did not unnecessarily impair the usefulness of said road at the time such change was made, then you must find for the defendant." Leaving out of view the subject of crossings, etc., this instruction propounds the law correctly in this state, except where there may be some special reason for charging the company with a continuous duty, and in effect it called upon the jury to apply it to the facts as they should find them to be according to the evidence, and they returned a verdict of guilty. There is a good deal of testimony tending to show that the defendant had in substance made such restoration, and that the trouble with the new road was that it had to be built back from the river, next to the hill, where the wet weather and freezing through the winter made it muddy, narrowed it by slips, and put it out of proper width and shape. On the part of the state, three witnesses were examined who state that the defendant did not properly restore the old road by the new one, and one of them, a commissioner appointed to receive it, declined to receive on that account; so that no case is made out for a new trial on the ground of the verdict being unwarranted by the evidence, and the judgment must be affirmed.

GRAHAM v. NEWBURG ORREL COAL & COKE CO.

Nov. 18, 1893.)

INJURY TO SERVANT—PRESENCE OF GAS IN MINE —DUTIES OF MASTER—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

1. It is the duty of the operator of every coal mine to provide ample means of ventilation, and to cause air to be circulated through the headings and working places, so as to dilute, render harmless, and carry off dangerous and noxious gases. It is also his duty to employ a competent fire boss to examine with safety lamp, immediately before each shift, working places and other places where dangerous and noxious gas is known to exist, or is liable to exist. It is also his duty to employ a competent mining boss to keep careful watch over the ventilating apparatus and the air ways, traveling ways, pumps, and drainage, and to see that proper break-throughs are made, as required by law, and that all loose coal, slate, or rock overhead in the working places and along the haulways be removed or carefully secured, so as to prevent danger to persons employed in the mine, and to provide props and timbers for the mine, and perform other duties required of him by law.

2. Omission of these duties is negligence in the operator, and renders him liable to his employe for injury resulting from such omission of duty.

3. While the general rule of law is that an employe, knowing of defects in machinery, appliances, or in his working place, and still continuing in service, assumes risks, and cannot recover from his employer damages for injury arising from such defects, yet the rule is not without exception. Mere continuance in service with such knowledge is not per se negligence in the employe. He need not stop work in every instance of knowledge of a defect, but may run some risk by continuing service, provided the defects be not plainly dangerous, or be not such as ought to induce a prudent, careful man to believe that accident would likely ensue, and that, looking to his safety, he ought not to continue the work.

4. Where an employe knows of defects in machinery, appliances, or his working place, and is by words, acts, or conduct of his employer lulled into a sense of security, and continues in service, and is injured by reason of such defects, he is not precluded thereby from recovery of damages from his employer, if the danger be not so plain and obvious that a prudent, careful man, anxious for his safety, ought not to risk it.

Error to circuit court, Preston county.

Action for personal injuries by Edward Graham against the Newburg Orrel Coal & Coke Company. Plaintiff obtained a verdict, and from an order granting a new trial he brings error. Reversed.

P. J. Crogan, for plaintiff in error. W. G. Brown, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Edward Graham brought trespass on the case against the Newburg Orrel Coal & Coke Company, and, a verdict having been found for the plaintiff, the court set it aside, and Graham sued out this writ of error.

The action sought damages for injury from burning received by Graham while employed in mining coal in said company's mine, resulting from an explosion caused by fire damp following a blast in the work of mining. That the explosion came from the fire damp or inflammable gas is incontrovertible. That it is the duty of persons or corporations operating coal mines to use every reasonable precaution to keep the mines free from this dangerous gas, or neutralize and carry away what may inevitably be generated in the mines, so as to be harmless, by proper ventilation, not only appears from the common law relating to the obligations of employers, but also from the definite letter and spirit of legislation recently enacted, found in Code 1891, p. 991, and Acts 1887, c. 50. It needs but a hasty look at the act to tell us of the solicitude of the legislature to save the lives of the many who toil in mines, and reduce to the smallest possible compass the great dangers inseparably connected with the occupation of mining. This legislation deserves to be enforced, to subserve the spirit which dictated it, and the very important ends it seeks to accomplish. When we find gas in a mine in quantity or condition dangerous, we may say it is prima facie evidence of negligence in the operator, because in the teeth of the statute. That gas was in this mine, in violation of law, follows from the simple fact that an explosion of it entailing injury to the miner took place. That the mine was infested with this gas, and peculiarly dangerous from it, the evidence shows, and the fact was known to the mining boss. All the more particular, therefore, should have been the care to free the mine of it. The act, in section 10, demands that all mines generating fire damp shall be kept free of standing gas in the worked and abandoned parts as far as practicable. There is nothing to show that in this instance the gas which worked the accident could not have been dissipated. There had been gas there for two weeks before the accident. The main heading was falling, and men were sent to put up timbers, and could not do so because of the presence of gas. Did not the superintendent and mining boss know this? They could have, by the slightest diligence, known it; they were bound to know it. The statute, in section 10, requires the employment by the operator of a competent person, called "fire boss," in all mines subject to gas, and he is required to examine every working place and all other places where gas is known to exist, or is liable to exist, with safety lamps, immediately before each shift; and the workman must not enter, and the operator must not permit him to enter, any working place, until it has been examined by a fire boss and reported safe. All this shows plainly that it is the imperative duty of the owner of the mine to search for this dangerous gas, cost what it will. There was no fire boss employed in this case. No search was made just before the men went to work.

Next, in what more particular respect does the plaintiff impute blame to the defendant? He says that the crosscuts or break-throughs were left open. If so, then the fresh air from the fan, intended for the nostrils of the miners, and to drive out and dilute the noxious gas, would escape through these openings, and not reach the miners, leaving them without fresh air, and exposed to the imminent danger of the gas. This would be a gross dereliction of duty on the part of the mine operator. The statute says he must furnish ample means of ventilation, and circulate air through the main and cross headings and working places, to dilute, render harmless, and carry off noxious gases. He must adopt all appliances and means to accomplish this; and indeed the statute, in saying that, when doors for directing ventilation are used, they shall be so hung as to close themselves, implies this all important precaution. A rule of this company expressly requires them to be tight. There was before the jury evidence of at least two witnesses, very fully and squarely stating that the crosscuts were open. There was evidence to the contrary, but not more than that to show that they were open. The jury found that they were open. Certain it is that there was an explosion from gas; certain, also, it is that if there had been, at the place of the explosion, an adequate quantity of ventilating air, that explosion would not have occurred. It must have occurred either because the supply of air was insufficient, or because it escaped through openings on the way before it reached the location of this gas; and, as the claim and evidence of the defendant are that the fan was quite able to furnish an ample supply of air, why is the finding that these openings were unclosed not reasonable? I shall not cite authority for the proposition that, where evidence is very conflicting on matters essentially material in the case, the jury are almost uncontrollably the judges of the weight of the evidence, the deductions therefrom, and the credibility of the witnesses, and neither the trial court nor this court can overturn its verdict.

But it is said that, though defendant be guilty of negligence, yet the plaintiff cannot recover, because he was himself guilty of contributory negligence, inasmuch as he knew—First, that the brattices were open; and, second, that the gas was in the mine. The plaintiff did know of the open brattices. It is true that if an employee know that the machinery or appliances is defective, or the place where he works is not in proper state of condition, and he continues in service, he cannot recover for injury flowing therefrom. But this rule is not without exception. Such mere continuance in service is not per se or infallibly negligence. The danger must be such as may reasonably be expected to entail accident and injury; not a remote probability or chance of accident. It must be such as a fairly prudent, cautious man ought to think likely to result in accident, and which he ought not to risk. Does the rule require the employee in all cases to stop work simply because he knows of defective machinery or condition? In this case, could the plaintiff fairly expect that these openings would leave an insufficient supply of air? And did he know that there was gas present, in which case the openings would be a real danger, otherwise not? Was it rash, or even imprudent, to work? Was he so im thinking he might go on safely? Under the circumstances of this case, you cannot say that the situation was such as to impress him with a feeling of insecurity. To do so you must fix the rule unalterably that knowledge of any defect whatever, finally resulting in disaster, should have caused the employee to stop, and will forbid recovery.

Would the interests of either employer or employe be subserved by such a rule? To know simply of a defect of machinery, or that the condition or surroundings of a working place are not just what they should be to guaranty safety, is not to be certainly or necessarily forewarned of danger. Does the employe, from that knowledge, in all instances assume all risk? I think not. The question is, did he know, or ought he to have known, by the use of ordinary common sense and prudence, as applied in the particular instance, that dangers were before him likely to flow from the defect or condition? not simply that he knew the defect or condition existed. He need not in all cases quit work. He may run some risks, provided they be such as a prudent, careful man would, under the circumstances, run. I am aware that this subject is one which is, and will continue to be, in practice, of great importance; but I do not know that by following it further here I could make it any clearer. The following authorities discuss it, and I think will sustain the views above presented: Cases cited on pages 513, 514, 35 W. Va., and pages 265, 266, 14 S. E., McKelvey v. Railway Co.; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 372; Wuotilla v. Lumber Co., 37 Minn. 153, 33 N. W. 551; Russell v. Railway Co., 32 Minn. 230, 20 N. W. 147; Soeder v. Railway Co., 100 Mo. 673, 13 S. W. 714; Davis v. Railway Co., 53 Ark. 117, 13 S. W. 801; Eddy v. Mining Co., 81 Mich. 548, 46 N. W. 17; Colbert v. Rankin Union, 72 Cal. 197, 13 Pac. 491; Huhn v. Railway Co., 92 Mo. 440, 4 S. W. 937; Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. 710; Ford v. Railroad Co., 110 Mass. 240; Patterson v. Railroad Co., 76 Pa. St. 389; Conroy v. Iron Works, 62 Mo. 35; Railroad Co. v. Ogden, 3 Colo. 499. It later occurs to me that the principle of point 7, in Washington v. Railroad Co., 17 W. Va. 190, and reiterated in Fowler v. Railroad Co., 18 W. Va. 579, applies strongly in support of this doctrine. That is that, "to bar the plaintiff from recovery, his alleged act of negligence must be such as he could reasonably anticipate would result in his injury." In point 4 of syllabus in Wooddell v. Improvement Co., 17 S. E. 386, 38 W. Va. —, we find strong support of the position above taken, as it lays down that if a brakeman know of a tree limb over the track, "and he appreciates the danger," he is chargeable with contributory negligence. Judge Holt, in that case, makes a very valuable collection of West Virginia cases on contributory negligence, and gives the salient points decided by them.

And, moreover, the question whether Graham, by continuing work after knowledge that these openings had not been closed, was guilty of contributory negligence under all the circumstances, was a question for the jury. The fact that he had such knowledge is unquestioned; but whether knowledge of that isolated fact would fix on him contributory negligence was dependent on many other facts and circumstances, and rendered it a question for the jury, and we do not see our way to reverse the jury on this point. For myself, I am clear in opinion that the mere knowledge that these crosscuts were open would not stamp the plaintiff with negligence, but was only probative or evidentiary before the jury on the inquiry whether Graham was chargeable with contributory negligence. The rule is correctly laid down in Snoddy v. City of Huntington, 37 W. Va. 111, 16 S. E. 442, that "contributory negligence, when it depends upon questions of fact and testimony, is for the jury; but when the facts are undisputed, or indisputably established by the evidence, the question becomes one of law for the court." Where the evidence as to contributory negligence is conflicting and uncertain, the question is for the jury, and their verdict will not be interfered with. Hanley v. City of Huntington, 37 W. Va. 578, 16 S. E. 807. Though there may be a prominent fact which, taken alone, would sustain the defense of contributory negligence, yet if it depends upon surrounding circumstances, and is to be viewed with and receive quality and effect from them, the question of contributory negligence is for the jury. Washington v. Railroad Co., 17 W. Va. 190; Johnson v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 570; Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 163. In this case the fact that Graham knew that the crosscuts were open had to be taken in connection with the question whether he knew there was, or likely was, gas in the mine, which was disputed, and whether he was ordered to go to work, and was lulled into a feeling of security by the assurance of an agent of the company that the place was safe. The question is none the less a jury question when the case is one where the employe continues work with knowledge of defects. Citations on pages 513, 514, 35 W. Va., and pages 265, 266, 14 S. E., McKelvey v. Railway Co.; Shear. & R. Neg. § 215, note 4; Hawley v. Railway Co., 17 Hun, 115, 82 N. Y. 370; Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. 710; Johnson v. Railway Co., 43 Minn. 53, 44 N. W. 884; Huhn v. Railway Co., 92 Mo. 440, 4 S. W. 937; Eddy v. Mining Co., 81 Mich. 548, 46 N. W. 17.

Next, as to charge against Graham that he knew that gas was in the mine, and yet worked on. This is the only point in the case giving me any difficulty. It depends upon evidence in some respects conflicting, and upon deductions therefrom, and the jury has found no contributory negligence imputable to the plaintiff; and with this remark I might dismiss the point. Graham was told that night that there was gas, not in the room he was working in, but in another place seven or eight yards distant. As I understand the evidence, which is not very intelligible, this gas was brushed out with his vest by McNaught, perhaps imperfectly, thus leading Graham to think there was no danger. The plaintiff says he did not rely on the statement that there was gas in the mine, as he thought the person telling him had interested motives in telling him to induce him to go home, and the man was not an expert. He says the person did not tell him it was unsafe to fire shots. He stated, and there was no evidence to the contrary, that he had no experience with gassy mines, and was unacquainted with the qualities and danger of gas. It is laid down in Whart. Neg. § 216, that when the employe, from inexperience, infancy, or inability, is incapable of estimating the danger, he is not held to accountability for contributory negligence. It might be with some force said that the employe, if not an infant or imbecile, is bound to know and appreciate the danger if he enters into an employment. He is so bound as to dangers incident to that employment, but not those extraordinary or not properly incident. Where the defendant is shown to be chargeable with negligence producing injury to his employe, he is not excused unless he show that the plaintiff himself, by his own negligence, brought misfortune upon himself, which could not well be the case if, from inexperience or want of knowledge, the plaintiff knew not his danger. The guilty defendant has no right to exemption for injury done to an innocent employe. But there is an undisputed fact of decisive import under this head, which alone does away with the contention that, if Graham knew there was gas present, he cannot recover, and it is this: That on Sunday, needing coal for the engine, the mine boss went to Graham's house, and asked and urged him to work that night, and assured him that the mine was all right and safe, and he would have a nice night's work; and that he (Graham) supposed it was clear of gas when the mine boss said it was all right, as he did not know anything about the danger of gas, and he had confidence in the statement of the mine boss. The mine boss made this statement when he could not know it to be true, as he had not been in the mine for hours, and had not examined the mine before the men went to work, as the statute required. Now, whether we consider this an order or a request, Graham was lulled into a feeling of security by it, and unless we could find, as we cannot, that the danger was known to Graham, and was patent and manifest, so as to deter any reasonably prudent man, it frees Graham from contributory negligence. Wood, Mast. & Serv. §§ 352, 353; Shortel v. City of St. Joseph, 104 Mo. 114, 16 S. W. 397, 24 Amer. St. Rep. 317, and note. I regard it tantamount to an order to work. Had he refused, would he have been retained? But, if not a command, it was an assurance by a superior having every means and with capacity to know, and bound to know, given to one not having equal means or capacity, not knowing the danger or having no definite knowledge of any ground of danger, inspiring confidence and a feeling of security. In Tarrant v. Webb, 18 C. B. 797, commented on by Judge Green in Criswell v. Railway Co., 30 W. Va. 826, 6 S. E. 31, the employe had, as in this case, been told by a fellow servant of the defect, and informed his employer, and he remarked that he must not listen to what they said; and the employe recovered because, as Judge Green said, he had lulled the employe into a sense of security. We must take into consideration the employe's limited means of knowledge, and that, when laborers look to superintendents, they are not given to thought and foresight of danger. Id. This court held in Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. 53, that "if a master, having knowledge of a danger of which the servant is ignorant, by his conduct, actions, or words lulls the servant into a sense of security, in consequence of which the servant is injured, the master is answerable in damages." Defendant cannot complain of plaintiff's want of vigilance as contributory negligence, when that very want of vigilance was attributable to his own act, direction, or assurance of safety. Railroad Co. v. Ogler, 35 Pa. St. 60; Totten v. Phipps, 52 N. Y. 354; 1 Shear. & R. Neg. § 91. "It is not contributory negligence for an employe, who is in doubt about the safety of the place where he has to work, to defer to the opinion and assurance of those who are supposed to know, and from their position are bound to have special knowledge, as to whether it is safe or not." Iron Co. v. Erickson, 39 Mich. 492. And since writing the above I notice the case of Fowler v. Railroad Co., 18 W. Va. 579, holding that "if the defendant has, by its own act, thrown the plaintiff off his guard, and given him good reason to believe that vigilance was not needed, the lack of such vigilance on his part is no bar to his claim for damages." If we can say that the plaintiff knew that gas was in the mine, yet we cannot say that he knew it was there in such quantity as to make it dangerous, or that his danger was manifest or imminent or even probable.

Another consideration is that there was no fire boss, as required by statute, to examine and test this mine, particularly dangerous because it was a deep shaft of 380 feet. It seems it would be his duty to fire the blasts used in mining. This explosion resulted from a blast shot by Graham. Had there been a fire boss, we may say with safety the accident would not have taken place. Evidence was before the jury that Graham requested a fire boss, but the reply was that one would cost too much. It is said that Graham and others, for extra pay, agreed to act for themselves as fire boss; but this contention is not supported by evidence, and was overruled by the jury. It appears from the case that this dangerous mine was not operated with such care and precaution for the safety of life and limb as required by law, and by reason of this the plaintiff received serious injury; and, seeing no legal reason to excuse the defendant or set aside the verdict of the jury, we must reverse the order of the circuit court setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial, and enter judgment for the plaintiff upon the verdict. Reversed.

DAVIS et al. v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF FT. SPRING DIST. et al., (two cases.)
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1893.)

SCHOOL DISTRICTS—TAXATION—BUILDING CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Under section 45, c. 45, of the Code, the value of a schoolhouse and site yet unsold, though the board of education intends to sell it, cannot be taken into consideration, in estimating, for contracts and expenditures, the amount of money available in the fiscal year for contracts and expenditures.

2. Where a contract between a board of education and contractors, for building a schoolhouse, fixes a sum as the contract price which may exceed the amount of money available under section 45, c. 45, of the Code for a fiscal school year, but contains a provision that no liability shall be imposed by such contract on the board for anything beyond the sum lawfully available under that section, so as to prevent the contractors from recovering of the board anything beyond such sum, the contract is not unlawful, under said section, so as to prevent the board from paying upon it such money as is applicable under said section.

Appeal from circuit court, Greenbrier county; A. N. Campbell, Judge.

Two actions by George N. Davis and others against the board of education of Ft. Spring district and others for an injunction. From the decrees entered, a part of defendants appeal. Reversed.

John W. Harris, for appellants. Gilmer & Gilmer, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. The board of education of Ft. Spring district, Greenbrier county, made a contract on May 14, 1892, with Driscoll & Peters, to erect a schoolhouse in the town of Ronceverte, and Davis and others filed a bill to obtain an injunction restraining the board from levying to pay Driscoll & Peters anything under said contract; and such injunction was awarded, and a motion to dissolve was overruled, and the injunction perpetuated. After said injunction was awarded, and while pending, the board and Driscoll & Peters made a new contract on July 16, 1892, canceling the former one, and providing for the building of said schoolhouse, and the board made a levy for the building fund; and then Davis and others filed another bill, and obtained on it an injunction restraining the board from issuing, and the sheriff from paying, any drafts issued to Driscoll & Peters for work done under said new contract. The defendants moved the court to dissolve the injunction, but the judge refused to do so. The board of education and Driscoll & Peters obtained an appeal to review proceedings in both cases.

As to the first case, I may safely say that the show of funds available to pay the contract price for the schoolhouse under the agreement between the board of education and the building contractors of May 16, 1892, is inadequate, and that the contract created a debt reaching beyond the current year, and binding the district in future, unless we can include in the count or estimate of available funds the old school building. I do not think we can do this. True, section 39, c. 45, of the Code does say that the proceeds of taxes levied under section 38 for the use of the building fund, and "of school houses and sites sold," and donations, devises, and bequests, shall constitute a special fund, called the "Building Fund," to be used in building and furnishing schoolhouses; but that section only tells us how that fund shall be constituted, and has no relation to this question, save that it makes money in the treasury from actual sales of schoolhouses and sites a part of the fund which may be used for building, but it uses the words proceeds of "school houses and sites sold," not that they may be sold. How can we include a mere estimate of the value of a disused schoolhouse in the estimate of funds actually available, when it may not be sold, and, if sold, at very much less than the estimate? And when we look at section 45, c. 45, Code, it makes unlawful any contract in any year for the expenditure of more than the aggregate amount of the district's quota of the general school fund, and the tax levies that year, and any balance in the sheriff's hands from the preceding year, and such arrearages of taxes as may be due the district; and here we do not find any allowance for unsold school houses or sites, though the items that are to be treated as ready or available means are carefully enumerated. But the answer of Driscoll & Peters states that there was no intent by the first contract to bind the board to do anything contrary to chapter 45 of the Code, and if it bound the board to any extent beyond what it could lawfully do under said chapter, or any statute relative to boards of education, they did, by their answer, release, acquit, and discharge the board and its members from any and all liability created or attempted by said contract contrary to law, and agreed to hold the board liable under it only to the extent that it might lawfully bind itself under the laws aforesaid, and that they construed and held the contract to bind the board to pay for such work as they (the contractors) might do to the extent of available funds during the year ending June 30, 1892, and for any work afterwards done they construed the contract so that they would have to take chances of a levy therefor.

Chapter 45, § 45, Code, provides that no board of education shall incur any debt to be paid out of the school money of any subsequent year, and shall not contract for or expend in any year more than the aggregate amount of the quota of the general school fund, and the amount collected from the district levies of that year, together with the balance in the sheriff's hands from the preceding year, and such arrearages of taxes as may be due the district. The injunctions rest on the claim that the contracts both violated this statute. The plain and commendable purpose of the provision is to make the available funds of each year pay the demands of that year, and to protect the taxpayers from indebtedness beyond what each year's means will pay. That means an enforceable debt. Let us say that this contract did create such debt, and that the injunction, in its inception, was maintainable. Yet when these contractors, by their solemn agreement of record, through an answer filed in the case, signed by them, operating as an agreement of record, and operating also as an agreement based on sufficient consideration,—that is, a release from litigation, and permission to go on with the work,—when, I say, they thus acquit the board from all demand further than the lawfully applicable means, and repudiate all pretension to hold the board liable further, and thus bring the contract within the pale of the lawful authority of the board, and purge it of objections, it would seem that the whole object of the law is carried out. They have estopped themselves from doing what the law forbids. The board does no unlawful act, further than that it makes a debt reaching over and mortgaging next year's fund by a present binding contract, and when that feature is removed there is no taint. The board is commanded to provide schoolhouses. Often, the public need requires a house costing more than the means of one year can pay. Can the board not begin it, and lay the foundation one year, and put the building on it the next year, and finish it the next, so it do not make a contract that will involve at once future years? I hardly think the statute means to tie the power of the board so closely as that. Such action would not involve the public, for next year the work may be abandoned or postponed. The providing schoolhouses is a part of the work of the current year. The board is an agency in the government vested with important powers, and must be accorded credit for subserving public interest by prudent action, but it is limited by the injunction not to create a debt beyond the year's means to pay. The law has no further restricted it. This contract having been brought within the law, I see no reason to further restrain the lawful function of the board.

After the court had overruled a motion to dissolve and perpetuated the injunction, the defense, on same day, filed the new contract of July 16, 1892, and again moved a dissolution, which the court refused. The contract was not introduced by amended answer, as perhaps it should have been. No objection was made. As the answer itself called for a dissolution, it is unnecessary to discuss the manner of filing the paper; but I think, barring that, the paper also called for a dissolution for reasons stated below, as it more properly concerns the second suit.

As to the second suit: After the court had awarded the injunction in the first suit, the board of education and Driscoll & Peters made a new agreement for the construction of the schoolhouse, dated July, 16, 1892, with the intent, as it states, to proceed with the work, and avoid all litigation, and render the contract consistent with law, by which contract the former contract was wholly canceled, and provision made for the construction of the house at the price of $9,540, payable in installments of $600 when the foundation should be completed; $2,000 more when the brickwork should be completed; $2,720 on December 1, 1892; and the remaining $2,720 on January 1, 1893. And a clause provided that nothing in the contract should be construed to require the builders to proceed with work during that or any subsequent fiscal school year, to any greater extent than the extent to which the expenditure for the building might be made under section 45 of chapter 45 of the Code of the state, but that they should push the work as rapidly as funds for their payment should become available under said Code section, or any school levies lawfully made, provided that unless there should be in the hands, or under the control of the board, on or before September 1, 1892, funds sufficient for payment of the contract price, the contractors should have option to annul the contract, and receive pay on the basis of said contract so far as work had been done; and another clause provided that nothing in the agreement should be construed to create any indebtedness on the part of the board beyond the means then at its disposal or under its control, according to the provisions of said Code section, and, if work done should amount to more than the means so at the disposal of the board, the contract should not be construed as imposing any liability on the board for any year subsequent to the fiscal year expiring June 30, 1893. The board of education laid the levy for the current year. Then Davis and others filed another bill to enjoin the issuing or paying to Driscoll & Peters of any drafts out of the building fund levy so made, and an injunction was awarded. The board and Driscoll & Peters filed answers setting up the new contract; maintaining that there were funds adequate in the current year to discharge the price fixed by the contract for the construction of the school building, and that the contract did not operate to create any debt beyond the money expendable in that year, and did not bind the money belonging to any future year, or in any event require the board to pay a cent beyond the money lawfully applicable,—money belonging to the then current year,—whether work was done beyond it or not. The only theory on which we can hold this second contract as contravening the statute is that it creates a debt which may not be within the reach of moneys on hand in the fiscal year to discharge, and that it carries over and binds moneys belonging to a year or years in future. But can we say it does this? If it does not do this, it is not unlawful. There is the plain letter of the contract that the board shall not pay, and rest under no obligation to pay, beyond the money available that year, and the plain letter that the contractors need not go on beyond that money with their work, and, if they did, it imposed no obligation on the public to pay for it. If there should be a deficit, the board had next year a right to refuse pay. The contract was improvident, perhaps, on the part of the contractors, but they made it. Here are parties, competent, contracting on a lawful subject, on valuable consideration; and why could they not insert this clause limiting the liability? If a board of education contract for a schoolhouse at a given sum, it would have to pay it, if the money of the year be sufficient or insufficient, unless that Code section would forbid payment. Now, could it not, by agreement, limit its liability to the money of the particular year, if the other party, in order to get the work, chose to run the risk? Why not? It is said the case of Mayor, etc., v. Gill, 31 Md. 375, rules this case the other way. But I see a clear and strong line of difference between that and this case. The Maryland constitution provides that no debt, with certain exceptions, shall be created by the city of Baltimore, nor shall its credit be given or loaned in aid of any corporation, nor shall its council involve the city in works of internal improvement, nor in granting aid thereto, which would involve the faith and credit of the city, unless authorized by the legislature, etc. The council passed an ordinance to raise $1,000,000 by the hypothecation of shares of stock in the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, owned by the city, and for investing the money in bonds of the Western Maryland Railroad Company. Now, observe that money was to be borrowed by the city to be devoted, in the teeth of the constitution, to aid a corporation in a work of internal improvement,—an act wholly forbidden without legislative assent,—while here the board of education is doing an act it is commanded by law to do, unless done in improper manner. But the purpose for which the Maryland case is cited is that it will show that the clause in the contract here involved, limiting the liability to the funds of the one year, does not prevent the whole contract sum for building from being a debt against the board of education. Let us see. The ordinance of the council of Baltimore provided that the city should not be bound, but the lenders of the money must look to the stock hypothecated. The court properly said—First, that there was a debt; and, second, one for which the property of the city was pledged. The constitution forbade aid by the city to a corporation, or to works of internal improvement, and the property of the city was pledged and endangered, its faith and credit extended, against the constitution, so far as the property was concerned. It was a debt, because enforceable out of its property, and, besides, a debt made for an unlawful purpose. Baltimore could neither create such a debt, nor pledge its securities for it; but the board of education made a lawful debt, and pledged only one year's money which it could lawfully do. Both that case and this hinge on the act done. Remember that Code, § 45, does not forbid a debt, but one to be paid out of the school money of a subsequent year. The naming a sum in a contract for building a schoolhouse, payable in future, may be, in a sense, called a "debt;" but if not payable out of the school money of subsequent years, in terms, or it will not exceed the money of the then fiscal year, it is not a debt forbidden by the section. In both the Maryland case and this case, let us say a debt was created; but in the Maryland case any debt was forbidden, while here such a debt as was made was not forbidden. In the Maryland case the property of the city was pledged, against the law, while here no more was pledged than the law authorized. If the law had not made it unlawful for Baltimore to make the debt, and pledge the property it did pledge, the ordinance would have been good. This is not an unfair presentation, as here the board made a lawful promise to pay, and pledged, lawfully, one year's assets, and no more. I do not see how a debt without obligation can be a debt, in a legal sense. If it be said that the clause in the Baltimore ordinance limiting the city's liability to the securities pledged did not prevent the engagement from assuming the nature of a debt, and so the limitation in this contract of the liability to one year's money does not prevent the board's engagement from being a debt, I answer that it does not, but it prevents the engagement from being a forbidden debt, whereas the limitation in the Baltimore ordinance did not prevent that debt's being one forbidden. Here the law authorizes a contract for a school house, and the pledge of one year's money for it. If we could say that when a board of education contracts for a school for a certain sum, which may or may not be in excess of the money applicable to it, and takes care to provide against any liability beyond what such money will pay, this is a debt which, in the language of section 45, "is to be paid out of the school money of any subsequent year," we should uphold this injunction; but we cannot say so. Can we say that the clause limiting the liability to one year's assets is not a bar against the contractor's recovering it? I think we cannot. Then there is no prohibited debt. I do not think this decision at all in conflict with Splman v. City of Parkersburg, (W. Va.) 14 S. E. 279. We are of opinion to reverse all orders and decrees in both cases overruling motions to dissolve the injunction and perpetuating the first one, and to dissolve both injunctions and dismiss both bills.

D. M. OSBORNE & CO. v. FRANCIS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 25, 1893.)

CONDITIONAL SALE—RIGHTS OF BUYER—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Defendant bought a harvesting machine called a "binder," upon the condition that if it did not work to his satisfaction he might return it. Held, that his right to reject was absolute, and his reasons could not be investigated.

2. An erroneous instruction on a material point is presumed to be to the prejudice of the party appealing, against whom it is given, and will cause reversal, unless it clearly appears from the record that it was harmless.

Error to circuit court, Marshall county.

Action by D. M. Osborne & Co. against Samuel Francis. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. B. Evans, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Parkinson, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. This action was for $133.50, the price and value of one right-hand binder and 50 pounds Manilla binding twine, which plaintiffs claimed to have sold defendant. It was originally brought before a justice, where the defendant confessed judgment for $8.50 for the twine, which, together with the costs, he paid. On the 9th of January, 1891, the justice gave judgment against Francis for $125, the price of the binder. From this judgment the defendant appealed to the circuit court of Marshall county, where the case was tried before a jury, and a verdict found for plaintiff for $133.50. During the progress of the trial the court, on motion of plaintiff, gave three instructions. To the giving of the one marked "No. 2" defendant objected, but the court overruled the objection, and defendant excepted. On motion of defendant the court then gave the jury three instructions, to which plaintiff objected, but the court overruled the objection, and gave the same, and plaintiff excepted. After the verdict the defendant moved the court to set the same aside, and grant him a new trial, because the verdict was not in accordance with the law and the evidence, and because the court erred in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 2 to the jury; but the court overruled the motion for new trial, and defendant excepted, and the court signed, sealed, and made part of the record the defendant's bills of exceptions, and also certified and made part of the record the instructions given and refused, and all the evidence in the cause. There are two points assigned as error: (1) That plaintiff's instruction No. 2 is erroneous; (2) that it is inconsistent with defendant's instructions, especially defendant's instruction No. 2. Plaintiff's instruction No. 1 is as follows: "The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the machine was sold on a guaranty, and that after a fair trial it did do the work as guaranteed, then the verdict should be for the plaintiff." Plaintiff's instruction No. 2 is as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the machine was to give satisfaction to the defendant, then it should be a fair and reasonable satisfaction, and not a whimsical or unreasonable satisfaction." This is the only one to which defendant objected. The instruction No. 2 given for defendant reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they find from the evidence that the machine, the price of which is in question, was sold to the defendant with the understanding and agreement that if it did not give satisfaction to the defendant the seller would take it, then the defendant had a right to refuse to keep the machine if it did not in fact give him satisfaction, and the burden of proving that it did give him satisfaction is on the plaintiff." Now, the appellant must make it manifest from the record that the ruling complained of is wrong.

The first question is, what were the terms, the language, the words of the contract of sale? The parties, instead of committing it to writing, and thus giving us a stable and trustworthy memorial that could speak for itself, have seen fit to commit it to the uncertain, slippery memory of man as to the terms, the words used; for on some of the very words the meaning and scope of the contract in large part depends. For this we have to look to the evidence, what the parties said and did, the nature of the subject of sale, and the surrounding circumstances. There is no controversy that the cultivated land on defendant's farm was sidling, sloping, some of it steep. He had an old reaper that did not bind. Whether a binder could be used on it safely, usefully, was in his mind doubtful, and up to that time unknown. The two agents of plaintiff who were together and made the sale were examined as witnesses on behalf of plaintiffs. The first one said defendant was to give for the binder his old reaper and $120; one-half payable in a year, and the balance in two years. "We guaranteed for the machine to do as good work as any other machine of the same nature, to be as light running as any other reaping machine, and to do as good work in every particular. Defendant was to take the machine out, and if it did not do the work we guaranteed it to do defendant was to bring it back, and we were to pay him for hauling it out (10 miles) and back. He got the machine June 26th. It was set up and started June 30, 1890." On July 3, 1890, witness got a card from defendant, saying: "My binder does not work right. You can come and get it;" and on the 18th of July, 1890, another card, saying, "Your reaper is here at your order." He told defendant that their machine would not go on a certain sloping field with the platform on the upper side without upsetting, but could not be upset with the platform on the lower side. He said that the machine was not sold on the condition that it was to give satisfaction, but defendant was to take the machine and try it, and, if it did not do its work well, it (the plaintiff) was to pay for hauling it out and back. The second agent, who helped to make the sale, and was present, and seemed to be principal agent, in answer to the question, "What was the cause of the upsetting?" said: "Well, the weight is always on the left-hand side, and in a right-hand binder the binding attachment don't make weight. To put the platform up the hill, the sideling will turn it over. It will not turn clear over, but it will upset, and stop the binder, and stop the running of the shoes." On the question of giving defendant satisfaction he said: "In guarantying the machine to do its work properly we always guaranty it to give the man satisfaction, because a machine doing its work properly must always give satisfaction. If a man has a farm that wouldn't be fit for any binder, that is something else. Of course, we can't satisfy every farm, but we can the man." Defendant testified that it cut the grain off as nice as any machine and tied the grain, but told plaintiff's agents that it worried his horses too much. On the main item here involved—the terms of the contract—he testified that he was to haul out the machine, and if it gave him satisfaction he was to take it; if it did not, he was to haul it back, and plaintiff was to pay for hauling it out and back; and when plaintiff's agents came out to see him about it, after receiving the cards, he told them in substance that he did not intend to take the machine. They replied, "You will have to keep the machine, and pay for it." This was not denied. Another witness, and one not interested, as far as appears, who was present at the sale, examined for defendant, said, by the contract, defendant was not to take the machine if it did not give him satisfaction. The evidence, therefore, at least tended to show that kind of conditional sale called in the books a "sale on trial," or "a sale or return." See Benj. Sales, (Bennett's 6th Ed.) § 595 et seq. and notes; Id. p. 568, notes 10, 11, et seq.; 21 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 647, 648, 714, cases cited; Tied. Sales, § 213 and cases; Machine Co. v. Smith, 50 Mich. 587, 15 N. W. 906; Seeley v. Welles, 120 Pa. St. 75, 13 Atl. 736; Gray v. Bank, (City Ct. N. Y.) 10 N. Y. Supp. 5. If it is a "sale on trial," it is said to be a sale on condition precedent to buy if satisfied; that is, the title does not pass until the condition prescribed is fully performed, although the possession is delivered; being rather a bailment with an option to buy than a sale. If it is a "sale or return" it is said to be a sale on condition subsequent; that is, the title passes with the possession, but to be divested if the condition is not performed and the property returned. "If the condition of the sale be that the property may be returned if it do not prove 'satisfactory' to the buyer, or if the buyer is not satisfied with it after trial, the condition must be fully performed; that is, the buyer must in fact be satisfied. If the buyer expresses himself to be dissatisfied, it matters not how unreasonable or groundless his dissatisfaction may be, he cannot be required to keep the property. The buyer is not obliged to be satisfied although the property delivered conforms to his order. But some of the cases require that the dissatisfaction shall be real (not feigned) in order to relieve the buyer from liability, although they recognize that the dissatisfaction may be unreasonable without affecting the right of rejection." Tied. Sales, § 214; 1 Whart. Cont. § 590; Benj. Sales, (Bennett's 6th Ed.) § 595 et seq., Amer. notes, 569; 2 Add. Cont. top p. 53, (Abbott's Ed. notes 1883.) "Sales are not always absolute. The acceptance is sometimes made conditional, and delivery given accordingly, and then no complete execution of the contract can take place until the condition is fulfilled. Instances of this are found in sales 'on trial' and the bargain of 'sale or return.' It is obvious that one may take a chattel on the understanding that he is to try it before the purchase shall take full effect; or again, upon a complete present bargain, with the reservation of a right on the buyer's part to return it at his option within some period; and the main object of either provision is to give the buyer a chance to test the thing, and find it satisfactory, before he shall be finally bound to the bargain. But the concession thus made by the seller is not coextensive in the two cases, for the one puts the test as a condition precedent to divesting the seller fully of his property, while the other seems rather to carry property to the buyer defeasible on the condition subsequent of a test which proves unsatisfactory, though this application of a test must be, after all, a matter often within the buyer's own breast, and a sort of ill-defined ingredient in determining his satisfaction or dissatisfaction. The point towards which these decisions gravitate is doubtless that of mutual intention, but using the terms above stated in no technical sense, since common-sense men will every day make bargains of either character without designating them by any particular names, we find the distinction quite marked as regards the immediate passing of property, between sales 'on trial,' 'on approval,' and the like, and the bargain of sale or return. There is a buyer's option to be sure, but, as

It has been fitly said, an option to purchase if the buyer likes is essentially different from an option to return a purchase if he should not like it. In the one case the property will not pass until the option is determined; in the other the property passes at once, subject to the right to rescind and return." 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. (2d Ed.) § 310. In the one case the buyer is a bailee, rather than a buyer in fact, the title not having passed; in the other the title has passed by the delivery of possession, subject to defeasance by the exercise of the option reserved to rescind and return. But on the point here involved each may, as a general rule, return peremptorily within the time without giving any reason, if he acts honestly,—a question to be determined by the intent of the parties. It is a question of intention of the parties, and of the construction of the meaning of the conditional sale according to its terms, its subject-matter, and the surrounding circumstances. "In the one class of cases the right of decision is completely reserved to the promisor, without being liable to disclose reasons or account for his course; and a right to inquire into the grounds of his action and overhaul his determination is absolutely excluded from the promisee and from all tribunals. It is sufficient for the result that he willed it. The law regards the parties as competent to contract in that manner, and, if the facts are sufficient to show that they did so, their stipulation is the law of the case." (Machine Co. v. Smith, 50 Mich. 567, 15 N. W. 906,) although the dissatisfaction may appear to be "whimsical or unreasonable," if expressed in good faith. Seeley v. Welles, 120 Pa. St. 69, 13 Atl. 736. In such cases it is generally for the buyer to decide for himself; to decide whether a refusal to accept is or is not reasonable; because he uses for that purpose a term which indicates the state of his own feelings, which it is hard for any one to know so well as himself; and he may have prescribed the term for the purpose of protecting the gratification of some whim or fancy of his own, at all events to protect himself from the necessity of rendering any reason for his conduct. Such sales on trial are almost universally so construed in the every day affairs of life. But there may be cases—have been cases—where, owing to some peculiarity of subject-matter or other peculiarity, such optional contract may be construed as binding the buyer to decide on fair and reasonable grounds, or to the extent of ascertaining whether the dissatisfaction be real; that is, whether it in fact exists. But generally his own feeling of dissatisfaction is enough, and his own announcement of it is to be taken as true. So that if the defendant took the binder on the condition that if it did not give him satisfaction,—which the evidence certainly tends to prove, and which is the basis of the instruction given for defendant,—then instruction No. 2 given for plaintiff is erroneous; for there is nothing to show that defendant intended the question of his satisfaction or dissatisfaction to be canvassed, or his decision reviewed. Such a doctrine would upset the whole law of sales on trial, and breed infinite uncertainty and confusion.

Defendant testified, in substance, that after trial he was dissatisfied with the binder; that it did not suit his farm; his team could not handle it; it worried his horses; told plaintiff's agent that he did not propose to worry his horses any more with it, and the agent replied, "You will have to keep the machine, and pay for it." "His objections to the reaper may have been ill-founded; indeed, they may have been in some sense unreasonable in the opinion of others; yet if they were made in good faith he had a right, if his testimony is believed, to reject it. If he wanted a machine that was satisfactory to himself, not to other people, and contracted in this form, upon what principle shall he be bound to accept one that he expressly disapproved? What the learned court said to the jury on this point was equivalent to saying that, although the reaper may have been wholly unsatisfactory to the defendant, yet if the jury thought he ought to have been satisfied he was bound to take it; whereas, if the defendant's testimony is true, he was to judge of the merits of the machine himself, not the bystanders or the jury; and if he exercised his own judgment in good faith in the refusal to accept it he was certainly not bound for the price." Clark, J., delivering the opinion in Seeley v. Welles, 120 Pa. St. 69-75, 13 Atl. 736. See Railroad Co. v. Brydon, 65 Md. 198, 8 Atl. 306, opinion of Alvey, C. J., on motion for rehearing, and cases cited; Gibson v. Cranage, 39 Mich. 49; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray, 139; Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136; Zaleski v. Clark, 44 Conn. 218; Harvesting-Mach. Co. v. Chesrown, 33 Minn. 32, 21 N. W. 846; Slisby Manuf'g Co. v. Town of Chico, 24 Fed. 893; Pierce v. Cooley, 56 Mich. 552, 23 N. W. 310; Goodrich v. Van Northwick, 43 Ill. 445; Boiler Co. v. Garden, 101 N. Y. 387, 4 N. E. 749, and 54 Amer. Rep. 709, notes. Neither is the bad instruction given for plaintiff cured by the good one given for defendant, nor can we regard the one given for plaintiff as thereby plainly withdrawn. McKelvey v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 500, 517, 14 S. E. 261. The general rule is that the court may cure errors in its instructions by withdrawing, explaining, or correcting them. When a material instruction is given that is erroneous it should be effectively withdrawn. Elliott, App. Proc. § 705; Kirland v. State, 43 Ind. 146; and other cases cited in note to said section 705. "The court cannot, without fatal error, give contradictory instructions to the jury, since that would impose upon them the duty of determining the law as well as the facts." Elliott, App. Proc. § 705; City of Logansport v. Dykeman, 116 Ind. 15, 17 N. E. 587. Nor could the court have intended instruction No. 2 given for plaintiff as a modification or qualification of No. 2 afterwards given for defendant, for that would not be readily comprehended, even if so intended; and, if intelligible to the jury, would make the last instruction erroneous as well as the first, (see Carrico v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 389-404, 14 S. E. 12,) as the error would be in the correction.

It is claimed on the part of plaintiff that the jury would be justified in finding that the contract was one of guaranty, as claimed by the plaintiff; and, if so, the court could not set the verdict aside. It is true that the inquiry is, what was the intention of the parties? And when that intention is ascertained the law will respect it. The question whether a sale of personal property is complete or only executory is to be determined from the intent of the parties as gathered from the contract, the nature and situation of the thing sold, and the circumstances surrounding the sale. Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1, 14. That there was a guaranty or warranty, I think, is clearly shown, and that, so far as the cutting and binding were concerned, and the lightness of draft on ground well suited to the use of such binder, the machine was all that it was guarantied to be. But it is past contradiction that there was competent evidence tending to prove that the buyer, who cultivated sidling and steep land, was expressly reserving the right to reject and send back the machine if on trial it should not be satisfactory to him, positively and generally, without saying in what respect. His mind was fixed immovably that no chance should be left to force the article upon him unless he finally chose to take it; and this condition was added to meet this purpose, and, we may infer, was the one thing which induced the defendant to take it. See Machine Co. v. Smith, 50 Mich. 565, 15 N. W. 906, cited above. Promising to do a thing only in case it pleases himself may be no promise at all, yet is what the books call a "sale on trial," and may become by mere lapse of time a binding promise; and I can see nothing unreasonable or unfair in such everyday quasi contracts of sale. It is the custom and habit of the people, especially with regard to certain kinds of property. On the contrary, it would be harsh, if not unreasonable, to compel such a buyer without his fault to keep a binder that could not be safely or profitably used on such land as his, to which important item the guaranty did in no wise relate; and it shows the importance, as well as the motive, of such qualifying reservation. The agents who sold the machine say in their testimony on this head, "Of course, we can't satisfy every farm, but we can the man."

It is also contended that the meaning and scope of the term "satisfaction" as it was used in this contract has been already fixed by this court in interpreting and construing it in a like contract in the case of Kinsley v. County Court, 31 W. Va. 464, 7 S. E. 445. Here the contractor, Kinsley, entered into a written contract with the county court to make a road and build a bridge according to certain specifications set out, and "to the satisfaction of the county court of Monongalia county." On demurrer the court held that the declaration was not faulty in not alleging that the work was not done to the satisfaction of the court; that "it means in that contract that it must be done according to the specifications, and that would be to the satisfaction of the court; that is, that the county court was to accept it as completed, when it was satisfied that the work had been done and the bridge completed according to the specifications,"—a very reasonable construction, so far as necessary on general demurrer to notice it in the declaration, and very likely in any construction of the contract. But such a contract is very different from a "sale on trial," with the absolute and unqualified option to return if not satisfactory. A man might sell his horse on the latter terms, as is often done; but they seldom or never knowingly build bridges on such terms. In the bridge case, the subject-matter, the finality of the written contract at its inception, its reason and object, rebutted the idea of the reservation of the arbitrary power of refusal to accept and to pay; whereas the same things in part, and the want of some of them, show such reservation in an ordinary sale on trial of a horse or machine to have been intended by the parties, which is at last the decisive test.

Counsel for plaintiff also contends that the instructions given for defendant were erroneous. The plaintiff could waive such error if it saw fit, and let the verdict in its favor stand; or, if dissatisfied, it could move the court to set it aside, and grant it a new trial. It elected to let it stand, and a judgment for plaintiff ought not to be reversed on the ground that the court, at the instance of the defendant, gave an erroneous instruction to the jury. Murrell v. Johnson's Adm'r, 1 Hen. & M. 450.

But the point urged with greatest force on behalf of plaintiff is that the error, if any, in giving its instruction No. 2, was a harmless error; "that the facts and circumstances certainly warranted the verdict of the jury." It is held in many cases that, when the verdict is clearly right on the evidence, errors in instructions may be treated as harmless. This is made so by statute in the state of Indiana. Rev. St. Ind. 1881, § 658. See a full and able discussion of the subject in Elliott, App. Proc. c. 4, § 643; Oil Co. v. Bretz, 98 Ind. 231, and other cases cited; 3 Grah. & W. New Trials, 862. There has been and is a tendency no doubt to advance and widen the doctrine of harmless error. It is due in part to the desire constantly pressing upon appellate tribunals to reach the substantial merits of the case in spite of errors that are for the occasion deemed immaterial or to have done no harm. Hence the rule has long been settled that when the court can clearly see affirmatively that the error has worked no harm to the party appealing it will be disregarded, (Gilmer v. Higley, 110 U. S. 47, 3 Sup. Ct. 471;) and the judgment ought not to be reversed on the ground that the court below admitted illegal evidence, or gave an erroneous instruction to the jury, unless it appears that some injury could possibly have resulted therefrom to the party appealing, (Preston v. Harvey, 2 Hen. & M. 55;) for the appellant must make it manifest from the record in some way that the ruling against him is wrong. But, that being done, it is taken to be to his prejudice until the contrary is made to appear, and it must appear so clearly as to be beyond all fair ground of questioning that the error did not and could not with any reasonable degree of likelihood have prejudiced the party's rights. See Deery v. Cray, 5 Wall. 795, 807. This qualification of the general rule, or this cautious and sparing application of it, rests upon the ground that the court cannot instruct upon the weight of evidence or the credibility of witnesses, and upon the settled rule that when there is any competent evidence fairly tending in some appreciable degree to prove his case the party has the right to have the law applicable to such evidence correctly declared to the jury by the court. "Their superintendence in explaining and deciding legal questions is essential to the proper administration of justice, and ought to be exercised when either party requires their interference." Picket v. Morris, (1796,) 2 Wash. (Va.) 325-346; Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Grat. 486. Our own cases on the general subject are numerous, and indicate a tendency sometimes to extend the rule, at others to adhere strictly to the limitation of the rule. See the following cases on the subject: Hall v. Lyons, 29 W. Va. 410-420, 1 S. E. 582; State v. Douglass, 28 W. Va. 298; Mason v. Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 224-239; Clay v. Robinson, 7 W. Va. 350, 358; Beatty v. Railway Co., 6 W. Va. 388-395; Preston v. Harvey, 2 Hen. & M. 55; Pitman v. Breckenridge, 3 Grat. 127; Wiley v. Givens, 6 Grat. 277; Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Grat. 87; Kincheloe v. Tracewells, Id. 587; Rea v. Trotter, 26 Grat. 585-600; Binh v. Waddill, 32 Grat. 588, 593. In McKelvey v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 500-517, 14 S. E. 261, it is said: "This court has repeatedly held that an erroneous instruction is presumed to prejudice a party, and will cause reversal, unless it clearly appears that the instruction could not have been prejudicial" to the exceptant. The court will not reverse on account of an erroneous instruction on an immaterial point. Pitman v. Breckenridge, 3 Grat. 127. In Davies v. Miller, (1797,) 1 Call, 110, upon the trial of a writ of right, both parties claimed under John Miller, who died seised in 1742; the demandant claiming under Christopher, his grandson and heir at law; the tenants, under a devise from Christopher, the son. After certain evidence was given on behalf of the demandant, the tenants moved the court, without going into evidence on their part, to instruct the jury that for reasons apparent the said devise was void; and the court, being of that opinion, instructed accordingly. The jury found for the tenants, and demandant, on bill of exceptions, appealed. The court of appeals, though of opinion that the grounds of the ruling of the court below were wrong, and to that extent the language of the instruction given, yet, as it appeared by the demandant's own showing that Christopher, the grandson, had neither seisin, possession, nor title, so that demandant could derive none from him, the opinion and verdict were substantially right, and the court affirmed the judgment. "The instruction there bore upon the question which was decisive of the cause." Wiley v. Givens, (1849,) 6 Grat. 277-285, opinion of Judge Allen. The instruction involved a question of law upon a state of facts about which there was no dispute. It is said in the syllabus of Wiley v. Givens, (made by the reporter:) "When an appellate court is of opinion that an instruction given to the jury by the court below is erroneous, the appellate court cannot undertake to determine that the verdict, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction, is right upon the evidence, and therefore to affirm the judgment; but the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial." This is correct, as applied to the facts of this particular case; but Judge Allen did not mean to announce any such general proposition. On the contrary, the implication is that it would be otherwise if the instruction were substantially right, and therefore could work no injury; but in a case where the jury may have been warranted in their verdict by the whole evidence, yet where they may have been misled by the erroneous instruction in regard to so much of the case as the instruction referred to, the verdict must be set aside, and the cause sent back for a new trial. This case is much stronger, for if the jury followed plaintiff's instruction No. 2, given by the court, they were misled in regard to what, in our view, was the vital point in the case; for there is at least evidence tending to show that the agents of plaintiff, by their conduct and declarations, had dispensed with and virtually waived the necessity, if any such existed, of defendant returning the machine to them at Cameron. But the case is reversed for the reason that instruction No. 2, given on motion of plaintiff, was erroneous; and no opinion is intended to be given on the merits other than is necessarily involved, for on a new trial the evidence even as to that point may be different. Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded.

CORE v. OHIO RIVER R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1893.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — INJURY TO BRAKEMAN — PERMITTING FIREMAN TO ACT AS ENGINEER.

1. If the defendant, after the court has overruled its motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence on the ground of insufficiency, proceeds with its defense, and introduces its evidence, this court will disregard such motion, and will not reverse the judgment, unless it appears that the whole evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury.

2. Two servants of a common master may occupy a threefold relation towards each other, entirely dependent on the duties imposed upon them by their employment, to wit, that of (1) superior or master, (2) co-ordinate or fellow servant, (3) inferior or servant.

3. Where an engineer, with authority so to do, places an inexperienced and incompetent fireman in charge of an engine, the company is liable for unavoidable injuries that result to other employes by such fireman's unskillful management of the engine, for the reason that it is a breach of the duty the company owes to its employes to exercise ordinary care in providing and retaining competent servants.

4. When an action is founded on the incompetency of a fireman temporarily in charge of an engine, the plaintiff must prove (1) that the fireman was so inexperienced in the management of an engine that it was not an exercise of ordinary care to place him in charge thereof, he not being reasonably safe and fit for the employment; (2) that he was guilty of mismanagement of the engine by reason of his inexperience and unskillfulness; (3) that such mismanagement was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

Error to circuit court, Wood county.

Action for personal injuries by Ellis T. Core against the Ohio River Railroad Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Leonard & Archer, for plaintiff in error.
George Loomis, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. Suit was instituted in the circuit court of Wood county by Ellis T. Core, plaintiff, against the Ohio River Railroad Company, claiming damages for an injury received while in the employ of the defendant as a brakeman. The defendant appeared, and demurred to the declaration. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant pleaded not guilty. A trial was had, and a judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff on the 9th day of January, 1892, for the sum of $1,600. Defendant obtained a writ of error to this court, and now relies on the following assignment of errors, to wit: "First. The court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's declaration.

Second. The court erred in permitting the several questions to be asked, and the answers thereto to be given in evidence to the jury, as set out in defendant's bill of exceptions No. 1. Third. The court erred in overruling defendant's motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, and to direct a verdict for the defendant, as set out in bill of exceptions No. 2. Fourth. The court erred in overruling defendant's motion to set aside the verdict for the reasons set out in bill of exceptions No. 3. Fifth. The court erred in overruling defendant's motion to set aside the verdict of the jury upon the grounds set out in bill of exceptions No. 4. Sixth. The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury as set forth in bill of exceptions No. 5. Seventh. The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury as set forth in bill of exceptions No. 6. Eighth. The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury as set forth in bill of exceptions No. 7."

1. The demurrer to the declaration is without foundation, and it requires a considerable stretch of imagination to give its language the construction claimed by the defendant's counsel, as it seems to me to plainly charge that an incompetent fireman was discharging the duties usually devolving on a skillful engineer, and that thereby he had control of the movements of the train at the time of the accident, and that his unskillfulness was the cause thereof. The context shows that there was no pretense nor attempt to charge that he was acting in lieu of the conductor. The demurrer was properly overruled.

2. The following questions and answers were objected to by defendant: "Question. Mr. Core, I wish you would state to the court and jury where Raven Rock is situated, and whether that is a station on this road. Where is it situated as between St. Mary's and Clarrington? Answer. There is a station there that is called Raven Rock, situated just a short distance above St. Mary's. I do not know the exact distance. Question. State whether you received any directions from the conductor at Raven Rock to stop the train as you were going towards St. Mary's; and, if so, what the directions were. * * * Question. State what instructions, if any, you received at that point from the conductor about stopping the train, or signaling to stop the train. Answer. Well, the conductor gave me orders to signal the train to stop at Raven Rock, so that the engineer could go to his post; and I went out on top of the train, and gave him the signal to stop, and got no answer, and I set some brakes,—three or four brakes,—and still got no answer. I gave him a second signal with my lantern, and got no answer; and I went back to the conductor, and told him I could get no answer from the engine. * * * The Court. I will allow you to prove the instructions of the conductor—the man who had charge of this train—to this man. Question. Well, what were they? Answer. Well, he told me to have the train stopped, or to stop the train,—to give them the signal to stop,—which I did. Question. State whether you communicated that fact to the conductor, that you got no response back from the engineer. * * *

Question. Well, what did he say in that connection about stopping at St. Mary's? The Court. What instructions did he give you about stopping at St. Mary's? Answer. The instructions he gave me about stopping at St. Mary's was to have the train stopped there at the south end of the switch, and back into the switch,—was all the instructions that was given to me about St. Mary's,—to back in and allow the other train to pull up alongside of us, and to pull back on the main track, and let the train going north pass us. That was the only instruction given about St. Mary's." The defendant objects to this evidence, because it shows that the fireman was acting as engineer before the train reached the place of the accident. This evidence was not proper to show any negligence on the part of the conductor or engineer, but it was admissible on the question of competency or incompetency of the fireman to discharge the duties of the engineer. The brakeman certainly had the right to tell what instructions the conductor gave him as to what was to be done at St. Mary's, the place of the accident. And the following question, propounded to the witness T. B. Ayers, was answered by him: "Question. Well, state whether or not it is not usual, when cars come together, that they come along so gently as not to produce a jar. Answer. Yes, sir; there is cars come together that a man on the front end would not feel the jar from the hind end." Defendant objects to the foregoing, because it is an effort to prove a custom, and is expert testimony from one not an expert. I cannot see how this question could effect the issue either way, or how the defendant can be greatly prejudiced by it. Any member of the jury, if he had ever been about a railroad, could have testified the same way, and could have also testified that "there are cars come together that a man on the front end would feel the jar from the hind end." Matters in the knowledge of all men are outside the pale of proof, especially if of everyday occurrence. Where there is perfection in the track and machinery and the men handling it, cars might always be brought together without a jar, but such perfection as this is hardly practicable of attainment in all places and under all circumstances. The question was leading, and the witness was at first led into an answer he did not intend; but he afterwards modified it in such a way as to make his meaning clear. Awkwardly asked, awkwardly answered, and not much harm done.

In the sixth, seventh, and eighth assignments of error defendant complains of the court's refusal to give the following three instructions, to wit: (1) "The jury are further instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the engineer, Charles Miller, was on the locomotive, and that E. C. Hogan, the fireman, was handling the locomotive under the direction of the said Charles Miller, that in such case the locomotive was under the control of the engineer, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this suit, although the jury may believe from the evidence that the engineer was negligent in directing said fireman in the management of said locomotive, and that such negligence caused the plaintiff's injury." (2) "The jury are further instructed, as a matter of law, that, if other things are equal, affirmative testimony is in general entitled to more weight than negative testimony; and if you believe from the evidence that the witnesses Charles Miller and E. C. Hogan are credible witnesses, and you find that they have sworn that they were both on the defendant's locomotive at the time the plaintiff was injured, and that the engineer was in control of said locomotive, then this is what is known as 'affirmative testimony,' and is for that reason entitled to more weight than negative testimony; and if you further believe from the evidence that the witnesses Ellis T. Core, T. B. Ayers, and J. W. Taggart are credible witnesses, and you find that they have sworn that they were also present and giving signals and attempting to make the coupling at the time of the accident, and did not know whether or not the engineer, Charles Miller, was on the locomotive, and in control thereof, then their evidence on this point is what is known as 'negative evidence,' and for that reason is entitled to less weight than the testimony of the witnesses Charles Miller and E. C. Hogan upon the same point, provided you further believe from the evidence that the witnesses Ellis T. Core, T. B. Ayers, James Taggart, Charles Miller, and E. C. Hogan are otherwise entitled to equal credit, and that they have been corroborated to the same extent." (3) "The jury are further instructed that while, under our law, a party to a suit is a competent witness, and it allows him to testify in his own behalf, still the jury are the judges of the credibility and weight of such testimony; and in this case, in determining the weight and credibility of the evidence of the plaintiff, the fact that he is interested in the result of the suit, if it so appears from the evidence, may be taken into account by the jury, and they may give his testimony only such weight as they think it fairly entitled to under all the circumstances of the case, and in view of the interest of the plaintiff in the result of this suit." The first instruction is bad, because it assumes the fact that the locomotive was under the control of the engineer if they believe the other two facts stated; and, ignoring all the other evidence in the case, instructs the jury to find for the defendant. The fireman might have been, in the belief of the jury, so utterly incompetent that the locomotive was not under the control of any one; and if the negligence of the engineer in permitting such a person, even under his direction, to attempt to handle a locomotive at a critical juncture, when skill and experience are required, could be traced back to the company in any way, it would be liable for the injury occasioned by such negligence. In the case of Railway Co. v. Col-larn, 5 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 555, it was held that a railroad company which permits an engineer to place an engine in the hands of a careless and incompetent fireman is guilty of negligence, and liable for damages to a conductor injured by reason of such negligence. See, also, Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 145; Storrs v. Felck, 24 W. Va. 606. The second instruction violates the rule that instructions should be clear, accurate, concise, and not argumentative, confusing, or unintelligible to the jury. State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 800; Dickeschied v. Bank, 28 W. Va. 340. The third instruction was not justified by the plaintiff's evidence, which appears to have been straightforward, sincere, and truthful, without any attempt on his part to color it in his own behalf. Neither is he contradicted in any material point by any witness, but is fully corroborated by all of them and the circumstances. The instruction seems to have been offered for the purpose of disparaging and prejudicing him in the minds of the jury without just cause, and, if given, could have only had the effect to have produced an opposite impression from that intended, and would have prejudiced, instead of benefited, the defendant's cause, as intelligent jurors are generally very quick to perceive the unjust attempts of counsel to bias their opinions by instructions aimed at the reputation for truth and veracity of the party against whom they are contending, not justified by such party's conduct or testimony. Instructions must be pertinent, and based on the evidence. Moore v. Douglass, 14 W. Va. 708.

In its third assignment of error the defendant insists that the court erred in overruling its motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, and direct a verdict for the defendant. If error, this could not be taken advantage of in this court, if, when the motion was made and overruled, the defendant, instead of at once closing the case, proceeded to reopen it, and introduce his own evidence. This motion is not founded on a variance between the allegations and the proofs, nor because of incompetent testimony, but upon the insufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence by reason of some omission or failure of proof on his part; and this omission may be supplied by the evidence of the defendant, and it would be a vain thing for this court to sustain the motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence for insufficiency alone, if the whole evidence, taken together, should establish the right of plaintiff to recover, as it would only be sending him back to go through the farce of another trial; and, if the whole evidence shows the case is for the defendant, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, then it would make no difference whether the court acted on the motion to exclude or the motion to set aside the verdict, the result would be the same. In either case the remedy would be to award a new trial. This practice seems to prevail in the federal courts, and in the case of Railway Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 700, 1 Sup. Ct. 493, the supreme court of the United States held: "Although the refusal at the close of the testimony for the plaintiff to direct a verdict for the defendants would justify a reversal of a judgment against them, yet, if they proceed with their defense, and introduce testimony which is not in the record, the judgment on the verdict, which the jury, under proper instructions, find against them, will not be reversed on account of that refusal." Chief Justice Waite says in his opinion: "The present case comes within this rule. The evidence introduced on the part of the company is not in the bill of exceptions, and the court was not asked to instruct the jury to find for the defendant on the whole case. Under such circumstances it must be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that when the case was closed on both sides there was enough in the testimony to make it proper to leave the issue to be settled by the jury. In this we are not to be understood as saying that the instruction ought to have been given when it was asked." In that case the defendant omitted its testimony from the record, and endeavored in the supreme court to rely on its motion in the court below to direct a verdict for it, because of the insufficiency of the plaintiff's testimony; but the supreme court refused to reverse the lower court, although it erred, for the reason that the defendant's evidence might have supplied the insufficiency of the plaintiff's, and rendered the case a proper one for submission to the jury. In this case the defendant's evidence is in the record, and for the same reasons that actuated that court this court will disregard the motion to exclude as waived by the defendant's proceeding with the case, and consider the whole evidence, either on a motion to set aside the verdict or in arrest of judgment, and will not reverse the judgment unless the evidence as a whole is insufficient to justify the finding of the jury. Relating to motions to exclude, see the case of Carrico v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 389, 14 S. E. 12; Bon Aqua Imp. Co. v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 34 W. Va. 766, 12 S. E. 771.

The fourth assignment of error is based on the special verdict in answer to certain questions of fact propounded by the defendant under chapter 131, § 5, Warth's Code, being the same as in the present Code. The questions were 23 in number, and the answers given by the jury may be summed up as follows, to wit: The plaintiff was engaged as a freight brakeman. His employment was somewhat hazardous. He was employed under Conductor Taggart, who had control of and was operating the train. The employees were five in number, all under the control of the conductor. The conductor directed the plaintiff to make the coupling, and was two or three car lengths from him when he was injured, and Brakeman Ayers was on the second or third car from engine. The jury disagreed as to whether Charles Miller was on the engine, directing the fireman as to its management. That Fireman E. O. Hogan had very little experience in managing locomotives, and was not competent to handle a locomotive while making couplings. At the time of the accident both plaintiff and engineer were subject to the orders of the conductor, but the engineer was off duty. The cause of the accident was the negligence of the conductor. The defendant insists, "if the jury could not agree as to whether or not the engineer was on the locomotive, that under the law of master and servant the general verdict of guilty ought not to stand." The view, undoubtedly, the jury took of the case was that a wholly incompetent fireman was managing the engine, with the permission, express or implied, so to do from the conductor, and by reason of his ignorance and unskillfulness caused this accident. That the conductor had authority from the company to forbid the fireman managing the engine, and to require the regular engineer to manage it; and therefore it made no difference in this case whether the fireman was acting under the direction of the engineer or not. An accident having been occasioned by his unskillfulness while engaged about its business by its permission, through its conductor, the defendant was liable; it amounting to the same thing as if the company, knowing the unskillfulness of the fireman, had temporarily hired him, and placed him in charge of the engine. The provision of the statute is that, "where any such separate verdict or special finding shall be inconsistent with the general verdict the former shall control the latter and the court shall give judgment accordingly." The jury manifested decided intelligence in their findings. The large number of questions appear to have been carefully prepared for the purpose of entrapping them into inconsistent answers, and thus rendering their general verdict a nullity; but, if such was the intention they seem to have divined it, and neatly foiled the questioner, as their findings are in no wise inconsistent, even though they may be unsupported by the evidence and the law governing the same.

The fifth and remaining assignment of error, being for the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and evidence, raises the real merits of this controversy. On this question the court is limited to the inquiry as to whether the verdict of the jury is plainly unwarranted by the evidence under the law applicable thereto. If not, the judgment must be affirmed. The facts established by the plaintiff's evidence were as follows, to-wit: A freight train belonging to the defendant was passing south over the defendant's road, manned by James W. Taggart, conductor, in charge of train; Charles Miller, engineer; Ed C. Hogan, fireman; Ellis T. Core (plaintiff) and T. B. Ayers, brakemen. At Clarington, the engineer, complaining of illness, left the engine in charge of the fireman, and lay down in the caboose. The train proceeded about 30 miles, to Raven Rock, a point near St. Mary's, where the conductor told the plaintiff to signal the fireman to stop the train, so that the engineer could get on the engine. The plaintiff did so, but, getting no response from the engine, informed the conductor, who instructed the plaintiff to let the train run on to St. Mary's, where they had orders to stop, and there to back the train in at the south end of the siding, so as to let the north-bound passenger train pass them. When the south end of the siding at St. Mary's was reached, and the train stopped, the engineer got off the caboose and started towards the engine, and the plaintiff got off and opened the switch, and gave the signal to back. There were some cars on the siding, which would make the train too long for it, and to let the passenger train by it was necessary to fasten these cars to the train already composed of about 20 cars, and back them as the rear end of the train backed out the north end of the siding until the engine was safe in the siding, and then, after the passenger train passed by the south switch, to run the rear end of the train back so the passenger train could pass it. The plaintiff, with the assistance of the other brakeman, who was stationed on top of the train about two car lengths from the engine, made the first coupling. The conductor then came out of the caboose, and took his station about three car lengths from plaintiff. Plaintiff gave the signals. They were repeated by the conductor to the front brakeman, who transmitted them to the engine. It was about 9 o'clock at night, quite dark, and the signals were made with lanterns. Plaintiff, standing close to the car to be coupled to the train, signaled for the train to back. The train moved back slowly until within six feet of the car, and plaintiff signaled to slow up, and reached forward and caught hold of the link in the end of the moving train, and raised it for the purpose of inserting it in the bumper of the other car, when the train or hind car came back with a sudden movement, and caught his hand between the bumpers, and mashed it off. He immediately cried out, the train was moved forward, and his hand was freed. The plaintiff had been working as a brakeman for about six weeks, before which he was in the shops. The conductor testified that the fireman, he thought, had not been known and recognized as a regular engineer capable of running engines at that time. For the present the defendant's evidence is omitted. Under his declaration the plaintiff was bound to prove by competent testimony: (1) That the fireman was unskillful, unlearned, and incompetent to manage an engine. (2) That he did manage it in an ignorant and unskillful manner; not making it quite so strong as his declaration, "in a violent, negligent, careless, rash, unskillful, and ignorant manner;" and that this mismanagement was the cause of the accident. (3) That the defendant knew, or ought to have known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, that the fireman was wholly unskillful, unlearned, and incompetent to manage an engine. (4) That if the engineer was present and directing the management of the engine by the fireman, and there was such mistake in such management as to cause the accident, it was wholly due to the unskillfulness of the fireman alone, and not due to the misdirection of the engineer. (5) That the plaintiff did not know that the fireman was managing the engine, and could not have known it by the use of ordinary care, and avoided the accident. (6) That the defendant permitted, either expressly or impliedly, the fireman to manage the engine. As to the last proposition the jury found that the conductor was guilty of negligence in that he permitted the fireman to manage the engine. This appears to be the conclusion they arrived at, both from their special verdict and the argument of the plaintiff's counsel. To arrive at this conclusion the jury must have been erroneously instructed in the law, as the conductor does not appear to have neglected his duties in any way at the time of the accident. In the case of Railway Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 877, 5 Sup. Ct. 184, Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, and commenting on the duties of a conductor, says: "We know from the manner in which railways are operated, that, subject to the general rules and orders of the directors of the companies, the conductor has entire control and management of the train to which he is assigned. He directs when it shall start, at what speed it shall run, at what stations it shall stop, and for what length of time, and everything essential to its successful movements; and all persons employed on it are subject to his orders." This language, being general, is liable to be misunderstood, and hence is misleading, especially the closing sentence, that "all persons employed on it are subject to his orders;" this should be limited to mean as to the movements of the train. He adds further: "In no proper sense of the term is he a fellow servant with the fireman, the brakeman, the porters, and the engineer." This is also misleading, because not limited by the nature of the duty or employment he is engaged in discharging. The employees of a railroad company oftentimes occupy not only a dual, but a threefold, relation towards each other, according to the duties they are called upon or delegated to perform, to wit, that of superior or master, co-ordinate or fellow servant, inferior or servant. For instance, in running the train, the conductor is the superior of the engineer, and in that particular he represents the master; in the separate management of the engine and the train from the engine back they are co-ordinate or fellow servants, each being independent in his own sphere; and in permitting the fireman or other person to manage the engine in his stead the engineer is the superior of the conductor, discharging a nonassignable duty, delegated to him by the master or company. As an illustration of and to support the last proposition I refer to the case of Harper v. Railroad Co., 47 Mo. 567, in which it was held that when an engineer placed a fireman in charge of the engine, acting under authority, either express or implied, his act in so doing was the act of the company, and that the company was liable to the conductor for injuries sustained by reason of the incompetency of such fireman.

For authorities sustaining the second, see 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 821; and for authorities to sustain the third, the case of Railway Co. v. Ross, above referred to, and also the case of Madden v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 610, approved in the case of Daniel's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. 162. The principles established by these citations are that where the injury is caused by an employe acting in the discharge of a duty that renders him inferior to or co-ordinate with the injured employe the master or company is not liable, but where he acts in a superior position the master is liable. These superior duties that the law devolves upon the master, and for the proper discharge by his delegated agents, servants, and employes he has been held responsible, have been established by the citations above to be as follows: (1) To exercise reasonable care in providing and keeping in repair suitable machinery, and all necessary appliances, including a safe place to labor; (2) to exercise a like care to provide and retain suitable servants for each department of service; (3) to establish, conform to, and enforce compliance with proper rules and regulations. In this case the conductor had nothing to do with the employment of the engineer or fireman. They were employed as suitable persons for and placed in their respective positions by an entirely different agent of the company, and he was given no authority over them outside of the control of the movements of the train. In all other respects they were independent of him. It was imposed upon the engineer as a duty by his master to make a skilled engineer of the fireman, and the conductor had no right to interfere and say when and how that duty should be performed, even if he was competent to do so. At least there is no evidence in this case tending to show such authority, and in the presence of such a painful vacuum we are compelled to fall back on judicial notice of the manner in which the great railways of the country are managed. Slater v. Jewett, 84 N. Y. 61. The conductor is not required to be a skilled engineer, or to know anything about the management of an engine. This is the engineer's co-ordinate duty, and the fireman is his assistant, and under his control. In training and making a skilled engineer out of the fireman he acts in his delegated capacity, and is the superior or master therein to all the other employes, conductor included. The conductor could order him out of the caboose, but on the engine he was entire master of the situation, and, within the sphere of his employment, as independent as the prince in his palace, or the poor man in his hovel. The jury, therefore, erred in its special finding that the conductor was guilty of negligence in permitting the fireman to manage the engine. This, however, is not a good reason for setting aside their general verdict, as there is no allegation in the declaration that charges the conductor with negligence, but the charge is a general one against the defendant, without pointing out the special servant in fault. The only trouble with them is they put the saddle on the wrong horse. If there was any negligence in placing the fireman in management of the engine, it was the engineer that was at fault, and in doing so he acted in discharge of a superior duty, and his act was the act of his master, the company, and his knowledge as to the competency or incompetency of the fireman was the knowledge of the company. We must therefore answer the sixth proposition stated above, as to proof required, in the affirmative, to wit, that the defendant permitted the fireman to manage the engine. Such permission, as shown by the references above, was a temporary employment for this purpose. In the case of Thompson v. Railway Co., 84 Mich. 281, 47 N. W. 584, it was held "that it is not necessarily negligent to allow a fireman to run the engine. * * * It is customary, and sometimes necessary; and it is the way in which fireman are educated to be engineers." And the court says further: "Whether it was negligent to allow this particular fireman to run the engine or not must depend on whether he had such experience in the work as to make him reasonably safe and fit for it." And this brings us in proper order to inquire, first, whether the fireman was unskilled, unlearned, and incompetent. The evidence introduced by the plaintiff to prove this allegation was, first, the failure of the fireman to respond to the signals at Raven's Rock; the testimony of the conductor, above quoted, that "the fireman was not known and recognized to be a skilled engineer;" and the accident itself. This proof is wholly insufficient. The proper inquiry is contained in the Thompson Case, last quoted, "whether he had such experience in the work as to make him reasonably safe and fit for it;" not whether he was known and recognized as a skilled engineer. The mere fact that he failed to notice and answer signals when he was under instruction to run to St. Mary's counts for very little, when no doubt the signals were unexpected, and he was watching the track in front of the engine, the place dangers are usually encountered. And it is to be presumed, although the evidence is silent on the subject, that the front brakeman was on the engine, acting as fireman, and it was his duty to watch the rear end of the train for signals from that direction, and his fault that they were not seen and communicated to the fireman. And the fact that the accident happened is not sufficient to show that the fireman had not had such experience in the work as to make him reasonably safe and fit for it, much less to show that he was "unskilled, unlearned, and incompetent." But the accident must be traced to some unskillful act of his, as the proximate cause of the injury; and that brings us to the second proposition, to wit, did he manage the engine in an ignorant and unskillful manner, and was this mismanagement the proximate cause of the accident? The plaintiff must prove this, and the only evidence to sustain it is the manner of the accident. If the accident was occasioned by the negligence, and not the incompetency, of the fireman, the defendant is not liable. The company cannot be required to answer for the negligent act of a competent fellow servant. That is one of the ordinary risks assumed by the plaintiff in his contract of service. "The general rule of law is now firmly established that one who enters the service of another takes upon himself the ordinary risks of the negligent acts of his fellow servants in the course of the employment." Randall v. Railroad Co., 109 U. S. 478, 3 Sup. Ct. 322; Rodman v. Railroad Co., (Mich.) 20 N. W. 788; Railroad Co. v. Myers, 55 Tex. 110; Greenwald v. Railway Co., 49 Mich. 197, 13 N. W. 513.

Admitting that the accident was caused by the act of the fireman, can we, from the evidence, say it was caused by his incompetency, or, being competent, his negligence? As heretofore shown, there is no proof of incompetency; hence we are bound to assume that it was an act of negligence, independent of the question of skill. But was this mismanagement the cause of the accident? The only answer to this is that the car came back with an accelerated speed for six feet. But the evidence does not enlighten us as to what caused the acceleration. The curvature, grade, and condition of the track, the length, heaviness, and friction of the cars and slack in the train, and loosening of the brakes, may all have been potent forces in the matter, independent of the pressure of the engine. The dark night and the plaintiff's inexperience and unskillfulness may have contributed to it. There is no proof that the fireman did anything wrong, but we are left to infer this from the manner of the accident. In the case of Kersey v. Railroad Co., 79 Mo. 362, it was held that "it is not enough that one servant is injured while an incompetent servant, known to the master to be such, is engaged in one common employment." "But the master cannot be held liable unless the incompetent servant was guilty of some negligence or misconduct directly contributing to produce the injury." The evidence on this subject—that is, the manner of the accident—tends as much to prove the proximate cause of the accident was the plaintiff's own inexperience and unskillfulness as to prove the incompetency of the fireman. The plaintiff had only been employed as a brakeman about six weeks. When he went to couple the car to the train he says the train "came back within three or four feet of the car I was going to couple to very steady. * * * I reached down and took hold of the link, and as I took hold of the link the cars came back with a crash, and caught me, and I hallooed. After some few minutes the train was pulled apart, and I got loose." Plaintiff does not testify that the impact of the train had any effect on the car, but the car appears to have stopped the train still. A train of 20 cars with an engine attached, moving with great speed, is not an irresistible force; neither is a single car an immovable object. But if a single car is able to stop immediately 20 such cars with a powerful and heavy locomotive pressing in the rear, reason must convince us at once that the engine was not exerting much impelling force, or that the train was not moving at any great speed, although the rear car, on account of slack in the train, might continue to move after the engine stopped. The circumstances and the evidence leave the question in doubt as to where the fault lay.

The third proposition, calling for proof on the part of the plaintiff, falls with the other two, for, if the plaintiff has failed to prove that the fireman was incompetent, much more has he failed to establish that the defendant had notice of incompetency which does not exist in the light of the evidence.

The fourth proposition is not in accordance with plaintiff's theory of the case, and therefore there is no evidence whatever on the subject.

The fifth presents a question of contributory negligence. If the plaintiff knew of the incompetency of the fireman, and that he was in charge of the engine, or ought to have known it by the exercise of ordinary care, and he went on with his work without ascertaining the fact, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover. The plaintiff testifies that he knew that the fireman had been in charge of the engine immediately before the accident, but he did not know it just at the time of the accident. When he came out of the caboose to carry into effect the instructions of the conductor he saw the engineer start towards the engine, and, without waiting to give him a chance to reach the engine, he signaled the fireman to back the train; and if the engineer had not reached his post at the time of the accident it was the plaintiff's fault in not giving him time to do so. The plaintiff was acting as vice conductor, and the engineer and fireman were bound to obey his signals; and thereby he assumed the risk of the incompetency of the fireman. The rule of contributory negligence is laid down in the case of Railroad Co. v. Martin, (Colo. Sup.) 4 Pac. 1118, to be "that the doctrine of all the cases is that if a plaintiff so circumstanced might have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care, he cannot recover, although the defendant was negligent." It is very apparent from what has been said that plaintiff has wholly failed to show himself entitled to recover, and the circuit court erred in not sustaining the motion to exclude the evidence, and, on failure of plaintiff to take a nonsuit. In not instructing the jury to find a verdict for the defendant; but, as heretofore determined, the defendant having reopened the case, and proceeded to introduce its evidence, the duty devolves upon the court of ascertaining from the defendant's testimony and the plaintiff's additional evidence whether there is sufficient proof in the case to justify the verdict of the jury. The additional evidence was introduced by the plaintiff to contradict defendant's witnesses about matters not very material to the issue, and resting entirely upon the memory of those testifying, and adds nothing to the plaintiff's case. The testimony of the engineer is taken, and he testifies fully as to the competency of the fireman, and, further, that he was on the engine, overseeing the fireman, at the time of the accident, and that the fireman managed the engine fully as well as he could himself. The engineer is corroborated in this by the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses, who testify that when the train stopped at the south switch the engineer got out of the caboose, and started towards the engine, which from that time was moving back towards him. He is also sustained by the fireman, who says that he was on the engine. How the jury could hesitate or disagree in finding that the engineer was on the engine from the positive statement of himself and the fireman, when they had no evidence to the contrary, is more than I can understand, unless they took the statements of plaintiff's witnesses that they did not know where he was as evidence sufficient to justify their determination; and yet they found by their verdict for the plaintiff, from these same statements, that the plaintiff in truth did not know whether the fireman was in control of the engine. This is a plain contradiction in their finding to hold that the same evidence establishes one thing as to the plaintiff, and yet establishes an entirely opposite thing as to the defendant, in the face of the positive statement of two unimpeached witnesses. A jury has the right to reject the testimony of any witness if they have reason for so doing. But this is not a matter of mere capriciousness. In complying with their oaths as jurors they must lay aside their predilections, and weigh the evidence in a manner becoming intelligent human beings; and they are derelict in the discharge of their duties if they ignore the evidence without cause, and find a verdict according to their preconceived prejudices and feelings. In the case of Corson v. Railroad Co., 76 Me. 244, the jury were said to have found their verdict on the personal appearance of a certain witness before them, and the court, in commenting on the matter, said: "If the jury undertook to decide that Arnold was an unfit person to be employed as a brakeman on account of what they saw or supposed they saw or could read in his face and manner while testifying before them as a witness, they did fall into a grave error. As well might a jury find a man guilty of murder because in their opinion they could see guilt in his face. The law does not recognize physiognomy as an art or science sufficiently reliable to found a verdict upon, not even against a railroad corporation. In a case like this the law imposes upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that the defendant corporation has been guilty of negligence in employing a man known to be unfit for the place which he is to fill, and we feel no hesitation in saying that this burden cannot be sustained by the man's looks and manner while testifying as a witness." For some reason the jury rejected the testimony of both the defendant's witnesses. The record presented here does not justify them in so doing, and there can be no question but that the evidence clearly establishes the fact that the engineer was on the engine. Such being the case, it devolved upon the plaintiff to prove that the fireman was so competent as to be unable to execute the directions given him by the engineer; and, if none were given, that his incompetency in managing the engine was the proximate cause of the injury. It matters not whether the engineer is present or absent, if he puts a wholly incompetent fireman in charge of an engine, and by reason of that incompetency any of the employees on the train, other than the engineer, is injured, the company is liable, because the law holds that the engineer's act in placing the fireman in charge of the engine is an employment by the company, and therefore it should be he held to answer for the results of such employment. On the question of competency both the engineer and fireman sustain the latter's experience and skill in the management of an engine,—that all the signals were properly answered, and the couplings, so far as the movements of the engine were concerned, were properly made."

Certainly there is nothing in this evidence to supply the plaintiff's deficiency. On the contrary, it fully establishes the defendant's entire innocence of the negligence charged. The plaintiff relies on the case of Railroad Co. v. Thomas' Adm'r. (Va.) 17 S. E. 884. This case is strictly in accordance with this opinion, but is not a parallel case with that made out by plaintiff's evidence. The engineer turned over his engine to an inexperienced fireman, who had only been in the service of the company for three or four weeks. The conductor, in charge of a yard crew consisting of the engineer, fireman, and three brakemen, including the plaintiff, who had only been in the service of the company for a short time, was engaged in shifting cars and making up trains. The conductor, who was aware of the fact that the fireman had never been in the employ of a railroad before, but was raw and inexperienced, and that the engineer had turned over the engine to him, undertook to make a dangerous running and flying switch. When the time came to slack the engine the fireman, without shutting off the steam, as he should have done, slackened by reversing the engine, and, as a consequence the cylinders got full of steam, and of all this the brakeman who was on the rear of the engine, with his back to the fireman, knew nothing. After the brakeman withdrew the coupling pin, and cut the engine loose from the car, the fireman, without again shutting off the steam, as he should have done, threw the lever forward as far as it would go, thus giving full effect to the steam accumulated in the cylinders. This accumulated steam, being thus brought suddenly into full play, "caused the engine to start or jump suddenly forward with such great force as to jerk the brakeman off, and break his hold, and throw him on the track. He was run over by the car and killed. This statement is condensed from the opinion of the judge in that case. The court held the company liable—First, because of the negligence of the engineer in turning the engine over to a raw and inexperienced fireman; and, second, because the conductor was negligent in exposing the men under his control to a danger that he could have avoided by the exercise of reasonable care. The incompetency of the fireman, and the unskillful and ignorant manner in which he managed the engine, and that this was the proximate cause of the injury and death of the brakeman, were established by incontrovertible proof. But in the case now under consideration the plaintiff has failed to prove the incompetency of the fireman, that he was guilty of any unskillful or ignorant management of the engine, or that the accident was the proximate result thereof. On the other hand, the defendant shows that the fireman was experienced and competent, that he did manage the engine in a skillful and careful manner, and that there was no negligence on its part. The facts and circumstances surrounding this unfortunate accident under the settled rules of law applicable thereto compel us to hold, however kindly and charitably disposed we may feel towards the plaintiff in his crippled condition, that it was one of the assumed risks and ordinary results of the dangerous employment in which he was engaged, and for this reason the judgment is reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and a new trial awarded the defendant.

STEWART v. OHIO RIVER R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1893.)

PLEADINGS.

1. A case in which the declaration shows that the landowner whose lot abuts on a public street, on and along which a railroad company has laid its track and runs its trains, has sued for the permanent injury to his property caused thereby.

2. Where a railroad is laid down in a public street, the abutting property is damaged, within the meaning of section 9, art. 3, of the constitution, to the extent of the depreciation caused by the construction and operation of the road.

3. The measure of the damages is such a sum as will make the owner whole,—that is, the depreciation of the market value of the abutting property, caused by the railroad company laying their track and running their trains in the street.

4. In such case, if the fair market value of the abutting property is as much immediately after the construction of the railroad as it was immediately before such improvement was made, no damages are sustained for which a recovery can be had.

Error to circuit court, Mason county.

Action by C. V. Stewart against the Ohio River Railroad Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. H. Leonard and V. B. Archer, for plaintiff in error. Chas. E. Hogg and John E. Beller, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. This is an action of trespass on the case, brought by plaintiff Stewart, against the defendant company in the circuit court of Mason county, on the — day of April, 1889, for injury to a lot of land situate in the town of West Columbia. The defendant appeared and demurred, and plaintiff filed an amended declaration. To this, also, defendant demurred, but the court overruled the demurrer, and defendant entered the plea of not guilty. The jury found for plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $285. On the trial of the cause, various objections were made by defendant to the introduction and rejection of certain evidence which appears in the certificate of evidence, which objections the court overruled, and the defendant's exceptions were noted in the certificate of evidence. The defendant also took three bills of exception,—No. 1 for the refusal of the court to give defendant's instruction No. 1; No. 2 for refusing defendant's instruction No. 2; and No. 3 for overruling defendant's motion to set aside the verdict, and grant it a new trial, upon the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, and was excessive. All the evidence is certified, and made, by reference thereto, part of this bill No. 3. The court overruled the motion and gave judgment, and defendant obtained a writ of error with supersedeas. The plaintiff in error (defendant below) assigns eight distinct grounds of error, which may be considered under four heads: (1) The sufficiency on demurrer of plaintiff's amended declaration; (2) in admitting for plaintiff, and refusing for defendant, certain testimony on the trial; (3) in refusing to give the two instructions asked by defendant; (4) in overruling defendant's motion for a new trial.

The declaration, as amended, contains but one count in case. Though somewhat long, I give it in full, not alone or in the main on account of the demurrer, but because in my view it shows the gravamen—the gist—of the action to be permanent injury to plaintiff's right as an abutting owner in his lot on Coal street, by causing great depreciation in value, and on that question, as it may appear from both the pleadings and the evidence, the vital point in the case must turn. "Amended declaration. State of West Virginia, Mason county, to wit: In the circuit court thereof. The amended declaration of C. V. Stewart against the Ohio River Railroad Company: C. V. Stewart, by way of amendment to his former declaration filed herein, complains of the Ohio River Railroad Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of West Virginia, which does business in said state, and has its principal office in the city of Parkersburg, in said state, and which has been duly summoned to answer a plea of trespass on the case, for this, to wit, that the said plaintiff now is, and long has been, the owner in fee simple and occupier of a certain lot or parcel of land situate in the town of West Columbia, in the county and state aforesaid, and bounded on the west by Coal street, and on the north by the public road or street leading from the Ohio river to, and intersecting with, the Ripley and West Columbia pike, so that said lot is a corner lot, and very valuable, and upon which lot or parcel of land belonging to this plaintiff is situated a frame dwelling house, storehouse, stable, and other buildings necessary and proper for the free use and enjoyment of the same, and which lot, with the buildings thereon, the said plaintiff now is, and long hath been, using, occupying, and enjoying as a home and residence and place of business; and the plaintiff says that he used, occupied, and enjoyed said premises as aforesaid, free from all obstructions, obstacles, incumbrances, interferences, or hindrances, as of right he ought and should have done, until the happenings of the matters and things, and the acts and doings, herein-after specified and complained of, namely, that during the time said premises were occupied, used, and enjoyed by this plaintiff in the manner hereinbefore set forth, the said defendant, through and by its agents and employes, took possession and appropriated to its own use and benefit, to wit, on the — day of —, 1886, in the county aforesaid, that part of said Coal street which forms the western boundary of plaintiff's said premises, and defendant made deep and dangerous excavations in said street, and along the same, and immediately in front of plaintiff's said property, and built thereon its railroad bed and laid its railroad track on the same, and ever since the day and year last aforesaid the said defendant has been, and still is, using the same as a railroad right of way and railroad track, and the said defendant, ever since the day and year last aforesaid, has run its cars, locomotives, trucks, hand cars, engines, and all other rolling stock over the said Coal street, in the operation and carrying on of its business as a common carrier of freight and passengers, to the great and irreparable injury and damage to the said plaintiff in the use and the enjoyment of his said premises, and without compensating him therefor. And the plaintiff further says that the deep and dangerous excavations and cuts made in and along said Coal street immediately in front of his premises by said defendant, as aforesaid, have entirely destroyed the use of said Coal street by this plaintiff, so that this plaintiff cannot now have access to and from his said premises on the western side thereof, as he had theretofore done; that his said premises front upon said Coal street, and that he can no longer approach his said premises by means of said Coal street with wagons or other vehicles; and that said street was in constant use, in going to and from plaintiff's said premises, until it was destroyed by the said defendant, as aforesaid. Plaintiff further avers that said excavations and cuts made in said street by said defendant are deep and dangerous, and that in some places the said excavations in front of plaintiff's said premises are as much as four feet in depth, and leave a narrow strip between said cut and plaintiff's said houses and buildings, not exceeding six or eight feet in width. Plaintiff further avers that his only means of access to and from his said stable situate on said premises was over and along said Coal street, and that he cannot now reach said stable with a wagon or other vehicle, and that his said stable is rendered almost practically useless to this plaintiff by reason of the destruction of said street by the said defendant as aforesaid; and the said railroad passes so near to the said stable that it is unsafe and dangerous to keep hay, oats, or other feed therein, or to confine or shelter stock therein, because of the great danger from fire originating from sparks issuing from the locomotives constantly passing along said street immediately in front of said stable; and the ground upon which said stable is located can no longer be appropriated to any valuable or practicable use or purpose, by reason of the loss of the use of said Coal street and its near proximity to said railroad track; and so plaintiff says that he has had to abandon the use of said stable, and the use and enjoyment of the ground upon which it stands. Plaintiff further says that the other buildings on his said lot are so close to said railroad track, by reason of the location of the said road on said Coal street, that there is great danger of their being lost and wholly destroyed by fire issuing from the locomotives of the defendant aforesaid, and this dangerous exposure to fire of plaintiff's said buildings has greatly enhanced the cost of procuring insurance thereon, and thus rendered it almost impossible for plaintiff to procure insurance against loss by fire upon his buildings aforesaid; and plaintiff says that the trains of the defendant which pass along and over said road immediately in front of his said buildings and property are very heavy, and frequently run very rapidly, whereby plaintiff's said buildings are greatly jarred and shaken, and much injured and damaged. Plaintiff further avers that the locomotives and trains of said defendant pass over said road in front of plaintiff's premises, as aforesaid, both in the nighttime and in the daytime, and shake and jar plaintiff's buildings, part of which is occupied by the plaintiff as a residence; and plaintiff is a person of highly sensitive nervous organization, and the shaking and jarring of plaintiff's said residence has greatly annoyed and disturbed him, and caused him great loss of sleep, whereby plaintiff's health has been much impaired. Plaintiff further avers that by reason of the facts and allegations hereinbefore specified, touching the injury to his said buildings and premises, that they have been depreciated in value more than two-thirds, and their value prior to the injuries herein complained of was at least the sum of twelve hundred dollars. And by reason of which matters and things hereinbefore set forth and complained of, an action hath accrued to this plaintiff to demand and have of and from the said defendant the sum of one thousand dollars, the damages sustained by this plaintiff, as aforesaid; wherefore the plaintiff brings this suit. Hogg & Beller, P. Q."

With us the use of case, rather than trespass, throws but little light on the subject, for our statute, in order to obviate a distinction sometimes nice, and troublesome in practice, has provided that an action of trespass on the case may be maintained in any case in which an action of trespass will lie. The demurrer, however, was not intended to raise this question, and could not have had that effect. It states that it was to the declaration as amended, and to each "demand" therein set out, naming specially that averment which charges plaintiff to be of a highly sensitive and nervous organization, and greatly annoyed, disturbed in sleep, and thereby injured in health by the constant noise and jar caused by defendant's trains. But as the declaration contains but one count, there can be strictly only one demand or cause of action. All else save the gist of the action, whatever that may be, shows but the nature of the injury and the special causes and extent of the damage. Hence, strictly speaking, under our common-law procedure, the thing aimed at could not be reached in that way, except by a liberal construction of section 13, c. 131, of the Code, asking the court to instruct the jury to disregard the objectionable "demand," or under section 46, c. 130, move the court to order the plaintiff to file a definite or particular statement of his claim, or, in accordance with our usual practice, cause to be excluded all evidence offered touching the immaterial or otherwise obnoxious averment; and, as the declaration shows plainly enough that it is sufficient for judgment to be given according to law and the very right of the cause, the demurrer was properly overruled. On this subject, see Robrecht v. Marling's Adm'r, 29 W. Va. 765, 2 S. E. 827; Newlon v. Reitz, 31 W. Va. 483, 7 S. E. 411.

No instructions were asked by the plaintiff, none were given by the court, but the two following were asked by defendant, and refused: No. 1. "The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence in this cause that the plaintiff's property was worth as much immediately after the construction of the defendant's railroad as immediately before said road was constructed, then in such case they shall find for the defendant." No. 2. "The jury are further instructed that when an action is brought to recover damages, where no part of the plaintiff's property has been taken, but simply damaged, by a public improvement, damages cannot be had unless the property claimed to be damaged has been depreciated in value by the construction of the public improvement. In other words, if the fair market value of the property is as much immediately after the construction of an improvement as it was immediately before the improvement was made, no damages can be sustained and no recovery can be had. Therefore, in this case, if the jury believe from the evidence that the fair market value of the plaintiff's property was as much immediately after the construction of the defendant's railroad as it was immediately before, then he has sustained no damages which can be the subject of a recovery in this suit, and they should in such case find for the defendant." The two instructions seem to be alike in substance, so far as plaintiff has a right to complain, and whether they were properly refused or not depends upon two questions: (1) Are they, or either of them, good law in a proper case? (2) And, if so, were they appropriate in this instance?

The facts of the case not controverted and bearing on the matter in hand are, in short, as follows: The locus in quo is a lot in the town of West Columbia, 48 feet front along Beacon street, by 100 feet deep along Coal street, with a one-story frame house on the corner, where plaintiff has lived continuously since the 29th day of August, 1878, when the lot was sold and conveyed to him in fee by John Treeger and wife, describing it as "known upon the plat of the town as lot No. 24, the same conveyed to John Treeger by John Hall and wife by deed dated 15th of August, 1865, to which deed as recorded." etc., reference is made. The presumption is that his ownership in fee extends to the center of the street, subject to the public right of way, as nothing to the contrary appears. The town was incorporated the 1st of May, 1852, by act of the general assembly of Virginia, but had fallen, perhaps, into disuse now and then, as I infer from the testimony of Dr. Knight, who says incidentally of Coal street, "The town would not improve it, even when it was incorporated." In 1886 defendant laid down its track along Coal street 19 feet, where it entered the street, crossing Beacon street, from plaintiff's house and lot, making a 4-foot cut and embankment in front of plaintiff's house, impairing somewhat his power of convenient ingress and egress with an ordinary wagon. The track gradually veers away from plaintiff's property until, at the lower end, it is out of the street on the opposite side, being 48 feet from the stable on the other end of plaintiff's lot, but it makes his stable, which extended 4 feet into the street, unfit for storing hay, etc., by reason of danger of fire from sparks, and subjects plaintiff to such annoyance as the noise and jar and smoke of locomotives, etc., generally create, impairing his comfort and lessening its value as a dwelling place. Coal street is 40 feet wide. How the track runs with reference to the median line does not appear. By what right or authority defendant built and used its road in and along this street does not appear directly from any evidence, and it can only be inferred, if at all, from the general right to build conferred by law, from the fact that plaintiff says they have used it since 1886, and nowhere intimates that it was built there unlawfully, or without the authority or consent of the town or county,—a prerequisite required by law. But such consent is not material, for plaintiff in his averments proceeds on the inference that such consent had been given, or has plainly and distinctly elected to treat the entry of the company as an entry and taking under the exercise of the state's power of eminent domain, conferred upon it pro hac vice, and has waived the wrong of unlawful entry, and sued for the compensation the constitution of 1872 gives him for the permanent damages done to his property by reason of its depreciation thus created; and on this point the plaintiff's declaration is plainer by what is left out, and more explicit by what is put in, than was the declaration in the case of Johnson v. City of Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402, or the one in Fox v. Railroad Co., 34 W. Va. 466, 12 S. E. 757. What other right of his was injured, or what other remedy he may have had, we need not inquire, for he elected to waive them, and, as an abutting owner, has sued for the just compensation for the damage to his property, causing, as he alleges, "a depreciation in value of more than two-thirds, and that it was worth, before the injury complained of, the sum of twelve hundred dollars." See, on this subject, Porter v. Railway Co., 3 Amer. R. & Corp. R. 357, 363, (from 125 Ind. 476, 25 N. E. 556,) edited and annotated by John Lewis, Esq., author of a work on Eminent Domain, which see, (section 507.) In U. S. v. Great Falls Manufg Co., 112 U. S. 645, 656, 5 Sup. Ct. 306, Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion, says: "There is no sound reason why the claimant may not waive that right, [the right of injunction,] and, electing to regard the action of the government as a taking under its sovereign right of eminent domain, demand just compensation." In Railroad Co. v. Baker, 45 Ark. 252, 255, (a state with code procedure,) Cockrill, C. J. says: "The complainant alleged a permanent injury to the land * * * with all the particularity that could be required under any state of pleading. The complaint must be taken now as though amended to conform to the proof, and the appellant's objection to it, if tenable at all, comes too late." In our case no amendment was needed, and the tenor of the testimony showed that plaintiff contemplated and sought a recovery of damages as a just compensation for the depreciation of his abutting property. In the case of Organ v. Railroad Co., (1888,) 51 Ark. 235, 266, 11 S. W. 96, Battle, J., says: "But the owner may waive formal condemnation proceedings and all formal modes of transfer, and elect to regard the action of the railroad company as a taking under the right of eminent domain, and demand and recover just compensation." Plaintiff's proof shows, what his declaration expressly avers, that defendant, ever since the — day of —, 1886, has run its cars and all other rolling stock over Coal street in carrying on its business as a common carrier of freight and passengers; and the whole scope of his evidence shows that the object of his suit was to recover damages for the injury caused to his abutting lot by permanent depreciation occasioned directly by the building and running of defendant's railroad, so that it is too late now, and in this court, for plaintiff to shift his ground, and say that he is suing for a wrongful entry, or a continuing nuisance to his adjacent property; so that whether defendant entered on his fee subject to the easement, or on a street simply abutting on his freehold, without his consent and without condemnation, he has elected his remedy, both by pleading and proof, to go for the permanent depreciation, and must abide by it. All the special acts of injury and resulting damage pleaded or proved have weight and bearing only so far as they tend to show such permanent injury. The question of the railroad being a nuisance did not arise, except so far as that fact tended to show the character of the railroad as a permanent injury depreciating the property, and the amount of such depreciation, no matter how special such inconvenience and discomfort may be shown to be. If it was a constant injury of any kind, by which it destroyed the value of his property two-thirds or entirely, that only furnished one element for measuring and ascertaining the compensation. This keeps us in line with the pleading and practice of our cases as far as they have gone, and helps to avoid inconvenient confusion of rights and remedies.

No instruction was asked on behalf of plaintiff, none was given by the court, and this brings us to the two instructions asked by defendant and refused by the court. The question is, where a railroad is laid down and operated in a public street, what measures the damage to the abutting property which the owner may recover as compensation for the injury, under section 9, art. 3, of our state constitution? The question is not altogether a new one in this state. In Johnson v. City of Parkersburg, (1880,) 16 W. Va. 402, six years after our present constitution was adopted, the question is fully discussed by Judge Johnson in all its bearings, both as to the extent of the right and the nature of the remedy. The declaration in that case was properly framed to authorize a recovery for such compensation. In Spencer v. Railroad Co., 23 W. Va. 406, the question was again discussed in all its bearings. In Fox v. Railroad Co., 34 W. Va. 466, 473, 12 S. E. 757, Lucas, P., reviews these cases, and says, (page 473. 34 W. Va., and page 760, 12 S. E.): "In those cases, both in the syllabus and opinion, it is made perfectly clear that for permanent injuries to the value of the property entire damages can be recovered in one suit, and no second suit can be brought for the same cause of action. It is also manifest, from a study of these cases, that the owner recovers damages which necessarily result from the building and proper use by the railroad company of its track in the adjoining street, which has been taken and occupied. Evidence of the rental value, also that the plaintiff had been offered one thousand dollars for the property, would seem to be proper in assisting the jury in estimating the permanent damage." The gravamen of the charge in the second count is that the said "dwelling house and premises have, by means of the premises aforesaid, been greatly damaged, lessened in value, and permanently injured." This declaration is almost identically the same as the declaration in Johnson v. City of Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 405, except that it is rendered still more appropriate as a count for permanent injury by charging in direct language that the property has been permanently injured. So that in this state it cannot be said that the true measure of damages in such case is an open question, but that, following the numerous decisions on the subject in other states, especially those of the state of Illinois, the abutting property is damaged, within the meaning of our constitution, to the extent of the depreciation caused by the construction and operation of the railroad (see Lewis, Em. Dom. § 225;) and it is immaterial whether the fee of the street is in the public or in the adjoining owner. From this it follows that no damage can be recovered on account of the construction and operation of the railroad, where no property is actually taken, if its fair market value is as much immediately after as before the completion of such railroad. See Springer v. City of Chicago, 135 Ill. 552, 26 N. E. 514. At page 552, 135 Ill., and page 514, 26 N. E., Craig, J., says: "Where an action is brought to recover damages where no part of the plaintiff's property has been taken, but merely damaged by the public improvement, the law is well settled that a recovery cannot be had unless the property claimed to be damaged has been depreciated in value by the construction of the public improvement. In other words, if the fair market value of the property is as much immediately after the construction of the improvement as it was before the improvement was made, no damage has been sustained, and no recovery can be had." See McQuaid v. Railway Co., 1 Amer. R. & Corp. R., by Lewis, pp. 34, 51, 18 Or. 237, 22 Pac. 899. The editor in his note to this case says, (page 51,) under the head of "The Measure of Damage:" "When the fee of the street is in the abutting owner, and the purpose of the suit is to recover the just compensation guaranteed by the constitution, the measure of damages is the same as in any other case of partial taking,—the difference in the value of the property with and without the railroad; and that this is the better view, also, in cases where there is only a partial taking;" citing Spencer v. Railroad Co., 23 W. Va. 406; Taggart v. Railway Co., (R. L.) 19 Atl. 326; Railway Co. v. Doyle, 13 S. W. 936, 88 Tenn. 747; Booth, St. Ry. Law, § 94. This was the measure of damages impliedly taken and adhered to by the court, as the question arose upon the giving in of the testimony of the witnesses, except the answer of one witness, who considered it damaged as a home one-half its value, that he permitted to go for what it was worth, but not as a proper estimate to found the amount of damages on. So that if there was any question of pretium affectionis as a home, or other matter special to the plaintiff, it was either not offered, or ruled out by the court without objection on the part of plaintiff. All the witnesses were asked their opinion as to the amount of damages, which has been held to be not error in Railroad Co. v. Foreman, 24 W. Va. 662; Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 788. As to witness' stating his opinion of damages, etc., see Railroad Co. v. Brunson, (Kan.) 22 Pac. 495, 2 Amer. R. & Corp. R. 180, 185.

I can see no objection to the use of the term "market value," used in the instruction asked, that would seem to have the sanction of the authorities which have passed upon the subject. Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain, (section 478,) defines the market value in this connection to be the price which it will bring when it is offered for sale by one who desires, but is not obliged, to sell, and is bought by one who is under no necessity of having it. Railway Co. v. Vance, 115 Pa. St. 325, 8 Atl. 764; Lawrence v. Boston, 119 Mass. 126; Railway Co. v. Woodruff, 49 Ark. 381, 5 S. W. 792; and cases already cited. As to the term "immediately after, and immediately before, the improvement was made," it is also correct, though the damage given might comprehend interest on the amount of compensation agreed on, after the date at which it is estimated, down to the verdict. All the facts as to the condition of the property and its surroundings, its improvements, its capabilities, the enhancement in view of the contemplated railroad, immediately before the construction and location, and its value immediately after the construction, may be considered; also, has the market value been decreased by the taking, or has it prevented an enhancement, and, if so, to what extent? See Bohm v. Railway Co., 129 N. Y. 576, 29 N. E. 802; Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403. In Fox v. Railroad Co., 34 W. Va. 466, 477, 12 S. E. 757, the circuit court refused to give the following instruction: "In this action the jury cannot take into consideration in ascertaining damages, if any, the market value of the property of the plaintiff before or after the laying of the track in question;" and this court, in view of what was said during the course of its opinion in regard to the nature of the action and the character of the evidence that might be properly introduced, says, (page 479, 34 W. Va., and page 762, 12 S. E.,) that such instruction was properly refused as erroneous. I have already stated that the road, crossing Beacon street, enters Coal street, extending about 1 foot across and from the median line towards plaintiff's house; that is, at the point of entrance into Coal street in front of plaintiff's house it is 19 feet from the house, and at the lower end of plaintiff's lot on that street it is 48 feet from his stable or lot, being off the street entirely. A public highway only vests in the commonwealth a right of passage; but the freehold and the profits (such as trees upon it and mines under it) belong to the owner of the soil, who has a right to all the remedies for the freehold, subject, however, to the easement. Bolling v. Mayor, etc., (1825,) 3 Rand. (Va.) 563, 573. The presumption is that the ownership of the abutting owner in fee extends to the center of the street unless the contrary appears. Whether the fee is in the abutting owner or in the public, he has private rights as such abutting owner, such as the rights of egress and ingress, and of light and air, but subordinate to the rights of the public in the street. See Transylvania University v. City of Lexington, 3 B. Mon. 25. If the road is laid wholly on the other half of the street, the abutters' right to compensation would be the same as in cases where the fee of the entire street is in the public. See Railway Co. v. Brown, 23 Fla. 104, 1 South. 512. As the abutting owner has a right of egress and ingress, and a right to light and air, notwithstanding the fee is in the public, it follows that any interference with these rights is a damage for which he is entitled to compensation under the constitution. When the fee of the street is in the abutting owner, and the purpose of the suit is to recover the just compensation guaranteed by the constitution, the measure of damages is the same as in any other case of partial taking,—the difference in the value of the property with and without the railroad. The above is taken from the valuable note of Mr. Lewis to the case of McQuaid v. Railway Co., 1 Amer. R. & Corp. R. 34, 47, 22 Pac. 899, 18 Or. 237, where very many authorities are collected and briefly discussed. See, also, 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 579; Mayhew v. Norton, 28 Amer. Dec. 800, 17 Pick. 857, notes of editor. If such company has built its road by proper authority, it is not committing a nuisance, but exercising its rights, and cannot be enjoined, unless the value of the property would be as effectually destroyed as if taken; but such lot owner, whether he owns the fee in the street or not, may under the constitution, by proper action at law, recover from the company for any permanent damages it may inflict on such adjoining lot, in the same manner as if it had built its road without such proper authority. See Spencer v. Railroad Co., 23 W. Va. 408. In such action (trespass on the case in case) he may recover damages necessarily resulting from the ordinary and proper use by the railroad company of its track in such street, and may give evidence developing the character of this ordinary and proper use, and how it affects the value of his property. Fox v. Railroad Co., 34 W. Va. 466, 12 S. E. 757. For permanent injury to the property, entire damages can be recovered in one suit, and the jury may take into consideration in ascertaining damages, if any, the market value of the property of the plaintiff before or after the laying of the track in question. 34 W. Va. 479, 12 S. E. 762. And just compensation is that which makes him whole, and, in respect to general benefits or damages resulting from the road, leaves him in as good a situation as his neighbor, no part of whose property has been taken. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 471, p. 607. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 567. Both the instructions refused propounded the law correctly, as applicable to the facts of this case, and one or the other should have been given.

The evidence as to the amount of damages was conflicting, yet defendant examined two witnesses who knew the property long and well, who said in their testimony that the market value of the property was as great after the road was constructed as it was before; that it was worth as much immediately after the railroad was constructed as it was immediately before. Therefore, there was evidence tending to prove the hypothesis upon which these instructions were based. They were correct, and were not abstract, within the meaning of the rule, and both should not have been refused. They covered the whole ground of defense, and whatever qualification might properly have been made, as based on what any part of the evidence may have tended to prove, the defendant was not required to suggest or supply it. And under our view of the pleadings as already discussed, nominal damages, as such, were not recoverable; for plaintiff did not sue for an invasion or infringement of a legal right, as for a trespass or a nuisance, but for just compensation for the damages done to his property. The tortious entry or creation of a nuisance, if any, he elected to waive for this occasion. These instructions do not forbid the jury from taking into consideration any circumstance which there was evidence tending to prove, which tended to show the amount of the depreciation; such as the constant running of the trains by day and night, the noise, smoke, vibration, etc. The court was not asked to instruct as to any of these.

It is argued on behalf of plaintiff that he bought it for a home, and is compelled to use it for that purpose, but the road renders it wholly unfit. If the property in question had, before the laying of the track in Coal street, any special value or fitness as a residence or home, or from any other fact or circumstance, such fact was competent evidence for the jury, so far as it tended to help estimate the fair market value before the injury complained of; but if counsel mean that the mental suffering of plaintiff by reason of his home being rendered uncomfortable, and his reluctance to leave it because it is his home, may be considered by the jury to swell the damages beyond the full depreciation, as shown by the difference between the full, fair market price before the laying of the track and after, then his contention cannot be made good upon either principle or authority. If upon authority, he produces none; on the contrary, the authorities already cited and referred to are against him, as is necessarily implied in the mode of measurement already given. Not on principle, for, although all can understand his attachment to his home, who can estimate its price in dollars and cents? And if you put yourself in his place you are carried away by fanciful estimates into imaginary values. But the law of redress in such cases must confine itself to the real and substantial; it can inflict no punishment for a lawful act, nor give any solatium for any of its inevitable consequences. The hardship in that respect, whatever it may be, is one that, in the nature of things, cannot be compensated in money. The law must deal with all alike, and under any other rule there would be no end to fanciful damages; and the inconvenience and discomfort of every abutting home and residence along the line, however great or small it may be, would have to be somehow weighed and accounted for.

There remains to be considered the error assigned in admitting and rejecting certain testimony against defendant's objection, to which it excepted, with the note of the reporter made at the place where it occurred, with no other formal bill of exceptions, except that there is a formal bill of exceptions to the overruling of the motion for a new trial, in which the grounds of the motion are stated to be that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence, and is excessive; and the certificate setting out all the evidence is made by reference a part of this bill, and a memorandum is entered on the order book saying that "these exceptions noted in the certificate of evidence are saved to the parties." What must the appellant do in the court below to save and make available the errors complained of here? No motion for new trial is necessary where the error relates to the judgment or pleading, such as sustaining or overruling demurrer; but in all other cases the complainant must move the trial court for a new trial, so that that court may review its rulings; otherwise, this court will deem them to have been waived. State v. Phares, 24 W. Va. 657; Sammons v. Hawvers, 25 W. Va. 678; State v. Thompson, 28 W. Va. 149; Danks v. Rodeheaver, Id. 274; State v. Rollins, 31 W. Va. 363, 6 S. E. 923. See Searle v. Railway Co., 32 W. Va. 370, 378, 9 S. E. 248; also, Shrews- bury v. Miller, 10 W. Va. 115, point 4. In Gregory's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 37 W. Va. 606, 609, 16 S. E. 819, the certificate of evidence showed, as in this case, that defendant objected to the evidence, objection overruled, exception taken and noted; but no formal bill of exceptions was taken to such ruling, nor was it stated on the motion for new trial as one of the grounds therefor, but the grounds specified on such motion were that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence and to the instructions given. Held, the error noted in the certificate of evidence will be treated as waived; and the reason given is that the court below is called on to review his rulings, and for this purpose the party complaining must in some way bring them to his attention definitely and specifically, so that he may not have to grope his way through the whole certificate of evidence in search of them, attended, as it would be, with great labor, and the danger of overlooking important ones, nor should the appellate court be placed in somewhat the same predicament. The case before us is amenable to the same rule, and for the same reasons of convenience and policy in the due administration of justice. If there had, on the motion, been a direct reference to the page where each ruling is noted, and the assignment of error made the same reference to the page of the printed record, it would show what our appellant picked out as important on second thought; at any rate, if any were overlooked, it would not be the fault of either court. The constitution of the state makes it the duty of this court to consider and decide every point fairly arising upon the record. The trouble in cases like this grows out of the recent law requiring the trial court to certify and make part of the record the whole of the evidence involving the question, and makes it a part of the record to be considered by the court of appeals both upon the application for and hearing of the writ of error. Code, § 9, c. 131. What, under the constitutional provision, and under section 9, c. 131, of the Code, is to be regarded as points fairly arising upon the record, need not be further considered in this case, although it may give rise to some questions of practice not yet passed upon; but this case on the point involved as to the admission and rejection of testimony, and the mode in which the point must be saved to be available on appeal, is ruled by the case of Gregory's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 37 W. Va. 606, 16 S. E. 819. Defendant's instruction No. 2, or its equivalent, should have been given, and it was error, for the reasons already stated, to refuse it, and for such error the judgment and verdict are set aside, and a new trial is awarded. Reversed and remanded.

ZELL GUANO CO. v. HEATHERLY et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1893.)

—FRAUD—PLEADINGS—PARTIES—DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS.

1. The bill should state the plaintiff's case with reasonable certainty,—that is, the right he claims, the injury complained of, and the relief he seeks, with the facts to justify it,—with such accuracy and clearness, and with such detail of the essential circumstances of time, place, manner, etc., as will so make his case as to inform the defendant of what he is called upon to meet; stating, not conclusions of law, but the facts out of which arises his right to some specific relief.

2. The bill may be framed with a double aspect, and ask relief in the alternative, but the states of fact upon which such relief is prayed must not be inconsistent.

3. The bill must not be multifarious,—that is, two distinct grounds of equitable relief, even between the same parties, are not to be joined in one bill.

4. Persons are not improper defendants who are so connected with the case made as to be directly interested in obtaining or resisting the specific relief asked in the bill or given in the decree, such as claimants, by written executory contract, of part of the personal property mentioned in the deed of trust in controversy.

5. Fraud is the judgment of the law upon facts and intents, and the mere general charge of fraud is not sufficient; the bill must allege the specific acts or language which constitute the fraud, or connect them with some specific act for which the defendant is in law responsible.

6. Answers and other pleadings, except in cases of injunction, can only be filed at rules or in court.

7. When, for any proper cause, a court of equity is called upon to take control of the property conveyed by a deed of trust to secure creditors, it generally goes on and has the trustee, or some one in his place, to administer the trusts under its direction, and with its sanction; has the claims and priorities of all parties ascertained and fixed before directing a sale, except for some good reason to be specially shown; and does not disburse the proceeds of sale until it can do complete justice to all according to their respective rights.

8. It is not necessary to the validity of a deed of trust to secure creditors that it should be executed by them. The deed passes the legal title as soon as executed by the grantor and the trustee, and can only be avoided by the dissent or disclaimer, express or implied, of the trust creditors.

9. Such trustee is a purchaser for valuable consideration, and the statute against fraudulent conveyances applies to no such conveyance made bona fide; but an insolvent debtor, with certain exceptions named, can no longer give priority or preference of payment to one creditor over another. See Code, (Ed. 1891,) § 2, c. 74.

10. Where such deed is made for the security of various creditors whose claims are distinct, and where part is illegal or fraudulent, and another part is fair and untainted with fraud, and the deed is not fraudulent upon its face, it will not be held void as to the latter unless they have directly or indirectly had notice of such fraud at the time of the execution of the deed, or in some way participated in the concoction of such fraud.

11. A creditor of the trust debtor assails the deed of trust as made with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud him in the collection of his debt, and succeeds in his impeachment of one of the preferred claims, but the other trust creditors subsequent in order of preference successfully resist such charge as to their claims, which are held to be just and honest. Held, such assailing creditor will not, in order of payment, be promoted to the place thus made vacant, but must come next in order of payment to the successful bona fide creditors, who will hold the places given them in the deed of trust.

Appeal from circuit court, Barbour county.

Action by the Zell Guano Company against Samuel J. Heatherly and others to cancel a conveyance of property, and for other relief. Plaintiff had decree, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. T. Ice and Dayton & Dayton, for appellants. Sam'l V. Woods, for appellee.

HOLT, J. This was a suit in equity in the circuit court of Barbour county, brought by the Zell Guano Company against Samuel J. Heatherly and others, to set aside as fraudulent a deed of trust executed by Samuel J. Heatherly to secure, in a certain order of preference, his creditors, and to enforce payment of plaintiff's claim against the grantors' property thereby conveyed. Such proceedings were had that the court, on the 23d day of December, 1892, pronounced the decree appealed from, pronouncing the deed of trust fraudulent and void as to the several claims of plaintiff, and the various claims of certain defendants, naming them, who also assailed the trust deed on the same ground, and providing for their payment in the order named, out of a fund in court, the proceeds of the sale of certain personal property conveyed by the deed of trust. The trust debtor and trustee, and six of the trust creditors, obtained this appeal, and they assign eleven grounds of error, which are as follows: "First. It was error not to sustain the demurrer to said original bill, and hold the same to be inconsistent, incongruous, contradictory, and multifarious, and therefore not sustainable in a court of equity. Second. It was error to regard said answers of Timothy Male, the Webster Wagon Company, Thompson & Jackson, and Amos Whiteley to the original bill lodged with the papers in the month of February, 1889, and at no rule day, as filed, or being any part of the record. Third. It was error not to sustain the demurrer to said amended bill. Fourth. It was error to sustain the plaintiff's tenth exception to petitioner Crim's deposition. Fifth. It was error to hear said cause before it was matured at rules, and to dismiss the amended bill as to defendants C. J. and H. L. Roy. Sixth. It was gross error to decree the proceeds of the 197½ acres of land sold pendente lite, and to which 'valid liens' attached before such sale, without ascertaining such liens, and to the satisfaction of other debts admittedly junior in priority to them. Seventh. It was palpable error to disburse at all the proceeds of sale of this 197½ acres without ascertaining how such proceeds had arisen, in whose hands the same were, and the amount thereof. Eighth. It was error to decree to Timothy Male the debt which he, in his own evidence, admitted had been paid to him. Ninth. It was error to hear said cause by piecemeal, and, by declining to ascertain 'the facts necessary' to fix the liens and ascertain who were entitled to 'participate in the proceeds of sale of the real estate,' to satisfy the favored few, and leave the rights of the other creditors unsettled and in utter confusion. Tenth. But above all, and beyond all, it was gross and palpable error to set aside in toto, and declare null and void, as against just creditors whose debts were unassailed, this deed of trust securing their debts, in favor of seven creditors also secured by it; and it is submitted that this is the first time such a thing was ever attempted to be done by a court of equity, where such deed, on its face, did not present such conditions and provisions as to make it fraudulent per se. Eleventh. The court below plainly and palpably erred in not holding said deed of trust good in all its parts, and all of the debts secured thereby, including the one of petitioner Crim, honest, bona fide debts, free from fraud, and in not either dismissing said bill or directing said Melville Peck, trustee, to execute said trust, in all respects, as provided by its terms and stipulations."

1, 3. It was error not to sustain defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's bill and amended bill—First, because they are multifarious and inconsistent; second, because they contain only the general charge of fraud, and do not allege facts sufficient, if true, to make out, prima facie, the charge. This suit is based in part on section 2, c. 133, Code 1891, which is section 2, c. 179, Code Va. 1849, taking effect 1st July, 1850. This statute proceeds on the theory that the rules of equity, without such statute, forbid jurisdiction of a bill by a creditor assailing the fraudulent deed of his debtor until such creditor at large has reduced his claim to judgment or decree. But in Kentucky such a statute seems to have been enacted in 1838. See Bank v. Huth, (1844,) 4 B. Mon. 423, 442. For a discussion of the general subject, see Fleming v. Grafton, 54 Miss. 79; Chamberlayne v. Temple, (1824,) 2 Rand. (Va.) 384. In Rhodes v. Cousins, (1828,) 6 Rand. (Va.) 188, 190, Carr, J., says: "It is well-settled law that none but a judgment creditor can have the assistance of equity to control, prevent, or interfere with, in any way, the disposition which a debtor may choose to make of his property. He may destroy it, give it away, convey it fraudulently, or sell it and waste the money, and no creditor at large can stop him by injunction." There must be some specific right of the creditor against the property sought to be subjected, and, having no certain claim upon the property of the debtor, he has no concern with his frauds. To same effect, see Tate v. Liggat, (1830,) 2 Leigh, 84; Kelso v. Blackburn, (1831,) 3 Leigh, 299; McCullough v. Sommerville, (1836,) 8 Leigh, 415. These cases lead in this state (Virginia) to the enactment of the statute in question. This act first came up for consideration in Tichenor v. Allen, (1855,) 13 Grat. 15, and from that day to this, as far as I know, it has been treated as giving a specific lien against the property fraudulently conveyed, somewhat after the manner of the law creating a lien by attachment, (see clause 6, § 1, c. 106, Code,) but more especially after the manner of foreign attachment in equity, as given by section 11, c. 151, Code 1849, which required no distinct proceeding, only the affidavit, as the foundation of the order of attachment, to be indorsed on the summons, (see Code Va. 1849, p. 603; Code 1860, p. 648.) In Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106, 11 Sup. Ct. 712, this question, so far as the federal courts are concerned, was fully reviewed, and settled that a claim purely legal, involving a trial before a jury, until reduced to judgment at law, could not be made the basis of relief in equity, because in those courts the right to trial by jury is secured by the seventh amendment to the constitution of the United States. See Cattle Co. v. Frank, 148 U. S. 603, 13 Sup. Ct. 691; Tube Works Co. v. Ballou, 146 U. S. 517, 13 Sup. Ct. 165; Cates v. Allen, 149 U. S. 451, 13 Sup. Ct. 883, 977. Our statute has been used for a period of more than 40 years, and has frequently been before the courts of last resort, and has never been supposed to be in conflict with the bill of rights, or with article 2 of the constitution of 1863, or with section 13, art. 3, of the constitution of 1872. See Manufacturing Co. v. Bennett, 28 W. Va. 16. The rules governing the general frame of bills in equity and other pleadings are based on general convenience, and are, in the main, the rules of all modern codes of civil procedure. The bill should state the plaintiff's case with reasonable certainty,—that is, the right he claims, the injury complained of, and the relief he seeks,—with such accuracy and clearness, and with such detail of the essential circumstances of time, place, manner, etc., as will inform the defendant of the nature of the case he is called upon to meet, stating, not conclusions of law, but the facts out of which arises his right to some specific relief. The case intended to be made must be certain, and the allegation of the necessary material facts to make it must also be certain. See Story, Eq. Pl. (10th Ed.) §§ 239, 242. Every fact necessary to make out the case must be certainly and positively alleged, for the court pronounces its decree as based upon the allegations, as well as on the evidence; but it is generally enough to state the main fact, and the circumstances which go to establish it need not be minutely charged. "A bill must not state two inconsistent states of facts.

and ask relief in the alternative. But it may state the facts, and ask relief in the alternative, according to the conclusion of law the court may draw from them; so that, if one kind of relief sought be denied, another may be granted. And it may state facts of a different nature, not inconsistent with each other, and equally supporting the prayer for relief. In both these cases the bill is said to have a double aspect." 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. (2d Ed.) § 70; Story, Eq. Pl. § 246. So, also, a bill must not be multifarious; there must not be a misjoinder of plaintiffs, nor a misjoinder of defendants, nor a misjoinder of grounds for equitable relief, held by the same parties, and against the same parties. The cases on the subject of multifariousness are extremely various, and the court, in deciding them, seems to have considered what was convenient in particular circumstances, rather than to have attempted to lay down any absolute rule. 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. (2d Ed.) § 71 et seq.; Story, Eq. Pl. (10th Ed.) 271 et seq. I do not regard either bill or amended bill in this case as multifarious. There is but one plaintiff, and all the defendants are parties to the trust deed assailed as fraudulent, or lien creditors of the trust debtor. The claim asserted by plaintiff consists of two judgments against defendants Samuel J. Heatherly and James E. Heatherly, and two other claims against them not reduced to judgment, as to which plaintiff was but a creditor at large. The object of plaintiff's suit was to avoid as fraudulent the assignment of, and charge upon, the estate of the debtor Samuel J. Heatherly, created by his deed of trust on all his property, dated January 31, 1889, under and by virtue of section 2, c. 133, of the Code, which reads as follows: "A creditor before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim may institute any suit to avoid a gift, conveyance, assignment, or transfer of or charge upon the estate of his debtor, which he might institute after obtaining such judgment or decree, and he may in such suit have all the relief in respect to said estate which he would be entitled to after obtaining a judgment or decree for the claim which he may be entitled to recover." So that there is no misjoinder of plaintiff's grounds for equitable relief against the debtors, and all the other defendants are proper parties, the trustee as holding the legal title, and the trust creditors as interested in both the subject-matter and the object of the suit. They were all interested in obtaining or resisting the relief prayed for in the bill, or granted in the decree complained of. Plaintiff's grounds of equitable relief are not so distinct and unconnected as to sustain separate bills. It is merely the case of one creditor with two judgments, and two claims which are made inchoate liens upon the specific property, by filing his bill to remove the deed of trust as an impediment fraudulently put by the debtor in the way of their satisfaction; and he could not maintain separate and distinct suits thereon, impeaching the deed of trust. And "to support the objection of multifariousness to a bill in equity, because the bill contains different causes of suit against the same person, two things must concur: First, the grounds of suit must be different; second, each ground must be sufficient as stated to sustain a bill." Brown v. Deposit Co., 128 U. S. 403, 410, 9 Sup. Ct. 127.

Is the bill inconsistent,—is it framed with a double aspect, praying relief in the alternative on two inconsistent cases, two inconsistent states of facts? Two answers may be made to this: First. Alternative relief is not prayed for in either original or amended bill. It simply prays that the deed of trust may be declared fraudulent, and set aside, as to plaintiff's claims; that the lands, or so much as may be necessary, may be sold to pay the same; and for general relief. Discovery is sought from the various defendants, and various allegations are made in order to bring out such discovery, and some of these facts alleged for that purpose are of different natures, and some, perhaps, inconsistent. But they are not the state of facts that go to make out plaintiff's case as the foundation for the relief prayed for; they are merely ancillary to the case alleged. For example, plaintiff alleges that notes given for vendor's liens retained by R. T. Talbott in his sale of the tract of land of 197½ acres to defendant Samuel J. Heatherly are apparently outstanding; that plaintiff has no means of knowing what amount of said purchase money, if any, remains unpaid, or which of defendants are entitled to receive the same. He therefore charges that the whole has been paid, and that the lien reserved in the deed has therefore been satisfied and extinguished; so that, if the parties stand out, the bill may be taken for confessed, and delay avoided. So, plaintiff charges that it, and other creditors put, in order of preferment, low down in the deed of trust, will wholly lose their debts if the rents and profits are not sequestered and held for those ultimately entitled. I fail to see how that amounts to any inconsistency of any kind. It charges that the large debt secured to defendant Crim, high up in the deed of trust, (virtually in front,) is fictitious, having no real existence,—good, however, between parties, but not good against plaintiff; but, if a genuine debt, large assignments of bonds, notes, etc., have been made to him by the debtor, or one of the debtors, enough to pay it. It prays a discovery as to this large debt secured, its postponement, etc., all of which may well consist with plaintiff's case as he makes it in his bill. The cattle (100 head of three year olds) are granted and described in the deed of trust as embraced in an executory contract of sale, Heatherly to keep the cattle, to be delivered any time from August 20 to September 20, 1889. The deed of trust was dated and executed January 31, 1889, but the right was reserved to feed the hay, grain, etc., mentioned in the deed of trust to the cattle until they were delivered,—some seven or eight months. This may have been the best that could have been done, but it is not on its face so conclusively so as to justly debar plaintiff from alleging it to be otherwise, and praying for a receiver. I need not consume time as to various other objections; such, for example, as that the trustee is an attorney at law, the son-in-law of defendant Crim; that as to some of the debts the debtor is but surety, and that he has solvent cosureties. Such allegations do no harm, if they do no good, as it turns out in this particular case.

The next and last ground assigned why the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained is that plaintiff had no ground of equitable relief except to assail the deeds of trust as fraudulent, and that this is sought to be done by the simple allegation "that plaintiff charges that said deed of trust was made by said Samuel J. Heatherly with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud plaintiff and the other creditors of Samuel J. Heatherly in the collection of their said claims." The law is well settled that a general charge is not sufficient, (Pyles v. Furniture Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. 909, where the charge is, "Said last-named deed of trust is fraudulent and void, and the act of making it not within the corporate purposes for which said company was formed," etc.) for such a naked charge of fraud would be a mere conclusion of law, without any statement of circumstances or evidentiary facts by which it could be supported, or from which it could be drawn. The bill must allege the specific acts or language which constitute the fraud, or connect them with some specific act; for, until connected with some specific act for which one person is in law responsible to another, they have no more effect than other words of unpleasant significance. Ambler v. Choteau, 107 U. S. 586, 591, 1 Sup. Ct. 556. The particulars of the fraud must be set out, (U. S. v. Atherton, 102 U. S. 372,) and some injury as the result of such fraud. "It is most essential to the administration of justice in a court of equity that the nature of the case, where it is constituted of fraud, should be most accurately and fully stated in the bill of the plaintiff. It is impossible to give relief merely on the general charge that something has been done by a party, or has been obtained from a party, under the influence of fraud. It must be shown in what the fraud consists, and how it has been effected." Lord Westbury, in Land Co. v. Conybeare, 9 H. L. Cas. 711; 1 Bigelow, Frauds, c. 8, p. 114 et seq.; Walt, Fraud. Conv. § 141. Fraud is the judgment of law on facts and intents. Pettibone v. Stevens, 15 Conn. 26; Sturtevant v. Ballard, 9 Johns. 342. But this bill fully meets and fulfills the requirements of that test. It charges that the debtor Samuel J. Heatherly was insolvent, of which fact defendant Crim had knowledge; that the debt secured by the deed of trust to defendant Crim of $8,100, to which a preference was given, was fraudulent and fictitious, and that the trust debtor was not indebted to said Crim in any sum whatever, and that said claim was secured and preferred in said deed of trust with intent to defraud, hinder, and delay the plaintiff and other creditors of the grantor Samuel J. Heatherly, with intent to repay the same to said Heatherly for his own use and benefit; that unless the 100 head of cattle are sold at once, and they are fed until September 20, 1889, as required by the trust deed, they will, without profit to the creditors, consume all of the grain and other provender, worth $800; and that the whole property conveyed is wholly insufficient to pay the claims charged on the property thus conveyed in trust for their payment. In the amended bill the charge is made that Samuel J. Heatherly was trying to borrow money for the ostensible purpose of paying debts for which he was not then pressed, but in fact for the purpose, and with the intent, to place the same beyond the reach of his creditors; and that defendant Crim, with full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances set forth, and well knowing that the real purpose and intent of Heatherly was to obtain all the ready money he possibly could upon the credit of his real and personal property, and thus place the same beyond the reach of his creditors, on the 31st day of January, 1889, entered into a corrupt and fraudulent agreement with the said Samuel J. Heatherly, whereby it was agreed that, if Heatherly would secure certain debts for which Crim was responsible as his indorser, he (Crim) would let Heatherly have the further sum of $6,500 in cash, provided Heatherly would secure him for all said sums by deed of trust conveying all his property, real and personal, to a trustee for that purpose; that on January 31, 1889, by deed of trust of that date, this scheme was consummated, and preference given the $6,500 paid over by Crim to Heatherly, who never used any part thereof to pay any debts, and that he never intended to use the same for that purpose, etc. Whatever else the bill may lack or be deficient in, explicitness of detail of facts and intents constituting fraud in the judgment of the law is no part of its deficiency or lack of statement; for the facts which constitute the fraud alleged are set out, and, if true, they make out the charge.

The second assignment of error is that the answers of Timothy Male and others were not filed at rules or in court and therefore became no part of the record. Timothy Male and five other defendants attempted to file answers charging that the trust was made to defraud them and other creditors, as charged in plaintiff's bill, and prayed, also, for affirmative relief, that the deed might be set aside for such fraud, etc. These defendants had their answers marked "Filed" by the clerk on the 16th day of February, 1889, which was not a rule day, and not in term. Answers, etc., except in cases of injunction, can only be filed in court or at rules. See Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gr. 102, 130; Hayzlett v. McMillan, 11 W. Va. 464, 478. The five answers, viz. of C. C. Martin & Co., Thompson & Jackson, Timothy Male, the Webster Wagon Company, and of Amos Whiteley, should all have been treated by the court as filed at the same time, viz. at March rules, 1889, and it was error in the court to treat them as filed at any earlier date, viz. the respective dates at which they were left with the clerk to be filed.

The fourth assignment of error relates to the sustaining of exception No. 10, taken by plaintiff to defendant Crim's deposition taken on his own behalf. On the 24th day of October, 1890, plaintiff took the deposition of a witness. On the 29th day of November he gave defendant Crim his affidavit of that date, stating, among other things, that on the — day of February or March, 1889, and at a subsequent day, (date not given,) the suggestion was made to him by plaintiff's counsel that if he would guaranty to them—plaintiff and one of the defendants assailing the deed of trust—that he (witness) would testify to enough to gain this cause, they would give him (the affiant) a sum of money named, which affiant refused to accept. On the 19th day of October, 1891, defendant Crim commenced the giving his deposition on his own behalf, which was protracted until the 28th day of October, 1891, when it was closed, and near its close, on direct examination, he was asked if he had had any conversation with the witness Chrislip, and in answer to that question produced the affidavit of Chrislip, detailing all that Chrislip said about it. To the deposition of Crim, plaintiff indorsed 10 several exceptions, the tenth one being to so much of the answer of Crim on his redirect examination to question No. 3, etc., as details the statements made by A. G. Chrislip in regard to conversations pretended to have taken place between Chrislip and plaintiff's counsel, as the same was irrelevant, incompetent, immaterial, and not admissible, and the affidavit and testimony of defendant Crim in introducing and filing the same. The court overruled all the exceptions except No. 10, which it sustained by order of November 12, 1891. There was no error in this action of the court. It was not proper to attempt to bring this matter into the evidence in the cause. If defendant supposed there was any foundation for the charge of an attempt to tamper with the witness, it should have been brought to the attention of the court in some one of several proper modes. It can only be excused on the ground that the suit seems to have developed a great deal of bitterness between some of those connected with it and defendant Crim. What steps, if any, the court took to have the charge investigated do not appear.

Appellants' assignment of error No. 5. It was error to hear the cause before it was matured at rules, and to dismiss the cause as to defendants C. J. and H. L. Roy. H. L. Roy was examined as a witness for plaintiff, and the record shows that Pickens was served with process, but that neither of the Roys ever appeared, or were served with the writ of summons. All three were made parties to the original bill, and served with process, but neither ever entered any appearance at any time. There was a written contract dated October 1, 1888, by which Pickens sold and delivered to defendant Samuel J. Heatherly 100 head of two year old cattle, for which Heatherly was to pay Pickens $3\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound when weighed at the scales, and Heatherly paid down on the cattle \$1,057.50. By this contract, Heatherly agreed to keep the said cattle until the 20th day of August, 1889, at which time, or, rather, say at any time between August 20 and September 20, 1889, Pickens agreed and bound himself to buy said cattle back again at $4\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound, payable at the scales in cash, when weighed. It was signed by both parties, and afterwards signed by the two Roys, who state, in writing in the contract above their names, that they together were a half partner with Dever Pickens in the said within contract, and thereby ratified the said contract to the extent of one-half of said Pickens' liability therein. The trustee in the deed of trust, M. Peck, to whom the cattle were conveyed and transferred, was directed to feed and keep these cattle, and carry out and fulfill this contract on the part of Heatherly, for the benefit of his creditors thereby secured; and this contract, and the recital thereof, and direction thereby given in the deed of trust, are stated and alleged in plaintiff's original bill. There is no allegation on the subject in the amended bill. Pickens is not, but the two Roys are, made parties defendant to the amended bill. The evidence tends to show that this 100 head of cattle were worth at the contract price, at the day of delivery, about \$3,000. They were an important part of the subject-matter of the suit. Pickens and the two Roys were interested therein, with nothing to show that they had ever relinquished such interest. They were proper parties in plaintiff's case as made by his pleadings, and in the relief sought, and the order of sale entered by the court, and in the proceeds. The cause should have been matured as to them; at any rate, it should not, in the interest of the other defendants, have been dismissed by plaintiff, as was done as to defendants Pickens and the two Roys. The trustee, M. Peck, under the order of the court, sold these cattle for cash on the 3d day of October, 1889, at \$3.17 per 100 pounds, to defendant Crim, for \$4,270.30, and the purchase money seems to be in court to the credit of the cause. They were interested in the cattle; are interested in the proceeds of sale, in the decision made, or to be made, which ought to have provided for and settled their claims or rights, if any, in the matters decided; and, as these proceedings manifestly affect their rights and claims, they should have been retained as parties, so that they would have been bound by the orders and decrees of the court in that behalf, and the matters of conflicting claims settled completely, and not left half done. I would conjecture that they were willing to relinquish all claims under their contract; but it should not be left to conjecture, but should have been settled, one way or the other, by the estoppel that would have resulted from simply retaining them as parties. I do not know that putting them back would now answer any useful purpose. I infer not. It has passed that point. The low price at which the cattle sold, compared with what they were to give, has worked a practical settlement.

Assignments Nos. 6 and 7, that no sale should have been decreed and made pendente lite without ascertainment of the "valid liens" against the property "admittedly" older than those decreed, or to disburse the surplus proceeds of sale of the tract of land of 197½ acres, called in the deed of trust the "Talbot Tract," which appears, from allusions made to it in testimony, to have been sold in some suit brought to enforce the vendor's lien, and still pending. That suit ought to have been heard with this one, or have been referred to in some way, so that it could have been looked into, if necessary; and the decree complained of, and this record, show that such looking into was necessary in the court below, and, as the case stands, if affirmed, would be necessary here. The record shows that J. Hop Woods and J. M. Kirk had attached this 197½ acres before it was conveyed by the deed of trust; that it had been sold to enforce payment of some balance of purchase money, secured by vendor's lien reserved, in some suit in the name of J. W. Proudfoot, still pending. All this certainly appears from something incidentally let fall by one or more of the witnesses, but vaguely and obscurely, as to what the court must know definitely and clearly before making it the subject of a decree in this, an independent suit against this land, as one of the tracts embraced in the deed of trust herein assailed for fraudulent preference given. And, more than that, this decree proceeds on the theory that there is a surplus in court to the credit of the Proudfoot suit, after satisfying the plaintiff's vendor's lien. This surplus, if any, (which I take to be doubtful from what is said about it by the witness,) is still real estate, so far, at least, as the enforcement of specific liens against it before sale are concerned. See Pickens v.

Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 997; Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 150, 14 S. E. 447; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1167.

The gist of the decree of December 23, 1892, appealed from, reads as follows: "And the court, having maturely considered the pleadings and proofs in these causes, is of opinion that the deed of trust executed by Samuel J. Heatherly to Melville Peck, trustee, on the 31st day of January, 1889, was made by the said Heatherly with intent to delay, hinder, and defraud his creditors, and especially the plaintiff in said first-named cause, and the several defendants, C. C. Martin & Co., Thompson & Jackson, Timothy Male, Webster Wagon Co., and Amos Whiteley, in the collection of their several demands against him, and the petitioner, James A. Williamson, in the collection of his debt of $153.52, with interest from the 18th day of February, 1889, and two dollars and eighty-five cents against him, mentioned in his said petition No. 1, and that the said Melville Peck, trustee, had notice of said fraudulent intent of Samuel J. Heatherly. It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said deed of trust dated January 31, 1889, executed by Samuel J. Heatherly to Melville Peck, trustee, as to the several debts due from Samuel J. Heatherly to the plaintiff, the Zell Guano Co., and to the several defendants, C. C. Martin & Co., Thompson & Jackson, Timothy Male, Amos Whiteley, Webster Wagon Co., and as to the debt of $153.52 due to the petitioner, James A. Williamson, is fraudulent and void; but nothing herein contained shall in any manner impair the force, effect, or priority of any valid lien against the real estate of Samuel J. Heatherly which existed on or before January 31, 1889, in favor of any of the parties to these causes, or which may have been since acquired by any of them; and all such rights not extinguished, and all remedies to enforce the same, are reserved to such parties, respectively. And it appearing to the satisfaction of the court from the pleadings and proofs herein that the defendant Samuel J. Heatherly, on the 31st day of January, 1889, was indebted as follows: To the Zell Guano Co., $1,221.82, amounting, on the 13th of October, 1892, including interest and $8.00 costs, to the sum of $1,496.05; to the defendant C. C. Martin & Co., $342.96, with interest from the 7th of November, 1888, amounting, on the 13th of October, 1892, to $422.95; to Thompson and Jackson, $1,044.27, amounting, on the 31st of October, 1892, including interest and $24.70 costs, to $1,316.57; to Timothy Male, $49.50, with interest from February 11, 1889, and $2.40 costs, amounting, on the 13th of October, 1892, to $62.80; to Webster Wagon Co., $2,212.16, amounting, on the 31st of October, 1892, including interest, to $2,667.02; to Amos Whiteley, $1,820.15, amounting, on the 31st of October, 1892, to $2,218.97; to James A. Williamson, his said debt, amounting, on the 31st of October, 1892, to $190.00,—all of which remains unpaid,—it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the defendant Samuel J. Heatherly do pay to the plaintiff, the Zell Guano Company, the sum of $1,496.05; to the defendant C. C. Martin & Co., $422.95; to Thompson & Jackson, $1,316.57; to Timothy Male, $62.80; to Webster Wagon Co., $2,667.02; to Amos Whiteley, $2,213.97; and to petitioner, James A. Williamson, $190.00,—with interest upon each of said several amounts from the 31st day of October, 1892, until paid. And the court being further, of the opinion that the plaintiff in said first-named cause, by the institution of its suit on the 2d day of February, 1889; and the several defendants,—C. C. Martin & Co., by the filing of their answer on the 6th day of February, 1889; Thompson & Jackson, by the filing of their answer on the 12th day of February, 1889; Timothy Male, by the filing of his answer on the 16th day of February, 1889; Webster Wagon Co., by the filing of its answer on the 18th day of February, 1889; Amos Whiteley, by the filing of his answer on the 23d day of February, 1889; and the said Williamson, by the filing of his petition No. 1 on the 7th day of September, 1891,—severally acquired liens upon the real and personal property of the said Samuel J. Heatherly in said deed of trust, and upon the proceeds of the sale thereof, mentioned in the report of said special commissioner, Peck, for the amounts of their several debts, in the following order of priority, that is to say: First, Zell Guano Company, for $1,496.05, as of the 2d day of February, 1889; second, C. C. Martin & Company, for $422.95, as of the 6th day of February, 1889; third, Thompson & Jackson, for $1,316.57, as of the 12th day of February, 1889; fourth, Timothy Male, for $62.80, as of the 16th day of February, 1889; fifth, Webster Wagon Company, for $2,667.02, as of the 18th day of February, 1889; sixth, Amos Whiteley, for $2,213.97, as of the 23d day of February, 1889; seventh, James A. Williamson, for $190.00, as of the 7th of September, 1891,—it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that out of the residue, if any, of the proceeds of the sale of the tract of 197½ acres of land, conveyed to said Samuel J. Heatherly by Richard T. Talbott, remaining after satisfying to him or his assignees, F. M. Durbin, Isaac W. Proudfoot, and Martin E. Lawson, the unpaid purchase money on said tract of land, and the proceeds of the sale of said personal and other real property of the defendant Samuel J. Heatherly in said deed of trust mentioned, there shall be paid to the last-named creditors of Samuel J. Heatherly, in the order of priority above declared, the several amounts above ascertained to be due them, respectively, with interest from the 31st of October, 1892, together with the plaintiff's costs in said first-named cause, and the costs of said several defendants, C. C. Martin &

Co., Thompson & Jackson, Timothy Male, Webster Wagon Company, and petitioner, Jas. A. Williamson, upon his petition No. 1; and that, until the same be fully paid, no part of the proceeds of the sale of said personal and real property of said Samuel J. Heatherly shall be applied to the satisfaction of any of his other debts mentioned in said deed of trust. And the court being further of the opinion that, from the want of proper parties to the petition No. 1 of said James A. Williamson, the questions arising on the face thereof in regard to the relief therein prayed for against the said Samuel J. Heatherly as a cosurety with him on the official bond of James E. Heatherly, as late sheriff of Barbour county, cannot be properly determined, all rights of said Williamson in respect thereto are reserved to him, and he hath leave to amend his said petition, and to make additional parties thereto. And the court not having before it sufficient facts to determine whether any, and, if any, what, liens existed against the real estate of Samuel J. Heatherly before the execution of the said deed of trust, or the character, amounts, or priorities thereof, or to which lands the same attach, it declines for the present to direct the sale of any of said lands. And it further appearing to the court, from the report of Special Commissioner Melville Peck that he sold the personal property mentioned in the deed of trust on the 3d day of October, 1889, for the sum of $4,890.25, of which, on that day, he received in cash $4,409.25, and $481 in notes bearing interest from that day; that he paid out for expenses attending said sale $17.25; and that his lawful commission for making said sale, and for collecting and disbursing the proceeds thereof amount to the sum of $106.81,—it is ordered that the said report and sale be confirmed, and that said Peck be allowed to retain said two sums out of the proceeds of said sale as of the date thereof. And the court having ordered the said commissioner, out of said proceeds, to pay James A. Williamson, sheriff, the sum of $351.74 on the — of October, 1889, and to John Shank, sheriff, $326.55 on the 22d day of May, 1891, on account of taxes due from the defendant S. J. Heatherly upon the real and personal property in said deed of trust mentioned, which sums have been paid by said Commissioner Peck, it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that said Peck be allowed, upon said proceeds, further credits as follows: For said $351.74 so paid Williamson, as of October 3, 1889, and for said $326.55 paid Shank, as of May 22, 1891. And the court, with the assent of Commissioner Peck that there is remaining in his hands, out of the proceeds of said sale, including interest accrued thereon to the 22d day of December, 1892, the sum of $4,920.01, applicable to the payment of the amounts hereinbefore decreed to be paid, it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said Special Commissioner Peck, out of the moneys in his hands, do pay, first, to the Zell Guano Company, its costs herein incurred up to this date, and then pay to said Zell Guano Company, C. C. Martin & Company, Thompson & Jackson, and Timothy Male the several debts hereinbefore decreed to them, respectively, with interest thereon from the 31st day of October, 1892, until paid, in the order of priority hereinbefore declared, and their costs, and the residue of said $4,889.85, amounting to $——, with interest upon said residue as aforesaid, to the Webster Wagon Company, in part satisfaction of the debt hereinbefore decreed to be paid to them. All other questions touching the amounts, validity, and priority of the several debts claimed to be due the other defendants, and touching their rights to participate in the proceeds of the real estate of said Samuel J. Heatherly in the deed of trust mentioned, after the satisfaction of the several debts hereinbefore provided for, are reserved for such future orders and decrees as may be proper to be made herein."

In the case of Johns v. James, 8 Ch. Div. 744, following Garrard v. Lauderdale, 3 Sim. 1, it was held that a trust deed by which property is conveyed for the benefit of creditors does not, of itself, create a trust for any of the creditors, but that such an assignment was a mere revocable and controllable private arrangement for the convenience of the debtor, and that there was no trust for the benefit of the creditors; it was a mere revocable mandate, unless the creditor has himself executed the deed,—has been a party to it, and assented to it. See Johns v. James, Brett Lead. Cas. Eq. 21, 23, and notes; Lewin, Trusts, (1st Amer. Ed., by Flint, from 8th Eng. Ed.) c. 20, top page 509 et seq., and notes. And this would be true in this state in such a conveyance to secure debts generally, to which no trustee or creditor is a party; but if it has been sanctioned by previous assent or subsequent ratification, although by subsequent assent or ratification, by act in pais, by trustee or cestui que trust, before the rights of other parties attach, it becomes irrevocably binding. Skipwith v. Cunningham, (1837,) 8 Leigh, 271, since followed. See Spencer v. Ford, (1843,) 1 Rob. (Va.) 648; 1 Bart. Ch. Pr. 102. Deeds of trust have been the favorite mode of securing debts and creating specific liens, and have long been recognized and regarded, to some extent, by statute; and, although not recommended by the revisers, the legislature caused sections 5, 6, c. 117, of the Code of 1849 (now sections 5-8, c. 72, Code W. Va.,—see Ed. 1891, p. 638) to be inserted,—a provision that has been in constant use for more than 40 years. And when, for any proper cause, a court of equity is called upon to take control of the trust property, the general rule is to go on and have the trustee execute and administer the trusts under its direction, and with its sanction, especially where the court, having taken control, properly sets it aside in part, and lets it stand good as to the residue; the general rule being that, where a decree is entered which manifestly affects the rights and remedies of all the trust creditors, the court goes on and provides for the rights of all the trust creditors in the matter decided, and others having prior specific liens on the property to be sold, ascertaining and arranging such liens, not by piecemeal, but by decrees ascertaining the rights of all, and doing complete justice to all, according to their respective rights, before selling the property, or before distributing the proceeds, if a sale has been made, as is sometimes proper, in advance of such ascertainment. This mode of proceeding as to judgment liens is required, and the mode prescribed, by section 7, c. 139, of the Code. See Ed. 1891, p. 882. So that it was error to distribute, in this case, any surplus fund left over from the sale of the tract of land of 197½ acres—the Talbott tract—at this stage of the cause, when there is nothing in this record to show the amount of such surplus, how it arose, or where it is, or really who is entitled to it.

Assignment No. 8. That it was error to decree payment of the claim of defendant Timothy Male because the record shows it paid. Male was examined as a witness, and his evidence does not show it paid, but assigned by him to defendant A. S. Polling.

Assignment No. 9 has already been considered. The court should go on and ascertain the facts necessary to fix and classify the liens, and determine who are entitled to participate in the proceeds of the sale of the lands, and in what order, and to what extent.

Assignment No. 10 is based on the contention that the decree complained of sets aside the trust deed in toto in favor of plaintiff and other impeaching creditors, although but one of the many debts secured is in any way assailed. This contention is not well founded, except as matter of inference. The decree itself has no such effect by the language used, but may have such meaning and ultimate effect by necessary implication. It reads as follows: "It is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said deed of trust, * * * as to the several debts due from Samuel J. Heatherly to the plaintiff, the Zell Guano Co., and to the several defendants, C. C. Martin & Co., [naming the others] is fraudulent and void." Nor does its language anywhere, as far as I can discover, justify any other interpretation than the one which restricts the invalidity expressly pronounced to its effect on the claims of the creditors specifically named, leaving the others in full force and effect, except as to what may follow as the result of the opinion of the court that "Melville Peck, trustee, had notice of the fraudulent intent of Samuel J. Heatherly, the trust debtor." So important a matter should not have been left in such a state of doubt, leaving the rights of the other creditors unsettled and in confusion. The deed of trust assailed as fraudulent in this suit was executed on the 31st day of January, 1889, by defendant Samuel J. Heatherly, by which he conveyed to defendant Melville Peck, trustee, all his property, real and personal, to secure and pay all his debts, divided into eight classes, with priority given in the order in which they are numbered: (1) Taxes, etc., outstanding against the grantor, Samuel J. Heatherly; (2) certain holders of vendors' liens on a tract of land called the "Talbot Tract," containing 197½ acres; (3) Joseph N. B. Crim, the sum of $8,100; (4) a debt to Leonard Mallonee; (5) a debt due the First National Bank of Grafton; (6) to George W. Dickinson and various other creditors, naming them; (7) to Aldine S. Poling, $300, etc.; (8) and, last, the claim of plaintiff and the other impeaching creditors, and all his other creditors. The personal property was worth about $5,000, and the land about $12,000 or $15,000. Defendant Samuel J. Heatherly had become very much involved in debt as surety or indorser for his son. He had his liabilities and his own debts listed, as far as he could, and posted up, and found that all his property would not pay them. He then set about trying to borrow $5,000 or $6,000 by giving a deed of trust on his land for the purpose of putting that much out of the reach of his creditors. J. N. B. Crim had a list of these debts, and knew that Samuel J. Heatherly was broken up, not having property enough to pay these debts against him, yet he loaned him $6,500 in money, part of the $8,100, and had the deed of trust executed, as already mentioned. The loan was fictitious, being only intended to help defendant Heatherly to put that much of his property beyond the reach of his creditors, the identical money in the same packages (except $475) being returned to defendant Crim on the 8th day of January, 1891. He contemplated, when it was loaned, that some of it should be used by Heatherly in satisfying certain liens against the property embraced in the deed of trust, but for some reason this purpose was not carried out; perhaps because, before all the money loaned was paid over to defendant Heatherly, this suit assailing the deed of trust was instituted.

This brings me to what I regard as the turning point in the case: Can this court say, as the circuit court has said, that the trustee had notice of the grantor's fraudulent intent, and, if so, what is the effect? It has long been the settled law of this state that the trustee and creditors in such a deed of trust are purchasers, and not creditors, under the statute against fraudulent conveyances, and that it is not necessary to the validity of a deed of trust that it should be executed by the cestui que trust,—the creditor secured. The deed operates to pass the legal title as soon as executed by the grantor and the trustee, and can only be avoided by the dissent, express or implied, of the cestui que trust. Skipwith v. Cunningham, (1837,) 8 Leigh, 271. This is based on the presumption that it is beneficial, and, being beneficial, is acquiesced in, until in some way renounced, and hence the assent of the grantee is implied in all conveyances—First, because of the supposed benefit; secondly, because it is incongruous and absurd that, when a conveyance is completely executed on the grantor's part, the estate should continue in him; thirdly, to prevent the uncertainty of the freehold. Id. 282. In this case the trustee executed the deed of trust, and thereby affirmatively accepted it, and, the legal title being vested in him, a trust arose in behalf of the creditors in whose favor it was declared, and such trust is irrevocable, and so continues until disavowed or disclaimed by the cestui que trust. Seven of the creditors, including the plaintiff, soon expressed their dissent, disclaiming to take under the trust deed, and uniting with the plaintiff in assailing it, and in their favor the decree complained of was entered. Six of the creditors claiming under the deed insist that it is valid, and they, together with the trustee and trust debtor, make up the eight appellants. There can be no reasonable doubt that the deed was executed with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the grantor's creditors. Did the trustee participate in it, or have notice of it? When the deed of trust was completed, after dark, the bank was closed, and the money loaned was not paid until the next day, $5,145, and the residue, $1,355, on the 4th of February, by check. What there can be about the time of payment, as compared with the precise time when the deed of trust was executed and recorded, that could possibly be construed as untrue in any practical, substantial sense, or as affecting the question of fraudulent intent, I am wholly unable to see. It was contemporaneous with the making of the deed, for all practical purposes, just as it was intended to be. I can see no harm in doing it in that way, and certainly no inculcating significance in the trustee knowing that it was thus done. He was the son-in-law, and to some extent the legal adviser, of defendant Crim. Neither relation disqualified him from being made the trustee. Such relationship is no badge of fraud; at best, it could only be a circumstance which might, in connection with other things, indicate one in whom secret confidence might be reposed by one of the trust creditors, but not by the trust debtor. Mr. Peck answers both the original bill and the amended bill fully, upon all points calling for answer from him: That the transaction, as far as he had anything to do with it himself, or had any knowledge of the intent and purpose of the grantor, or of any creditor secured, was perfectly bona fide, without any desire or intention on their part to hinder, delay, or defraud plaintiff or any other person; that he is a purchaser for valuable consideration of the trust property, without notice or knowledge of any fraud or fraudulent intent on the part of any one; that he wrote the deed of trust; that up to that time he had no knowledge of either the property or the debts of defendant Samuel J. Heatherly, or of his son, James E. Heatherly, or that he was insolvent; that he believed defendant Samuel J. Heatherly to have been solvent, and on December 10, 1888, believed and supposed him to be worth $35,000 or $40,000 above all his own debts and those for which he was liable for others. His deposition was taken, and he testifies to the same facts, and that he had not a particle of interest in any debt secured, direct or indirect, as far as he knew, nor any notice or information, of any kind or character, that any one was attempting or intending to commit any fraud about the execution of the deed of trust; and I have searched this record through and through carefully, without being able to find any fact or circumstance fairly tending, in any degree, to bring home to him any notice of or participation in the fraud or fraudulent purpose of the trust debtor. Therefore, it was error in the circuit court to hold, as it did, in the decree complained of, "that the said Melville Peck, trustee, had notice of the fraudulent intent of Samuel J. Heatherly." Although it was right in holding that the deed of trust was executed by the grantor with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud plaintiff, and the other creditors who impeach its validity, so far as it is made to secure the debt of $8,100 it is not, and would not be, right, on the facts disclosed by this record, to hold, inferentially, such deed voidable as to any of the other trust creditors named therein, for the reason that there is no evidence tending in the slightest degree to show that any of such other claims are fictitious, or in any way fraudulent or otherwise invalid, or that such other creditors, personally, or by their agent, the trustee, participated in or had notice of the fraudulent intent or contrivance of the grantor, but, so far as appears, they are honest debts, entitled to be paid, as provided for in the deed of trust. The debt of $8,100, designated as "No. 3" in the order of payment mentioned in the deed of trust, should be remitted to the foot, and placed in a new class, "No. 8," to be paid last in the order of priority, but plaintiff and other creditors, whose claims were decreed them in the decree complained of, must hold their place assigned them, and have no right to be called up to No. 3, or to occupy the place made vacant by the removal therefrom of the claim of $8,100, but such vacancy is to be filled by closing up those in the rear in the order named; for, although the rule in this state is that his diligence is to be rewarded who has enlarged the fund to be distributed by removing some fraudulent contrivance that concealed it, yet the qualification of the rule is as well settled as the rule itself, that he cannot displace or impair any prior, valid, subsisting lien, and this has been held to be a proper qualification of the rule on principle. Here, the good faith of these claims was attacked by charging and attempting to bring home to the holders thereof, in the person of their agent, the trustee, notice of, if not other participation in, the fraud of the grantor; but they have successfully withstood such charge, and their claims still stand as just and honest ones, as prior liens upon the fund as a whole, still subsisting, and not to be debarred of any increase of share incident to their right to hold the place assigned them. These lienors are without fault, with claims without taint, with equal equity, and a legal right. Why should they be put aside or superseded in the order of priority against the fund as a whole, which the deed of trust has given them? But this the court does by its decree, and for such error appellants have also just ground for complaint. See Hardcastle v. Fisher, 24 Mo. 70, and Cohn v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 516, 15 S. E. 140, where the qualification of the rule is discussed, and vindicated, I think, on principle, as well as on authority, although upon the question there is some conflict. For these errors the decree complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded for the claims and liens to be ascertained and put in their proper order of priority, and the trust property or fund ascertained and administered under the direction and control of the court. Reversed and remanded.

HULINGS v. HULINGS LUMBER CO. et al.

Nov. 29, 1893.)

CORPORATIONS — BOARD OF DIRECTORS — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — VENDOR'S LIEN — SUBROGATION — CHECK AS AN EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT — CREDITOR'S BILL — ORDER OF DISTRIBUTION.

1. A corporation receives its certificate of incorporation and organizes under the act of February 28, 1877, called the "Boom Law." See Code, (Ed. 1891,) p. 1004. The board of directors must be composed of those who are stockholders, but they are not required to be residents of this state.

2. A corporation is unable to pay its debts or further carry on the business for which it was incorporated. Two of the board of directors compose a firm, which is a creditor at large of the corporation for a relatively large amount. The board of directors ordered the conveyance of all its property, real and personal, to be made to a trustee, to secure and pay its debts, giving a preference to the claim of the firm composed of the two directors. These two directors, in violation of the statute, (section 52, c. 53, Code,) were present at the board while the subject of ordering the conveyance giving their claim such preference was being considered, but they did not vote on that question. Held, the conveyance giving such preference made by virtue and in pursuance of such order is prima facie fraudulent and void as to the preference thus given, when assailed by the creditors, and will be so declared, unless it be shown on behalf of such preferred creditor by the most clear and convincing proof that such preference was not only free from fraud, but was in itself, under the circumstances, both fair and reasonable.

3. Those who sold and conveyed land to the corporation reserved on the face of the conveyance a lien on the land for the payment of the balance of the purchase money. A third person, at the instance of the corporation, advanced the money to pay off and lift such purchase-money notes, with the understanding that he was to hold them as additional security for the money thus loaned and advanced. Held, such third person, so paying and lifting from the vendors the purchase-money notes, is entitled, as far as may be necessary, to be subrogated to such vendors' liens.

4. A check operates as an equitable assignment pro tanto from the time it is drawn and delivered, as between the drawer and the payee or holder.

5. A general assignment for the benefit of creditors does not defeat the check holder, although the check be not presented to the bank for payment until after such assignment.

6. A case in which it is held that creditors assailing a deed of trust as illegal and fraudulent, and succeeding as to one, and only one, of the claims thereby secured, are not entitled to occupy, in the order of payment out of the trust fund, which is treated as a whole, the place thus made vacant, or to displace, or in any manner lessen or impair, the claims of the bona fide creditors, who are without fault, and therefore retain the place given them in the trust deed.

Appeal from circuit court, Tucker county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

Action in equity by M. Howard Hulings, trustee, against the Hulings Lumber Company, Kenneweg & Co., and others. From the decree rendered, defendants Kenneweg & Co. and others appeal. Reversed.

Dayton & Dayton, C. F. Teter, J. P. Scott, and A. Jay Valentine, for appellants. Carl I. Heydrick and C. Heydrick, for appellees Mitchell & Co. Jos. Sprigg, for appellee First Nat. Bank of Cumberland. A. B. Parsons and W. J. Hulings, for appellee Hulings Lumber Co.

HOLT, J. This is a suit in equity, brought in the circuit court of Tucker county in February, 1891, by the appellee M. Howard Hulings, trustee, against the Hulings Lumber Company and the various creditors of that corporation, in order to receive the instructions and directions of the court, and conform his action thereto, in his administration of the trusts imposed upon him by the deed from the Hulings Lumber Company to him, dated December 1, 1890. Defendants Kenneweg & Co. and 14 other creditors of the Hulings Lumber Company, who are appellants, answered, and by way of prayer, etc., under the statute for affirmative relief, attacked the deed of trust as illegal, fraudulent, and void, and prayed that it might be set aside. Plaintiff replied specially to these various answers, and the issues were made up. On the 10th day of March, 1891, the cause was referred to Commissioner Adams, who was directed to ascertain and report the property, real and personal, of the Hulings Lumber Company, the state and condition of the title thereto, the liens thereon, to whom owing, with their respective amounts, order, and priorities,—all the facts touching the authorization and execution by the defendant corporation of the three deeds of trust in the bill and proceedings mentioned. In execution of this order, the commissioner took a great deal of testimony touching these matters, and on the 9th of June, 1891, returned a very full report, to which various exceptions were taken and filed. The commissioner filed a supplemental report. On June 20, 1891, the court, without passing upon the report or exceptions thereto, and by consent of all parties, decreed the sale of all the property, real and personal, in this state, belonging to the Hulings Lumber Company, and appointed commissioners to make the same. A sale was made at the price of $95,005, and reported, but the court, by decree of August 28, 1891, refused to confirm the same for inadequacy of price, set it aside, and directed a resale, and by the same decree ordered the First National Bank of Cumberland to pay Kenneweg & Co. $947.25, amount of a check in controversy. On the 2d of December, 1891, the cause came on for hearing on the merits, on the commissioner's report, exceptions thereto, and other papers, and the court, on mature consideration, overruled all the exceptions, except that of Ann M. Garrison, which was sustained, placing her claim in the seventh class. In all other respects the report of Commissioner Adams was approved and confirmed, subject to certain modifications set out in the decree. By this decree the court held valid the three deeds of trust on the property in question, and directed the payment of the various liens in the order thus provided for, and as reported by the commissioner. From this decree these 15 defendants, on January 30, 1892, obtained this appeal, assigning the following grounds of error: (1) It was error to overrule the various exceptions to the commissioner's report. (2) It was error to uphold, under the circumstances, the debt of $35,000 of defendants F. W. Mitchell & Co. (3) It was error to refuse to hold all three deeds of trust nullities, and to refuse to decree defendants' several debts as just liens on the property of the corporation, in the order of the filing of their several answers praying such affirmative relief. (4) It was error, in any event, to sustain the debt secured in the last trust deed to defendants Hulings & Co., and to refuse to postpone it to petitioner's debts.

The important facts of the case are as follows: On the 20th day of February, 1884, Marcus Hulings, Willis J. Hulings, Noah F. Clark, John E. Butler, George W. Dorr, of Oil City, Pa., and William B. Maxwell, of St. George, W. Va., received from the secretary of state of West Virginia, their certificate of incorporation, creating and declaring them from that date a corporation, by the name of the Hulings Lumber Company, until the 1st day of February, 1915. See Sess.

Acts 1885, p. 467. This certificate is the charter of the company. Quite a controversy has been raised and discussed as to what chapter of our Code or act of the legislature this company was organized under. This is due, in part at least, to some acts which were not incorporated into the revisals subsequent to the revisal of the West Virginia Code of 1868, especially Act Feb. 28, 1877, (see Acts 1877, p. 178;) as amended by Act March 10, 1881, (see Acts 1881, p. 296;) as again amended by Act Feb. 9, 1882, (see Acts 1882, p. 15;) again amended by Act Feb. 20, 1883, (see Acts 1883, p. 34;) again amended by Act Feb. 27, 1885, (see Acts 1885, p. 47;) again by Act Feb. 20, 1880, (see Acts 1889, p. 39.) This act, authorizing the erection of booms, etc., was originally confined to a few counties in the state, and the amendments were chiefly confined to making it apply from time to time, to additional counties. The act of March 10, 1881, introduced for the first time the county of Tucker as one of the counties to which the act of February 28, 1877, applied. This was the only amendment of section 1, but, in addition, sections 21, 23, 24, and 26 were amended and re-enacted; so that the act as thus amended, reads as we now find it in the Code of 1891, (Append. p. 1004,) except the addition of other counties, by amendments of section 1 afterwards made. This company was organized for the purpose of buying, selling, and manufacturing timber, etc., for operating lumber mills, constructing a boom in Tucker county on Cheat river within two miles, and below the mouth of Shafer's Fork, etc. When we look at the act of 1877, as amended by the act of 1881, authorizing the construction of a boom in Tucker county, and by the twenty-first section conferring the power, among other things, to purchase, sell, and hold timber lands, there can be no question but that this lumber company, owning a boom, sawmills, and about 25,000 acres of timber lands on Cheat river and its waters, was organized under this act, for by no other statute do we find all these powers conferred. Under this act, therefore, it received its charter or certificate of incorporation. It organized at Oil City, Pa., on the 20th of February, 1885; Marcus Hulings having subscribed for 100 shares, of $100 each; Willis J. Hulings, 1,275 shares; Noah F. Clark, 10 shares; George W. Dorr, 10 shares; and William B. Maxwell, 5 shares,—making 1,500 shares, of $100 each, $150,000, the amount of the capital stock, of which $25,000 were paid in pro rata by the stockholders. The board of directors then and there elected were Noah Clark, J. E. Butler, J. C. Simpson, Samuel Justice, Marcus Hulings, George W. Dorr, and W. J. Hulings. W. J. Hulings was elected president, J. E. Butler treasurer, and D. W. Osburn secretary. Its principal office or place of business has always been Oil City, state of Pennsylvania, with a branch office at St. George, Tucker county, W. Va., the county where much of its property is situated. On the 6th day of February, 1886, the lumber company, being in need of some thirty or forty thousand dollars to pay off and lift from the several vendors the balance of the purchase moneys respectively due them on the several tracts of land which they had sold and conveyed, reserving on the face of the conveyances liens for such unpaid balances, induced defendants F. W. Mitchell & Co., bankers of Oil City, to lend the money, $35,000, by giving them a deed of trust to secure the same on the various tracts of land, comprising about 24,800 acres. It was also a part of the agreement that F. W. Mitchell & Co. were to hold, as further security for the money loaned, the purchase-money notes with their vendor's liens thus paid to the original vendors and taken up. This agreement was carried out. The deed of trust of February 6, 1886, on all these lands, (29 tracts,) was duly executed by the company, conveying the same to C. M. Husbands, Jr., trustee, and was duly acknowledged and admitted to record in the counties of Tucker and Randolph, where the lands lie, and the purchase-money notes were lifted and turned over to F. W. Mitchell & Co., who still hold them, unpaid, as further security under the agreement. On the 1st day of July, 1889, the lumber company, being still further in need of money to carry on its operations and pay its debts, conveyed all its real property situate in Tucker county, describing it, to William H. Wise, trustee, to secure the payment of 75 bonds, of $1,000 each, which deed was also duly executed, acknowledged, and admitted to record in the county of Tucker. These bonds were never sold, but were hypothecated to various banks and individuals as security for money loaned the lumber company, aggregating the sum of about $49,500. Both of these trust deeds are recited as subsisting liens in the trust deed of general assignment to pay debts executed to M. Howard Hulings, trustee, the plaintiff in this suit.

It is claimed on behalf of appellants that all three of these deeds of trust are nullities, and therefore confer no liens and give no preferences, because the directors, one and all, are now, and have been from the beginning, nonresidents of this state, and that it is subject to section 49, c. 53, of the Code, which on this point reads as follows: "They [the stockholders] may in general meeting by a bylaw prescribe the number of which the board [of directors] shall consist; but unless a different number be so prescribed there shall be five directors. They may also by bylaw prescribe the qualifications of directors; but if it be not otherwise provided, every director must be a resident of this state and a stockholder." But, in my opinion, this point is not well taken, for the following reasons: (1) This company obtained its certificate or charter of incorporation under section 3, c. 121, of the Acts of 1877, giving—First, the name of the proposed corporation; second, the place at which it was proposed to construct its boom, dams, etc., within two miles below the mouth of Shafer's Fork of Cheat river, Tucker county; third, the place at which shall be established and maintained the principal office, viz. Oil City, state of Pennsylvania; fourth, the time of commencement, etc.; fifth, the amount of capital stock, viz. $150,000, the number of shares, 1,500, each of the par value of $100; sixth, the names and places of residence of the several persons forming the association for incorporation, and the number of shares subscribed by each, showing that 5 of the corporators subscribing for all the capital stock, except the nominal amount of 5 shares out of the 1,500, are nonresidents of this state, and residents of Oil City, Pa. (2) Section 6 of the act of 1877 provides that every corporation organized under the provision of this act shall hold its first meeting at such time and place as may be designated by the corporators thereof, and all subsequent meetings at such place or places, in or out of this state, as the directors may from time to time appoint, except as hereinafter specially provided; and the stockholders shall have authority at their first meeting or any subsequent meeting to fix and determine the place of meeting (in or out of this state) of the directors, and the principal office or place of business of said corporation. Such corporation shall have and maintain an office or place of business in this state for the transaction of business, specifying what must be done and kept there with great detail and particularity; and so with section 7. The act of 1877 comprehends the provisions of section 49 of chapter 53 of the Code, covering the same ground to their exclusion in the case of boom companies. Like section 48, c. 53, it prescribes that, if the by-laws fix no place for the annual meeting of the stockholders, then it shall be held at the principal office or place of business of the corporation; in this case, at Oil City. It provides that the number of directors shall be not less than 5, nor more than 13, and prescribes as their qualifications that they shall be stockholders, not that they must be residents of this state and stockholders, as in section 49; thus covering the ground completely, in default of by-law, both as to the place of meeting and the number and qualifications of directors. Chapter 181 of the Acts of 1872-73, to which it is made subject, relates to the right of the voting stockholder to cumulate his votes, (see Acts 1872-73, p. 535,) and section 29 of the act of 1877 does not alter the construction in this respect; for section 49, c. 53, on this point, as well as on many others, is plainly excluded by this act as covering fully the same grounds with inconsistent provisions. In fact, the main purpose of companies such as this is to buy and own timber lands, and manufacture and sell lumber; and this cannot be done, so far as holding the necessary quantity of timber land is concerned, under any other act or chapter. See fifth clause of section 21 of the act of 1877. Any other construction than this would contravene its main purpose, and render idle and nugatory its charter.

Defendants Willis J. Hulings and John E. Butler, who were the partners composing the firm of Hulings & Co., conveyed to the corporation property estimated at about $7,000, consisting of mills, boom, saw logs, tools, horses, and camp equipage; and Marcus Hulings and wife conveyed to it about 21,000 acres of timber lands, situated in the counties of Randolph and Tucker. When Mr. Hulings obtained title to these lands, he gave his notes for deferred payments, his vendors retaining in their respective deeds liens therefor; and at the time of his conveyance to the corporation there were outstanding, and not yet due, $28,837.70 of these liens, with interest, and in his deed to the corporation he retained a vendor's lien for the same amount, agreeing, however, that the discharge of any of these liens to his vendors should work a discharge pro tanto of the lien retained by him. Subsequently the Hulings Lumber Company acquired title to about 4,000 acres of other lands, by consummating mere options to purchase, which M. Hulings held, and upon which vendor's liens were retained in the deeds of conveyance to the extent of about $8,750. This includes interest to June 12, 1891. Thus, the Hulings Lumber Company, in the year 1885, became the owners of about 25,000 acres of land, charged with the payment of these sums, to the amount of $28,837.70; for the payment of which the vendors selling to M. Hulings retained liens upon the face of their respective conveyances, which are of record; and the notes given therefor are not paid, but have been assigned or transferred, and remain unpaid in the hands of other parties, most of them in the hands of defendants F. W. Mitchell & Co. Soon after the organization of the corporation, viz. on November 4, 1885, a directors' meeting was held at Oil City, which has always been the place of the principal office, until, on June 13, 1890, it was changed to Hulings, W. Va., with a branch at Oil City. At this meeting, on November 4, 1885, J. E. Butler, J. C. Simpson, Samuel Justice, George Dorr, Marcus Hulings, and W. J. Hulings constituted the board of directors, and were the owners of 90 per cent. of the stock. W. J. Hulings was president, J. E. Butler was treasurer, and D. W. Osburn was secretary, and there was no change in the personnel of the board or the officers down to March 9, 1887, when, Dorr having resigned, at a meeting of the stockholders they were all selected, except that F. H. Steel was elected a director in the place of G. W. Dorr. This act of 1877 vests all the corporate powers in the board of directors, and section 1, c. 52, which treats of corporations, generally declares what a corporation shall be, and enumerates its powers; and among them it may sue and be sued; plead and be impleaded; contract and be contracted with, by simple contract or specialty; purchase, hold, use, and grant estate, real and personal; appoint officers and agents, prescribe their powers, duties, and liabilities; take bond and security from any of them, and fix and pay their compensation; and make ordinances, by-laws, and regulations for the government of its council, board, officers, and agents, and the management and regulation of its property and business,—such in fact as the common law itself makes it. See Report of Revisors of Code of 1849, p. 323. The directors of a corporation are, as to all purposes of dealing with others, the corporation itself, and, when convened as a board, they are the primary possessors of all the powers possessed by the corporation. What they do as the representatives of the corporation the corporation itself is deemed to do. See Ellerman v. Stock Yards Co., (N. J. Ch.; filed Dec. 18, 1891,) 23 Atl. 287, 35 Amer. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 388, and notes of editor. A director duly elected or appointed is a director de jure. Those who usurp the office of director, and exercise the functions of the board of directors, under color of the election or appointment in itself not legal, become directors de facto; and the official acts of such board are valid in reference to rights which innocent third parties or strangers to the corporation may thereby acquire, for they are not bound to know—often have no right to know—what goes on in the privacy of the council chamber of the directors or stockholders. The board of directors, at this meeting held at the principal office in Oil City, Pa., on the 4th day of November, 1885, entered an order in their record or minute book, by which they authorized the president, Willis J. Hulings, to negotiate a loan for the purpose, among other things, of paying off the balance of the indebtedness for its lands; and he reported to a meeting of the board held on the 14th of December, 1885, at the same place, that he had negotiated a loan for $35,000 from defendants F. W. Mitchell & Co., a firm composed of F. W. Mitchell, F. H. Steel, and W. H. Wise. At a directors' meeting held February 6, 1886, at the principal office, W. J. Hulings, the president, presented, and was authorized to execute, to C. M. Husbands, trustee, and did execute, the deed of trust of February 6, 1886, by which the Hulings Lumber Company, by its president, conveyed to the trustee various tracts of land in the counties of Tucker and Randolph, embracing about 24,800 acres, in trust to secure to F. W. Mitchell & Co. the payment of the loan of $35,000, and the vendors' notes, secured by vendors' liens, retained, were lifted and put in their hands, as assignees or transferees, to hold as additional security for their loan to the lumber company, which loan, with 6 per cent. interest, payable semiannually, was due November 1, 1887. This is deed of trust No. 1, already referred to.

But in the mean time—that is, from February, 1885, to February, 1886—many of these notes given for the purchase of these lands had fallen due, and defendants, Hulings & Co. took up these notes to the amount of $8,299.02, with interest to June 12, 1891, composing a part of said sum. They also paid taxes and advanced other sums to the corporation, amounting in all, with interest to December 5, 1890, to $30,383.07. On December 7, 1886, the Spring Garden Bank of Pennsylvania brought suit in equity, by foreign attachment, in Tucker county, to make these lands liable for a debt claimed by the bank to be due it from Marcus Hulings, upon the ground that the corporation was not in existence when the conveyance was made to it by Marcus Hulings, and that it was voluntary and fraudulent as to his creditors. Such proceedings were had in the court below that on September 7, 1887, a decree was entered holding the deed void, and referring the cause to a commissioner to ascertain and report the liens on the lands, etc.; and, upon the coming in of the commissioner's report, the court, on 14th May, 1888, made a decree fixing the amounts and priorities of the various liens on the land, and directed a sale thereof. From this decree the defendant here, the Hulings Lumber Company, appealed, and this court reversed it, holding the conveyance good. See Spring Garden Bank v. Hulings Lumber Co., 32 W. Va. 357, 360, 9 S. E. 243.

In February, 1889, it was determined to enlarge the business, and in anticipation thereof, it seems, the stockholders had each donated one-third of his holdings of stock to the treasury of the company, thus putting into the treasury $50,000 of stock, which was to be sold at par; and, F. H. Steel and Willis J. Hulings having purchased $20,000 of this treasury stock at par, J. C. Forgie & Co., on February 5, 1889, were induced to purchase the remaining $30,000 at par. At a regular meeting of the directors held at Oil City on July 15, 1889, and at another meeting of the directors held at the same place on the 19th day of August, 1889, at which all the directors were present, and at which all the stock was present and represented, except 41 shares out of the 1,500 shares, the president and secretary were authorized and directed to prepare $75,000 of its first mortgage bonds, of $1,000 each, bearing 6 per cent. interest, and payable to bearer, with interest payable semiannually, evidenced by coupons of $30 each, attached,—from 1 to 15, inclusive, due and payable July 1, 1890; 16 to 30, inclusive, due and payable July 1, 1892, etc.; and 61 to 75, due and payable July 1, 1894. See State v. Standard Oil Co., 49 Ohio St. 137, point 2, 30 N. E. 279. To secure the payment of these bonds, the Hulings Lumber Company, by its president, Willis J. Hulings, by deed dated 1st July, 1889, and duly recorded in the counties of Tucker and Randolph, granted and conveyed to William H. Wise, trustee, all its property in the state of West Virginia, consisting of 24 800 acres of land, situate in those two counties, together with a narrow-gauge railroad, five miles in length, the rolling stock and equipments, the saw-mills and machinery, and all other improvements constructed and erected on the property. This is deed of trust No. 2, already mentioned.

These bonds were originally intended in part to pay off the Mitchell & Co. debt, but were afterwards, by resolution of the board of directors, directed to be hypothecated for other purposes. On August 11, 1890, the president of the Hulings Lumber Company borrowed of the First National Bank of Cumberland, Md., $10,000, for 4 months, and placed 10 of these bonds as collateral security with the bank; and on August 8th the president of the company borrowed the further sum of $10,000 of this bank, and deposited $15,000 of these bonds as collateral. Both sums borrowed were placed in the bank to the credit of the lumber company, and paid out on its checks. The president also borrowed of Simpson, Clapp & Co. $7,500, and deposited $15,000 of these bonds as collateral; of George W. Delameter $6,000, and deposited with him $10,000 of them as collateral; of Drexel & Co. $6,000, and deposited with them $11,000 as collateral; and deposited with Geo. F. Craig & Co. $15,000, the residue, but they were all equally secured and payable pro rata. At Oil City, December 1, 1890, at a meeting of all the directors, who were also owners of all the stock, except 43½ shares, a resolution was offered and adopted which, after reciting that the Hulings Lumber Company was indebted in various sums, amounting in the aggregate to about the sum of $141,000, the greater portion of which had already matured, and the residue would mature in a few days, and that it was unable to provide the money to meet its debts, although the value of its real and personal property was believed to be greatly in excess of its entire indebtedness, authorized and directed the president of the company to execute an assignment or deed of trust of all its property, real and personal, to such person as he should deem suitable for that purpose, in trust for all the creditors of the company, with preference in favor—First, to Hulings & Co., for the amount of their just claim; second, to Kay Bros. for $2,800; and next, to use his discretion in making preference in regard to the other indebtedness of the company, but to be subject to the Husbands deed of trust, and to the Wise deed of trust. This is deed of trust No. 3, already mentioned.

Hulings and Butler, who composed the firm of Hulings & Co., were present, but did not vote. The preference to them was not suggested by either of the partners, but by other directors, who knew that Hulings & Co. had been lending the company large sums of money for four or five years, which was expended in betterments of the property, which advancements had been audited and approved by three several disinterested auditing committees, at a time when none of the present creditors at large had any existence. This resolution was carried into effect by the deed of the Hulings Lumber Company of December 4, 1890, by which, by its president, it granted and conveyed all its property, real and personal, to M. Howard Hulings, in trust for the various creditors, and in the order of preference therein named: (1) The debt of F. W. Mitchell & Co., of about $39,000, secured by the Husbands deed of trust, (No. 1;) (2) for the holders of the 75 $1,000 bonds under the Wise deed of trust, (No. 2;) (3) all just labor claims, etc., (these have been paid, and are not involved;) (4) Huling & Co., their debt of $22,907.08, then amounting to $30,383.07; (5) Kay Bros. & Co., $2,800; (6) pro rata all other indebtedness of the grantor incurred for merchandise, machinery, and supplies; (7) pro rata all other indebtedness of the grantor not then paid. The trustee was to take possession at once, wind up as rapidly as possible, and pay the debts secured. In 60 days afterwards, he brought this suit to administer his trust under the authority and direction of the circuit court of Tucker county, as already mentioned.

As to the validity of the Mitchell & Co. loan of $35,000, secured by the Husbands deed of trust. It has already been shown that this company was incorporated under the act of 1877, as amended by the act of 1881, and that it was not governed by section 49 of chapter 53 of the Code; that its directors might all be nonresidents of the state; and that the proper place of meeting both of stockholders and directors was at their principal office or place of business at Oil City, as mentioned and set forth in the charter, unless otherwise prescribed by the by-laws, for in these respects the act of 1877, as amended, is inconsistent with section 49 of chapter 53 of the Code, (see section 29 of the act of 1877;) and, besides, it was the place of meeting prescribed by the by-laws. When this loan was negotiated, and the Husbands deed of trust was executed, F. H. Steel, a member of the firm of F. W. Mitchell & Co., was not one of the board of directors, and did not become one until, after that transaction, he was elected to fill the place of George W. Dorr, resigned. The validity of the Wise deed of trust is attacked on the same grounds, which need not be further discussed. These creditors who hold these 75 $1,000 bonds can only secure the amount of their debts for which these bonds were hypothecated, $49,500, and interest, and they do not claim any more. This question touching the validity of these two deeds of trust was directly submitted to the commissioner. All the books, etc., of the company were to be submitted to him, and the officers to be examined by him. This was done, and Willis J. Hulings rendered before him, on oath, a full, and, as far as I can see, a frank, statement of all the details of the transaction of the board of directors and meetings of stockholders; and the commissioner reports them valid and subsisting liens, and this is confirmed by the circuit court. After a searching examination, this record discloses, so far as I can discover, no substantial ground for impugning the entire good faith of these two trust deeds of the two deeds made to secure them, or to question their honesty or validity in any respect whatever. The claim of F. W. Mitchell & Co. was the aggregate of certain valid and subsisting vendors' liens, retained on the face of the deeds of conveyance to Marcus Hulings before the corporation had any existence. F. W. Mitchell & Co. became the holders of these liens for full value, and at the instance and at the request of the corporation, before any member of this firm had become a director, and by no act of the board of directors since the election of F. H. Steel as a director has their security been improved, or any advantage in any way been gained by them. The bondholders under the Wise deed of trust advanced their money in good faith, upon the hypothecation of these bonds thereby secured, and are clearly entitled to have their money paid back, with its interest, out of the proceeds of the sale of the property, and they ask no more. And this is the law, whether the apparent and acting directors were directors de jure or only directors de facto. Having already seen that this corporation was created under the act of 1877 and amendments thereof, and that it was not necessary for the directors to be residents of this state, and that they were directors de jure, as well as de facto, that question, and the questions connected therewith, discussed by counsel, upon the hypothesis of their not being officers of the corporation de jure, need not be further considered, except that I wholly fail to appreciate the force of the argument based on any state policy against nonresident directors. The real estate, sawmills, and other property were in this state. The articles of incorporation were recorded in Tucker county, and in the office of the secretary of state; also a copy of their by-laws. It had an office and place of business in this state, in Tucker county, where its property was, and its business of manufacturing lumber was carried on, as required by section 6 of the act of 1877. It was not a corporation created by nonresidents, under the laws of this state, for the purpose of manufacturing lumber in some other state; and I do not see how it differs in any respect from any other corporation organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of carrying on business therein. In what state the stockholders may happen to reside is a matter wholly indifferent. Not only were their timber lands, boom, sawmills, etc., in this state, but in this state this corporation kept an office for the transaction of business, where an exhibit of all transfers of its stock is kept, in which are kept, for the inspection of any officer or stockholder, books wherein are recorded the amount of capital stock subscribed, and by whom, the names of the owners of its stock, the number of shares held by each person, and the number by which each of said shares is respectively designated, and the amount owned by them respectively, the amount of stock paid in, and by whom, the transfer of said stock, the amount of the company's assets and liabilities, and the name and place of residence of all its officers. It also had a person appointed by power of attorney to accept service of any process or notice.

I see no trouble as to subrogating F. W. Mitchell & Co. to the vendors' liens. It is true that they were, in the ordinary sense, extinguished by payment made to the original vendor of the land out of money advanced by Mitchell & Co., but they were not destroyed, but turned over to these bankers, for the purpose, and with the understanding on the part of the debtor corporation which had agreed to lift them, that they should be treated as still subsisting, and that, as far as it could be done without injury to the rights of others, Mitchell & Co. should be substituted to the rights and remedies of the lienors. This doctrine of subrogation is said to be a creature of courts of equity, suggested by, or with qualification adopted from, the civil law, so administered as to secure substantial justice, without regard to form, and often independently of any contractual relation, and therefore is not allowed where it would work injustice to the rights of others, or defeat or impair any higher supervening equity. See Sheld. subr. (2d Ed.) § 1 et seq. Mitchell & Co., having become, or being about to become, creditors by specific lien on the same property, had a right, on that ground, also to lift the vendor's lien, and keep it alive as additional security for the money loaned.

This brings us to the main point of controversy; that is, the validity of the third deed of trust, executed December 5, 1890, conveying all the property of the corporation for the benefit of all the creditors to M. Howard Hulings, trustee, called the "Hulings deed of trust." The question as to the good faith and validity generally of this assignment to secure and pay creditors was also submitted to Commissioner Adams, with directions to take testimony, examine the books and papers of the lumber company, examine on oath the officers of the corporation and others, and report thereon, together with such other matters as he might deem pertiment or any party require. This the commissioner has done, returning with his report all the books and papers put in evidence before him, together with all the testimony taken touching the matters referred. In this case the company was insolvent, and two of the directors, on December 1, 1890, when the resolution was passed authorizing and directing this deed of trust, and the preference given the debt of Hulings & Co. to be thus preferred, were the two partners, Willis J. Hulings and J. E. Butler, who composed the firm, and were present; and, although they did not suggest such preference or vote on the adoption of the resolution, this conveyance was prima facie fraudulent and void as to these appellants, who were creditors of the grantor, the Hulings Lumber Company; and the burden is on Hulings & Co., the preferred creditors, to remove this presumption of fraud by clear and convincing proof that such conveyance was fair and reasonable, and absolutely free from fraud. Sweeny v. Refining Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. 431; Hope v. Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 789. Still, it was held that an insolvent corporation, having ceased to do business, has the same power as an insolvent individual to prefer a creditor in a general assignment of all its property for the payment of its debts. Burr v. McDonald, 3 Grat. 215; Pyles v. Furniture Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. 909. At the time this trust deed was made, there was nothing in the policy of our statutes which forbade an insolvent corporation to prefer creditors, but the statute on the subject is now changed. See latter clause of section 2, c. 74, Code 1891, (Acts 1891, c. 123.) So that the question is in this case, have Hulings & Co. removed the prima facie presumption of fraud by clear and convincing proof that such conveyance was fair and reasonable, and absolutely free from fraud? Where questions purely of fact are referred to a commissioner in chancery, his finding will be given great weight, though not as conclusive as the verdict of a jury. Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, 10 S. E. 375. In such case his findings will be given great weight, and should be sustained until it plainly appear that they are not warranted by any reasonable view of the evidence, and this view operates with peculiar force in the appellate court, when the findings of the commissioner have been approved by the decree of the court below. Moore v. Ligon, 30 W. Va. 147, 3 S. E. 572. Every presumption is in favor of the correctness of the decision of the master. Medsker v. Bonebrake, 108 U. S. 66, 2 Sup. Ct. 351; Tilghman v. Proctor, 125 U. S. 136, 8 Sup. Ct. 894; Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 617, 9 Sup. Ct. 177; Kimberly v. Arms, 129 U. S. 512, 9 Sup. Ct. 355. If the testimony is conflicting, the court will rarely interfere with the master's decision on the facts, provided he made no errors of law which affected the result. See Welling v. La Bau, 34 Fed. 40; Mason v. Crosby, 3 Woodb. & M. 258; Gott- fried v. Brewing Co., 22 Fed. 433; Jaffrey v. Brown, 29 Fed. 476; Central Trust Co. v. Texas & St. L. Ry. Co., 32 Fed. 448; 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. (2d Ed.) § 315; 2 Bart. Ch. Pr. p. 656; 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. p. 1317.

What are questions purely of fact within the meaning of the rule? However much Blackstone's definition of "municipal law" has been criticised, it remains with slight modifications (expressing, perhaps, what is already implied) the definition given by common-law courts to this day. See 1 Hammond's Bl. Comm. p. 95, notes of editor; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 1, 2, note; Bouv. Law Dict.; Black. Law Dict. Municipal law is a rule of civil conduct, prescribed or recognized by the supreme power in a state, commanding what, in its opinion, is right or convenient, and prohibiting what is wrong or inconvenient. The rule of civil conduct is based upon certain principles, which can neither be ignored nor left out. These principles, controlled in their application by custom, constitute the common law. The rule, as a definition, makes the principle applicable to a definite class, by one or more common sense, practical characteristics. The point of law is contained implicitly in the judgment of the court, and springs out of the facts guided by the prayer for relief, as shown by the pleadings, to which a rule or principle of law is applied. Hence the point of law implied in the order or judgment prayed for, and given or refused, is always mixed with the facts of the case, in the sense of springing out of them, as the result of the application of some principle or rule. But that is not the true meaning of the term "a mixed question of law and fact." A fact, as distinguished from the law, may be taken as that out of which the point of law arises; that which is asserted to be or not to be, and is to be presumed or proved to be or not to be, for the purpose of applying or refusing to apply a rule of law. The true meaning can be better shown by an illustration. The question of negligence as a want of ordinary care is generally a mixed question of law and fact, one for the jury, under the instructions of the court. See 2 Thomp. Trials, §§ 1662, 1705; Cooley, Torts, (2d Ed.) pp. 800, 801, et seq. The prudent man, for the occasion, with reference to what he would do, and therefore what the defendant must have done under the circumstances, is formed in the minds of the jury by the light of the facts as they find them to be, under the instructions of the court as to what the law requires him to do in a given or supposed state of facts, which there is some evidence tending to prove, and so on through all the complications of the various questions of negligence. The questions of fraud are still more complicated, for they hardly ever occur alone, but, whatever the evidentiary facts may be, the question whether they make out a case of fraud or not is a question of law. So, whether the evidence tends to show fraud is a question of law. See 2 Thomp. Trials, § 1935. See, also, Hooe v. Marquess, 4 Call. 416. There being such evidence, it is generally said to be a mixed question of law and fact, and therefore one for the jury or commissioner. Actual fraud, fraud involving guilt, (scienter guilty knowledge,) may be said to be anything false said or done (not by way of promise de futuro) to the injury of the property rights of another. But the case here involved does not belong to that class, but to what is called "constructive fraud," depending upon a fiduciary or confidential relation between the parties. There was no actual falsehood or deceit, no concealment of facts which the party ought to have made known, but participation in an act which, if held good, would violate a confidence and trust, which the law implies and imposes in a given state of facts, pronouncing such violation of the trust as in some cases conclusively, in others prima facie, fraudulent. In this case we start out with the preference given the claim of Hulings & Co. as prima facie fraudulent. So far as the commissioner had the witnesses before him, and saw and heard them testify, he is the judge of their credibility, as far as it depends on manner and general demeanor. The commissioner reaches the conclusion that the preference given the claim of Hulings & Co. is valid, being without taint or suspicion of fraud or unfairness; and he gives the following statement of the evidentiary facts that bring him to this conclusion: "(1) The evidence and records before me clearly show that this sum remained due and owing Hulings & Co. several years before the creation of the debts due the persons on whose claims their claim is preferred. (2) These advances were made to the company, which had valuable property, and but little money, to enable it to put things in motion, and give the property available value, with the promise, and no doubt expectation, of speedy repayment out of the timber manufactured into lumber and sold. (3) $8,000 of it was to lift for the company vendors' liens reserved on the faces of the conveyances from the several vendors on the lands sold and conveyed to Marcus Hulings, which the company was bound to pay as a part of the consideration of the purchases and conveyance of these same lands by Marcus Hulings to the company; also taxes on these lands. This began in February, 1885, and ran through the years 1886 and 1887. And (4) during these same years Hulings & Co. advanced to the lumber company over $22,000 cash, to pay hands, buy logs and supplies, and pay running expenses, all shown in detail by itemized statements, duly proved, and with vouchers, consisting of checks drawn by Hulings & Co. on the Oil City Trust Company, to the order and for the account of the Hulings Lumber Company. This account was audited by two different auditing committees, of disinterested persons, in the years 1886 and 1888. That the firm of Hulings & Co. is composed of Willis J. Hulings and John E. Butler, who are directors of the Hulings Lumber Company; but they did not vote for the resolution giving them the preference, nor did the suggestion thereof come from them, or either of them, though present at the meeting, but was proposed by and voted by the three other directors of the company, who had no interest of any kind in the claim; and that this claim amounts to $31,063.19, with interest included, computed to 12th of June, 1891." The members of the firm of Hulings & Co. were examined by the commissioner, and no doubt he was impressed favorably by, among other things, their full and unreserved statements on all points touching the inquiry he had before him for investigation.

I cannot agree with the commissioner in the conclusion he draws from these facts; for, although the two directors of the lumber company who compose the firm of Hulings & Co. did not suggest the preference given their claim, nor vote for it, yet, in violation of the statute, (see section 52, c. 53, Code,) they were "present at the board while the same was being considered," thus bringing them within the rule laid down in Sweeny v. Refining Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. 431, and Hope v. Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 789. The directors of this corporation, of which the members of the firm of Hulings & Co. were two, occupy the relation of trustees to this corporation and its property. It was insolvent, without one cent to pay its creditors, save what was conveyed by this deed of trust No. 3. Neither the corporation itself, nor its stockholders, had any longer any beneficial interest in the property, except upon remote and unlikely contingencies; and therefore they are not affected by the fraud in law, if any, of the corporation, brought about by its board of directors. In such case the creditors alone can be affected; in this case, the creditors at large,—those without specific liens. The capital stock was issued and transferred in payment on these 24,800 acres of timber land, and the boom, mills, and lumber plant thereon sold and conveyed to the corporation, and was worth, no doubt, all that the vendors received for it in stock, at par, viz. about $120,000; so that this "real estate," as we may call it, including therein all the appliances situated on it for cutting, hauling, catching, and manufacturing logs and lumber, represented, as to the creditors, the capital stock paid in. Thus, the stock subscribed has all been paid up. Neither the individual members, the stockholders, nor their property are liable to the creditors. This substitute for and representative of the capital stock constitutes the sole fund to which the creditors may look for the satisfaction of their demands. It is the basis of the credit which is extended to the corporation by the public, and a substitute for the individual liability which exists in other cases. So far as creditors are concerned, it is regarded in law as a trust fund, pledged for the payment of the debts of the corporation. Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308; Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 116. See Hope v. Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 789; Lamb v. Pannell, 28 W. Va. 663; Sweeny v. Refining Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. 431. See, also, Mor. Priv. Corp. § 803; Wait, Insol. Corp. § 162; Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law, §§ 199, 661. "The giving of a mortgage by solvent corporations, to secure payment to a director is viewed with suspicion, but it is legal when perfectly free from actual fraud. [Citing, among others, Hope v. Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 789; Hotel Co. v. Wade, 97 U. S. 13.] But, where the corporation is insolvent, an entirely different question arises. There has been difference of opinion in the courts, but the weight of authority clearly and wisely holds that an insolvent corporation cannot pay a debt to a director in preference to debts due others, either by turning out property to him, or by giving him a mortgage on corporate assets." Wait, (see cases cited.) In this state, being prima facie fraudulent, I do not think that it has been shown before the commissioner by clear and convincing proof that the preference for the $22,000 and odd was fair and reasonable to the nonpreferred creditors. The outside creditors, who do not know what is going on indoors, had a right to expect from their trustees a fair and reasonable disposition of their trust property; at least, the right to expect that their trustees would not virtually take all their trust property to pay their own debt. If it be said that the preferred claim of Hulings & Co. of $22,000 has been twice audited and found correct, the reply is, no one questions its perfect fairness and correctness, or that it was advanced to the lumber company when they were in great need, and before these debts of appellant were created, and upon a promise of speedy repayment; but the reply of appellants to this is that their claims have been audited by the commissioner of the court, and also found correct and to be due and payable, and, if not as old as the preferred debt, they were old enough to be in existence when the lumber company failed and made the assignment, and when the two preferred directors occupied with their co-directors the relation of trustees to the corporation and its property, and that this property was a trust fund, pledged for the payments of appellants' claims, on the same footing as the claims of other creditors at large; at least, that their trustees, also, as creditors at large, could not fairly and reasonably consent to or claim the preference awarded them.

Hulings & Co. advanced some $8,000 to the lumber company for the purpose of lifting vendors' liens, with the understanding that they were to hold these liens or purchase money notes as security for the money thus advanced. I see no reason why the firm of Hulings & Co. may not be allowed this item of their claim, and be substituted to the rights and remedies against the respective tracts of land that the original vendors had, but without any right of recourse in case of deficiency, as it is easily separable from the rest of their account, having been kept separate and distinct. But it must also be in subordination to the creditors under trust deed No. 1 and trust deed No. 2, (1) because they were large stockholders in the lumber company, one having 625 1-3 shares, the other 100 shares, both being directors, one also the president, the other the treasurer, and induced strangers, Mitchell & Co. and the holders, by hypothecation of the mortgage bonds, to advance and lend their money on the faith, if not representation, that the two deeds of trust given to secure them were not impaired by any higher lien held by a firm composed of two directors, who were respectively president and treasurer and large stockholders; (2) because Hulings & Co., seeing the fairness of this, by their pleadings and otherwise, showed themselves to be content with such subordination of their specific lien. It is true that by a supplemental answer, filed November 23, 1891, they claim a first lien on the lands on which the notes lifted by them were, in the deeds of the original grantors, retained as vendors' liens; but this was after their first answer, insisting on the validity of the Hulings or third deed of trust, after the pleadings were made up, the evidence all in, also the commissioner's report,—in fact, after the land had by consent been decreed to be sold; and the best bid obtained was not enough to reach their claim. Under these circumstances, and at this stage of the case, it would not be equitable to permit Hulings & Co. to displace to that extent the mortgage bondholders, and, under the familiar doctrine and principles of subrogation, would not be allowed; and this also disposes, in advance, of their counter assignment of error No. 2.

As to the rest of their claim against the Hulings Lumber Company, they were mere general creditors; early ones, it is true, but not in any other respect standing on higher ground than the other creditors at large. As to this part of their claim, though honest to a cent, and in every other respect, they put off securing it too long to now obtain preference over the others who occupy the same ground, except that they are subsequent in time. The board of directors, in the meeting of December 1, 1890, at which the directors Willis J. Hulings and J. E. Butler were present, passed the resolution directing the general assignment by deed of trust No. 3, reciting that the lumber company was then indebted in various sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to about the sum of $141,000, part of which had already matured, and that the greater portion of the residue would mature in a few days; that the company was unable to provide for the payment of the said indebtedness already matured; and proceeded to authorize and direct the assignment by which the control of its affairs and property passed out of its hands; thus showing that the corporation was insolvent, not being able any longer to meet its obligations, or to carry on the business for which it was incorporated. It would be a strange trusteeship and strange trust property if such dealings with it, in violation of the statute, could pass muster in a court of equity, for the trust and confidence properly given by the creditors of the insolvent corporation to its trustees would be thereby violated.

Hulings & Co., appellees, make three counter assignments of error:

(1) The circuit court, by its decree of 20th of June, 1891, erred in decreeing that the First National Bank of Cumberland should pay to Kenneweg & Co., defendants and appellants, the sum of $947.25, instead of directing that the same should be paid over to M. Howard Hulings, trustee. The facts, as far as they appear, are as follows: On the 5th of December, 1890, the defendant Hulings Lumber Company had on deposit, to its credit, in the First National Bank of Cumberland, Md., the sum of $1,301.98. It owed to defendant Kenneweg & Co. a negotiable note, payable at that bank, for $947.25, falling due, not counting days of grace, on 6th December, 1890, which Kenneweg & Co. had left at the bank for collection. On the morning of the assignment, viz. 5th December, 1890, but before its execution, the lumber company, by its president, drew a check on the Cumberland Bank, payable to the cashier, for $947.25, and sent it by mail to the cashier, with instructions to pay the Kenneweg note, and send the note to the office of the Hulings Lumber Company. The cashier received the check and letter, but, before the payment, the bank had heard of the assignment, and refused to apply the money to the payment of the note, for the reason given by the bank to Kenneweg & Co.,—that the Hulings Lumber Company was largely indebted to the bank, and they (the bank) had been informed that the lumber company had made an assignment. We will suppose that the making of the assignment, as then in force, was communicated by the same letter. Commissioner Adams reported against the claim of Kenneweg & Co., holding that the money in the bank passed to M. Howard Hulings' trustee, by the general assignment of all property of every kind made by the company afterwards, but on the same day, viz. 5th December, 1890, for the payment of all claims and demands in the order specified. Kenneweg & Co. excepted to the commissioner's report on this point, and the court, by decree of 20th June, 1891, held the exceptions to be well taken, and ordered the First National Bank of Cumberland to pay to Kenneweg & Co. the said sum of $947.25, in payment of their note. Whether it was a fraudulent transfer of this particular fund does not arise, being nowhere raised by the pleadings or otherwise. The question when and under what circumstances the death or insolvency of the drawer of such a check has the legal effect to countermand its payment—when the check is to be regarded as an equitable assignment—has given rise to a great deal of discussion, and to some differences of opinion. It was, in this case, an order to the cashier of the bank to transfer the deposit pro tanto of the lumber company to the account of Kenneweg & Co., in discharge of the note of the drawer, then there for collection. If the cashier or bank was the agent of the lumber company to pay, it was also the agent of Kenneweg to collect; and although the letter containing the check and instructions also contained, perhaps, the information as to the making of the trust deed, the check having come into the hands of Kenneweg's agent to collect, it may be regarded as issued, and, as between the lumber company and Kenneweg, operated as an equitable assignment of that amount. The bank did not and does not itself claim it, and no one impeaches it as fraudulent and voidable. The bank continued to hold the check, money, and note until the controversy as to the money virtually in court between Kenneweg and the trustee should be settled; so that it is a question of ownership, depending on equities, and not what the stakeholder could do. The letter is not produced. Mr. Shriver, the cashier, testifies, but is not examined on this point. It is probable that the letter spoke of the general assignment for payment of debt, and of the preference given the bank for its debt of $20,000, and the fact of insolvency, if it then existed, was not a fact communicated, but only inferred, for the officer who sent the check says in his testimony that the lumber company was not then insolvent. Although the trust deed was afterwards acknowledged, and delivered on the same day, no express mention was made of this deposit, and it did not operate proprio vigore as a revocation of the check. As a matter of honesty and fair dealing under the common usage in such matters, it is generally regarded as a fraud on the part of the drawer of a check, in payment of his debt, to countermand it without some good cause, and such fraud should not be encouraged by the law's approval. (2) As a matter of public policy and general convenience, the law's approval of the unlimited right of revocation would tend to weaken confidence in checks as money, and impair the usefulness of banks as places of deposit for convenient paying, as well as for safekeeping. (3) Regarded as an equitable assignment, it has all the elements of a contract of sale or transfer of negotiable paper, without inconvenience to the bank, or undue restraint upon the proper power of revocation. (4) So much for principle pointing to the proper rule. And, as matter of authority, so long ago as 1835, in the case of Brooks v. Hatch, 6 Leigh, 534, such check or order was held to be an equitable assignment pro tanto of the fund thereafter to come into the hands of the drawee; citing Row v. Dawson, 1 Ves. Sr. 331; Peyton v. Hallett, 1 Caines, 363; and Cutts v. Perkins, 12 Mass. 206. In the case of Clayton v. Fawcett, (1830,) 2 Leigh, 19, the letter of Fawcett would have been adjudged an equitable assignment but for the condition contained in it that the payment was to depend on the drawer's being absent; citing, on the subject of equitable assignment, Duke of Chandos v. Talbot, 2 P. Wms. 608; Theobalds v. Duffoy, 9 Mod. 102; and Bates v. Dandy, 2 Atk. 207. In Anderson v. De Soer, (1849,) 6 Grat. 363, the same doctrine is laid down; and in Bank v. Kimberlands, (1880,) 16 W. Va. 555, 558; and Bell v. Alexander, (1871,) 21 Grat. 1, 6. Upon the subject of a check duly issued operating as an equitable assignment, see 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. Bank*, 80 Ill. 212, and see cases cited; Sav. Inst. v. Adae, 8 Fed. 106; Bank v. Coates, Id. 540; Row v. Dawson and Ryall v. Rowles, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. (4th Amer. from 4th Eng. Ed.) 1531, 1533; Grant, Banks, side pp. 50, 51, citing Tate v. Hilbert, (1793,) 2 Ves. Jr. 111; Rev. Rep. 175, referring to Rolls v. Pearce, 5 Ch. Div. 730, a case of donatio mortis causa. On same subject, see Austin v. Mead, Brett, Lead. Cas. Eq. 122, 15 Ch. Div. 651, and Burke v. Bishop, 27 La. Ann. 465, treating the check as a mandate. On nature of a check, see 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. c. 49, § 1566 et seq.; Bolles, Banks, § 53 et seq.; Bullard v. Randall, 1 Gray. 606. On nature of bank contracts and duty to pay checks, see Bolles, Banks, §§ 32, 80, et seq.; 2 Morse, Banks, (3d Ed., by Parsons,) c. 36, § 565 et seq. On revocation of checks, see 1 Morse, Banks, c. 28, § 397 et seq.; revocation by death, section 480; by insolvency, section 400a. On assignment in equity, see 1 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 326; 2 Story, (13th Ed.) § 1044. On the French law on the general subject, see note 2 to section 1040a. On subject of handing a key, etc., so as to enable buyer or donee to take possession, see 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 67. On equitable assignment, see Id. §§ 76, 75; Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh, 333; 1 Schouler, §§ 74, 77, et seq. This is not a case of a suit at law against the bank, but in equity, where the court has the fund under its control and all the parties before it, including the stakeholder; and I do not understand any decisions of the supreme court of the United States as not treating it as a good, equitable assignment, as between the payee and the trustee. Certainly such is the settled rule of law in this state.

The second and third counter assignments of error have been already disposed of. Although the state may have had an inchoate lien for the taxes on these lands, yet there was none to which Hulings & Co. could be substituted by paying them, or thereby give them any other standing than that of creditors at large of the corporation.

In my view, the court should have permitted defendants Hulings & Co. to have retained the place in the order of payment given them by the deed of trust to M. Howard Hulings, trustee, so far, and so far only, as the claim reported for them by Commissioner Adams is made up of notes, etc., which were secured by vendors' liens on the real estate of the Hulings Lumber Company, lifted and held by defendants Hulings & Co.; their amounts, and the several tracts of land to which they apply, to be ascertained by the court in any proper mode. As to the rest of their claim reported by Commissioner Adams, they should come last in the deed of trust, not simply in the last class. But those creditors of the lumber company who, by their answer or other pleadings, have successfully assailed the claim of Hulings & Co., are not to occupy in the order of payment out of the trust fund the place thus made vacant; for, although the settled rule in this state is that his diligence is to be rewarded who has enlarged the fund to be distributed by removing some fraudulent contrivance that has concealed it in part, or illegal preference that would, under the trust deed, have consumed it, yet the qualification of the rule is as well settled as the rule itself that such impeaching creditors cannot displace or lessen any prior, valid, subsisting liens which still stand as just and honest, nor can the latter be debarred of any increase of share incident to their right to retain against the trust fund, as a whole, the place in the order of payment assigned them; for, having equal equity and a legal right, and being without fault, they are not to be thrust aside or superseded by those who come after them in the order of payment prescribed by the trust deed. See Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 18 S. E. 611, (decided at this term;) Cohn v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 516, 15 S. E. 140. The deed of trust stands valid as to them, and the rule laid down in Sweeny v. Refining Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. 431, and other cases where the trust deed was set aside in toto, has no application, except that it gives them preference over the displaced trust creditors.

The decree of December 2, 1891, is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to modify and correct the same in accordance with the views here expressed, and, as modified and corrected, to be again entered and carried into execution.

MACKIN v. TAYLOR COUNTY COURT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 25, 1893.)

VALUATION—REVIEW IN CIRCUIT COURT—RIGHT OF COUNTY COURT TO BRING ERROR.

1. A county court is not a party to an appeal taken under section 7, c. 36, Acts 1891, for reassessment of lands by a landowner, from the decision of a county court refusing to reduce the valuation of his land made by a commissioner under said act, and cannot maintain a writ of error from this court to the decision of a circuit court upon such appeal.

2. Power of taxation. Its character discussed.

3. Assessment of taxes and valuation. The character of the act discussed.

4. Is the jurisdiction conferred upon circuit courts by section 7, c. 36, Acts 1891, to entertain an appeal from a decision of a county court touching valuation of land by a commissioner to reassess lands, valid, under the constitution? Is the action of the circuit court on such appeal judicial in nature?

5. Can the supreme court of appeals entertain a writ of error to the decision of a circuit court on such appeal?

Error to circuit court, Taylor county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

Proceedings by Emily Mackin against the county court of Taylor for the correction of an assessment for taxation. From the judgment rendered, the county court brings error. Dismissed.

T. S. Riley, Atty. Gen., and L. M. La Follette, for plaintiff in error. W. R. D. Dent, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Emily Mackin, feeling herself aggrieved by the valuation of a tract of land for taxation by a commissioner to reassess lands, applied to the county court of Taylor county for correction, and, that court having refused her relief, she appealed to the circuit court; and, that court having lessened the valuation of the land, the county court of Taylor county obtained this writ of error. Our jurisdiction in the case is challenged, and therefore we must at once pass upon that question, since we can render no judgment on the merits if we have no jurisdiction.

The complaint of Mrs. Mackin is not that her land is not subject to taxation, but that an excessive valuation, arrived at by improper process, was placed upon the land. Fixing the value of property for purposes of taxation is an essential and indispensable part of the assessment of taxes, where the taxation is based on its value. How, without it, can the individual's tax be known or collected? It is a sine qua non to the collection of revenue. Thus, it is plain that this court is asked to exercise jurisdiction in a matter which is purely one of valuation for assessment of taxes upon a taxpayer's property. That important function of government, the assessment of taxes, in our free republic of America, national and state, unlike the case in imperial or autocratic governments, belongs exclusively to the legislature. It is a legislative power, and in no sense judicial. This doctrine results from the very nature of our government, and is universally recognized. Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472; Cooley, Tax'n, 32; Heine v. Commissioners, 19 Wall. 655; Van de Griff v. Haynie, 28 Ark. 271; Desty, Tax'n, 81; Opinion of Lee, J., in Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Grat. 426, and opinion in Com. v. Moore, 25 Grat. 954; Cooley, Const. Lim. 479. By our constitution, §§ 2, 5, art. 10, the power of taxation is expressly vested in the legislature. It would be its prerogative without that grant. The duty of ascertaining taxable values, and of imposing and assessing taxes, rests in the wisdom and discretion of the legislature. It possesses unquestionable power to assess taxes itself, so far as the rightful power is concerned; but the inconvenience of so doing renders this impracticable, and therefore the legislature may perform this duty through such officers, agents, or tribunals as it may choose. State v. Mayhew, 2 Gill, 487; Van de Griff v. Haynie, 28 Ark. 271; Hardenbergh v. Kidd, 10 Cal. 402; 1 Desty, Tax'n, § 97. The power to impose taxes and assess property value for taxation being thus purely legislative, the judiciary cannot exercise it, cannot do any act, without authority of the legislature, which is an act of assessment of value for taxation or imposition of a tax, because the constitution, by article 5, divides the state government into three distinct departments,—legislative, executive, and judicial,—and prohibits either from exercising the powers of the other. In this great constitutional provision, common to all American states, lies the very soul of free government, distinguishing it from tyrannical government, and is the best guaranty of order, harmony, safety, and liberty. The simple fact that one of these departments is invested with a certain function or power negatives the idea that another department may exercise it, because it would defeat the principle and letter of article 5, separating them and their functions. If, then, the act which this court is, in this case, asked to exercise, be one in its nature essentially an act of taxation,—one relating to or forming part of the procedure in taxation,—we cannot exercise the jurisdiction. It is such an act. We are called upon to act in the matter of appraisal of land for tax purposes. The commissioner appraised it. Then the county court appraised it, by approving the commissioner's action. Then the circuit court lowered the valuation. And this court is either to fix another valuation, or adopt that of the county or circuit court. In other words, this court is asked to do an act that is simply one of valuation,—an indispensable act in the process of taxing this land. It is a legislative function, and we cannot perform it, unless there be a lawful delegation of authority to perform it. If we entertain this writ of error, we perform that function. Whence does this court get authority to entertain this writ of error? If even any statute could give it, where is the one that does give it? I hardly know under which of two acts the application for reduction of value was made. The petition for writ of error says it was made under section 94, c. 29, Code, while other parts of the record indicate that the valuation was one made by a commissioner reassessing lands under chapter 36, Acts 1891, and the application for relief under section 7 of that act. I regard the latter as the case. But in this case it is a matter of no import, for similar legal principles apply, and bring us to the same conclusion.

Section 7 of chapter 26, Acts 1891, provides that any one feeling aggrieved by the assessment of his land under that chapter may apply to the county court for relief, and, if refused, may have the evidence certified, and appeal to the circuit court. There it stops, without giving any appeal or writ of error to this court. If it be said that the chapter providing for appeals and writs of error to this court in cases generally comes in, and it was not necessary expressly, here, to grant such appeal or writ of error, then I ask, why expressly grant an appeal to the circuit court, when there stood the writ of certiorari for correction of errors in county courts? The reason why an appeal is given by said statutes from the county court to the circuit court is that, if not expressly granted, there could be no relief by certiorari, or in any other mode, but the decision of the county court would be final, because it is a rule of law that when once a tax valuation is made, in due course, it is final, unless the legislature has provided for a review; and when the particular mode of review has been resorted to, and fails to afford relief, there is no relief by appeal to the courts. The taxpayer is confined to the redress accorded by the legislature in its grace; and this because it is matter of taxation, confided exclusively to the legislature, which can give just such remedy for correction, or none, as it deems proper, and the matter being legislative, and not judicial, the courts cannot interfere. Cooley, Tax'n, 523, 529; Insurance Co. v. Pollak, 75 Ill. 292; 2 Desty, Tax'n, 623; Wade v. Commissioners, 74 N. C. 81; Stewart v. Maple, 70 Pa. St. 221; International, etc., R. Co. v. Smith Co., 54 Tex. 2; Gilpatrick v. Inhabitants, 57 Me. 277, and cases cited; Osborn v. Inhabitants, 6 Pick. 98. The legislature having accorded to the taxpayer an appeal from the county court to the circuit court, and provided for no appeal to this court, negatives an intent to allow an appeal to this court. It knew that, without an allowance of such appeal, none could be had. There is good reason for the omission to concede such appeal. The act grants an appeal from the commissioner to the county court, and from it to the circuit court. Should it go further, and allow application to this court, and thus enable every one disposed to litigate his assessment so far, and in large measure hamper and embarrass the collection of revenue necessary for the operation of government?

But is this writ of error justified by section 3, art. 8, of the constitution, or section 1, c. 135, of the Code, prescribing generally the appellate jurisdiction of this court? It may be suggested that it falls under that provision giving this court appellate jurisdiction in cases concerning the right of a corporation, county, or district to levy tolls or taxes. This does not apply, as the right to levy taxes on this land is not in dispute, but only its valuation, and under this clause the right to levy taxes must be involved. Miller v. Navigation Co., 32 W. Va. 52, 9 S. E. 57. Again, here the state is levying taxes, not merely a county or district. Does it fall under the provision that a party to a controversy in any circuit court may have a writ of error in "civil cases where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is of greater value or amount than one hundred dollars?" It does not come under that clause, because it relates to the judicial functions of this court; that is, to its appellate jurisdiction in judicial matters. To shelter a writ of error under this clause, the subject-matter must be of judicial nature,—a civil case, in the judicial sense of the word "case;" and this proceeding is not a case or matter, in that sense, but one in assessment of taxes,—simply administrative; in fact, legislative. What was the nature of the proceeding before the county court on appeal? That it was nonjudicial is settled by unquestionable authority. In Upshur Co. v. Rich, 135 U. S. 467, 10 Sup. Ct. 651, Rich applied to the county court to reduce the valuation placed on land by the assessor, and the matter was removed into the federal court on the theory that it was a suit; but the United States supreme court held that the county court, acting upon an assessment of taxes, was acting, "not as a judicial body, but as a board of commissioners without judicial powers, only authorized to determine questions of quantity, proportion, and value," and that the proceeding was not a "suit," within the meaning of the act allowing removal of suits from state to federal courts. In Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Ellis Co., 19 Kan. 587, the court said: "The proceedings before the county commissioners were not judicial, but in assessment. Section 65 of the tax law, under which these proceedings were had, provides simply for the correction of an assessment. It prescribes notice to the taxpayer as a condition of valid action, but such notice does not turn the proceeding from one in the nature of an assessment into a judicial inquiry. Indeed, unless the legislature had prescribed notice, it is doubtful whether any were essential. Correcting an assessment is no more of a judicial act than making the assessment originally. True, it involves a determination, but so does almost every political or executive act. It is not a judicial determination."

So it is clear that the action of the county court in such a matter is not judicial. But it may be thought that the action on appeal in the circuit court is judicial; not any longer administrative, or in assessment. Surely, the inherent nature of the act has not so quickly changed, from its transfer to the circuit court. It is still in assessment for taxes, the same as it was before the county court. The theory that the action of the circuit court is judicial must be founded, not on any change in the character of the matter involved in the circuit court, but on the fact that the circuit court is technically a court of record proceeding according to the course of the common law, exercising judicial functions. But it is clear that the action on this matter is the same in nature as is that of the county court, as shown by several adjudications which I will now cite: Under chapter 52, Acts 1883, a railroad company, complaining of the assessment of its property for taxes, took an appeal from the board of public works to the circuit court, and, excepting to its action, obtained a writ of error to this court; and this court held that the action of the circuit court in the matter was "merely administrative, not judicial; the court acting in such case as an appellate assessment or tax tribunal, and exercising powers distinct from those belonging to it as a court or judicial tribunal, in the legal sense of that term." Judge Snyder used language in which he is sustained by abundant authority; and it is pointedly applicable, as the circuit court, under that act, as under this act, either confirmed the assessment or made a new one. He said: "The whole scope and purpose of the statute, it seems to me, is to make the court simply an assessor to review the action of the board of public works; and, if dissatisfied with said action, it may make a new assessment, and fix the true value of the property. The action of the court is of the same character, with the same elements of discretion and judgment, as that possessed by the said board, and none other. Both act according to the evidence attainable, and according to their best judgment and discretion. It is true the judgment of the court must succeed that of the board, and is in review of the latter, but that does not alter the nature of the act to be performed. Both act as assessors, and their acts are plainly ministerial, and not judicial. The fact that a ministerial act is performed by a court does not change the nature of the act, and make it judicial. In McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, this court decided that orders and decrees of the circuit court, entered in proceedings for the sale of forfeited land for the benefit of the school fund, are merely ministerial or administrative acts, and in no manner judicial, and that, therefore, no appeal would lie from such orders and decrees to this court." Pittsburg, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264. In that case this court refused to entertain the writ of error because, as it said, and as I say, a writ of error lies only from a court of record; and it is not enough that the court be one of record, but its action in the particular transaction or matter must be judicial in nature, not simply administrative or ministerial. That case obviously controls the decision of this case. It cannot be said that there is a difference between that case and this, in the fact that that case went by appeal from the board of public works, which is not a court, whereas this went from a court,—the county court to the circuit court. The county court is not a court, technically,—a judicial court,—except as to probate matters; and it was, when acting in correction of tax assessments, held by the supreme court of the United States, in the Upshur County Case, above cited, to be not a court, but a mere assessment board; and therefore it is no more a court, as to that, than the board of public works. The decision of this court in 28 W. Va. 264, above cited, is sustained by the cases cited by Judge Snyder, and others I have met. In Kimber v. Schuylkill Co., 20 Pa. St. 366, an act allowed a freeholder dissatisfied with a decision of the commissioner in adjusting taxes to appeal to the court of common pleas, which was to affirm or reduce the assessment. The court of common pleas was a court of record. The supreme court would not entertain certiorari. It said: "It is very easily seen that the legislature did not intend to give this court the jurisdiction to hear the case over again, and reverse the decree of the common pleas. * * * The judges, when hearing these appeals, are acting as assessors of taxes. We venture to hope that it will be many years before we will be called upon to review the assessments of every man in the commonwealth who is dissatisfied with the taxes charged against him. * * * When a special jurisdiction is conferred on inferior courts, no appeal lies to this court, unless expressly given." This case shows that it was a mere tax assessment, though on appeal to a court of record, and no appeal would lie to the supreme court; and, second, that the taxpayer had no remedy beyond the court specified by the tax act for his relief. It made no difference that the appeal from the auditor assessing corporate property was to the circuit court in the Michigan case (Auditor General v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 34 Mich. 59,) cited by Judge Snyder in 28 W. Va. 268. The supreme court refused to entertain a writ of error. I therefore reach a like conclusion with that expressed by him,—that the decisions establish, beyond the propriety of a difference of opinion, that the decision of a designated officer or board, be it a court or not, in reviewing a tax assessment, is no more judicial than was the original assessment by the assessor; and such decision, even though it be by a court or other tribunal of record, is not judicial, and cannot be reviewed by a supreme court or appellate court possessing judicial appellate powers only.

I will add that another consideration forbidding the theory that, when the matter reached the circuit court, it became a case, in the judicial sense, so as to give a writ of error to this court, is that it went to the circuit court by appeal. The act in question does not provide for exceptions, but simply says the evidence may be certified. On the appeal, new evidence may be adduced. It is only a new trial of the matter. The prima facie, and most proper, meaning of an "appeal,"—though it has different meanings, according to its use,—is a process continuing the same suit, in order to obtain a rehearing in the appellate court, wherein new evidence may be allowed, and a new trial as if never tried, as in appeals from justices. See in Bailey v. McCormick, 22 W. Va. 102, 103; Bratt v. Marum, 24 W. Va. 652; Fouse v. Vandervort, 30 W. Va. 331, 4 S. E. 298; 2 Tucker, 336.

Thus I have shown that there is no act expressly giving a writ of error to this court on the decision by a circuit court of an appeal from a county court in a matter of correction of an assessment for taxes, and also that no writ of error lies under the general statute providing for appeals and writs of error. And I entertain the opinion held in Pittsburg, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264, that as the jurisdiction of the supreme court of appeals, whether original or appellate, is, by the letter and true spirit and intention of the constitution, wholly judicial, the legislature could not confer jurisdiction of any other cast or quality upon that court, and that if it were, by explicit enactment, to confer power on this court to entertain a writ of error or appeal, or other form of process to review a decision of the county court in a matter of correction of an assessment of value for taxation, the act would be void, as contrary to article 8, § 3, of the constitution. For the reason that the jurisdiction of the supreme court of Kansas is confined to matters of judicial nature, it was held in State Auditor v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 6 Kan. 500, that a statute giving an appeal to its supreme court from the appraisement of railroad property for taxes was unconstitutional, because the power to tax is legislative, and valuation for taxation was a necessary incident to that power, and not such judicial power as could be conferred on the supreme court. The opinion in that case more clearly expresses this distinction than I have elsewhere found. See Story, Const. § 1761.

As this court, by the constitution, is incompetent to receive jurisdiction in such a matter as this, we ought not to give section 1, c. 135, Code, such a construction and application as to militate against the constitution. The second point in Pittsburg, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264, distinctly holds that the constitution repels such a writ of error from this court.

Had the circuit court jurisdiction of the appeal? It may be said that it had not, as the matter is not judicial, but administrative, and that the legislature could not confer upon a court of judicial functions, like the circuit court, power to act upon such a matter, nor on persons holding judicial positions this non-judicial function. If this were so, then it would be a question whether this court ought not to entertain the present writ of error; for, if the circuit court entertain and act upon a matter outside its jurisdiction, it might plausibly be said that in assuming jurisdiction, and thus deciding it had jurisdiction, it created a judicial question, which would come within the authority of this court,—that is, upon and as to the sole question of the circuit court's jurisdiction, and also as involving the constitutionality of a law. But the best opinion which I can form is that the circuit court had jurisdiction in the matter, because, and only because, the legislature, in its grace and liberality to the taxpayer, conceded him this appeal to the circuit court. The legislature, having exclusively the power of taxation and all steps incident thereto and essential to its existence, may select the agents by which it may ascertain the taxable value of property, instead of doing so directly itself. Van de Griff v. Haynie, 23 Ark. 270. Now, there is a difference between the supreme court of appeals and circuit courts, in respect to their capacity to have conferred upon them such jurisdiction. While, as I have above sought to show, this court could not be given such jurisdiction, because its appellate functions are confined to judicial matters, yet it is different with circuit courts, since section 12, art. 8, of the constitution, after conferring upon them certain supervisory, original, and appellate jurisdiction, adds the clause, "They shall also have such other jurisdiction, whether supervisory, original, appellate or concurrent, as is or may be prescribed by law." I think this clause authorizes the legislature to confer upon the circuit court the right to entertain this appeal. The presence of this very important court among the people in every county; its readiness, facility, and competency in the hearing and trials of matters by witnesses, juries, and otherwise; the obvious necessity of a power in the legislature to render available and useful its functions in the administration of government, by charging it with jurisdiction of additional matters, as time and expediency may suggest; the whole cast, structure, and purpose of this court, as seen in the constitution,—tell us that we ought not to give a narrow construction to this clause. To do so would defeat the purpose of the convention which framed the constitution, and cramp the usefulness of the circuit courts. Besides this, there is the plain act of the legislature giving the appeal to the circuit court. If we doubted, we would, in deference to the act of the representatives of the sovereignty of the people, numbering among them many of the ablest minds of the state, recognize its validity. Courts cannot too often repeat what has been so often stated that it seems threadbare,—that all courts, while they must defend the constitution, and the rights of the people under it, even against the legislature, yet in so doing they must move with the most solemn caution, resolve all doubts in favor of the act, and never, except where the act is very plainly, palpably, and beyond doubt, violative of the constitution, overthrow an act of the legislature. Opinions in Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 568, and Com. v. Moore, 25 Grat. 954; Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612. How did the Virginia county courts, which were judicial and of general jurisdiction, so many years correct assessments and lay county levies? If there was a show of constitutional power after the constitution of 1851, how as to this before that? Ballard v. Thomas, 19 Grat. 14. How did the court get jurisdiction in McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, under the act of 1872-73, selling school land? But in order not to be misunderstood, though the circuit court has lawful jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from the county court in the matter of correction of an assessment of taxes, yet it is only by delegation by the legislature to the circuit court of its taxing power,—not in any sense a judicial act, but simply administrative or ministerial, and not the subject of a writ of error to this court. I have not overlooked the fact that the case of Pittsburg, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264, overrules the second point of the syllabus in Low v. County Court, 27 W. Va. 785, which held that an appeal lies, under section 94 of chapter 161 of the Acts of 1882, from a judgment of a county court refusing to correct an assessment, where it is claimed that the party assessed with taxes is not chargeable therewith. Does it mean that no appeal lies to the circuit court from the county court? I think not. Taking the opinion in 28 W. Va., it is plain that the court did not decide on the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court of an appeal from the county court, and that this decision means only that there is no jurisdiction in this court in such case.

Another difficulty in the way of the county court's success has just occurred to me. How can it prosecute this writ of error? The case before the lower courts was not a suit. The county court was not a party. The state and the taxpayer were the only parties, in any sense. The statute (Acts 1891, c. 36, § 7) gives an appeal to the circuit court only to the landowner and the state, not to the county court. As it could not prosecute an appeal in the circuit court, how could it possibly complain of error, when it could not have been a party in that court. The state, only, was engaged in tax valuation, and the county was interested only consequentially, under and through the state. The state represents it. It is not a party.

I think it proper to decide this case both on want of jurisdiction, and want of right in the plaintiff in error to prosecute the writ of error, giving both as reasons for dismissal, and making a syllabus as to both points, under the requirement that we shall decide all points arising on the record; but, as the plaintiff in error is held as having no right to maintain a writ of error, the syllabus is confined to that point; Judges ENGLISH and HOLT not deeming it necessary to adopt a broader syllabus in this particular case, as the county court has no right to maintain the writ. Writ of error dismissed.

PARR v. LINDLER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 1, 1893.)

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION—RIGHTS OF MINOR HEIR—FORECLOSURE PROCEEDINGS—PERSONAL JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. A claim by plaintiff that the land in dispute was sold under execution while he was entitled to a homestead exemption in it, to last till he was 21 years of age, as the heir of the execution debtor, was correctly excluded from the jury, when it appeared that he was over 21 when he brought suit, and the land was not the family residence of the judgment debtor when the debt was contracted, nor thereafter, and that plaintiff was never in possession of the land.

2. Parol evidence is not admissible in a collateral proceeding to attack a judgment and execution, when the records thereof do not disclose on their face any jurisdictional infirmity.

3. A personal judgment for a deficiency on a foreclosure proceeding cannot be rendered till after the sale and a report thereof have been made. Pope, J., dissenting.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Fairfield county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Parr against Simeon O. Lindler. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ragsdale & Ragsdale, for appellant. Barron & Ray, McDonald, Douglass & Obear, and James G. McCants, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. This action was brought for the recovery of possession of a tract of land originally belonging to one Henry W. Parr, and for convenience known as the "Mill Tract." It was admitted that the said Henry W. Parr was the common source of title, and that the plaintiff, Henry L. Parr, as his only son and heir, was entitled to the land, unless he had been in some way divested of the title thereto. The defendant, however, claimed that he has a claim of title from Henry W. Parr, and, if that claim of title is what he claims it to be, then he would defeat the title of the heir at law. His claim is that under certain executions this land was sold by the sheriff, and purchased by one Freshley, at sheriff's sale, and by subsequent chain of title has become the property of this defendant. This makes it necessary to consider the force and effect of these proceedings under which the land was sold by the sheriff:

Some time prior to 1858, Henry W. Parr, of Fairfield, executed to W. R. Robertson, then commissioner in equity, a bond for land purchased at his official sale, and to secure the same gave two mortgages of two separate tracts of land,—one to the commissioner himself, and the other to one Coleman, one of his sureties on his bond; and in 1871 he, the said Parr, executed another bond and mortgage to one Edward Pollard, of still a different tract of land. In 1876 the said Henry W. Parr died intestate, seised and possessed of some personalty and several tracts of land besides these mortgaged as above stated, and leaving as his only heir at law a son, Henry L. Parr, then an infant of tender years. Letters of administration on the personal estate of the deceased, Parr, were granted to one William B. Elkin. Soon after, two separate actions were brought against the said heir and administrator for the purpose of foreclosing the mortgages above described, as having been executed by the intestate, Parr, in his lifetime, entitled as follows: No. 1: "Clawney, as clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin, as administrator," etc. No. 2: "Edward Pollard v. Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin, as administrator." The records of these cases were admitted in evidence, and it appeared that in each case the lands mortgaged were sold, and for an alleged deficiency an execution was issued by the clerk, and that under such execution issued in the case of "Clawney, as clerk," the sheriff levied and sold the Mill tract of land of the deceased mortgagor, Henry W. Parr, which was not included in any of the mortgages. The plaintiff insists, therefore, that the whole proceedings were void, for the reason that there was really no judgment in the aforesaid cases, or either of them, which authorized the issuing of an execution against the estate of the intestate, real or personal. First. He offered parol testimony tending to contradict the records, upon the alleged ground that, being under 14 years of age at the time the actions were brought, he was not personally served with summons, as the law required, and therefore the whole proceedings were void as to him, as not having been made a party. Second. He further insisted that, from a mere inspection of the records, it appears that the execution under which the land was sold was absolutely void, as, in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage, a judgment for a deficiency can be had only when the sale is completed, and it cannot be known what the deficiency will be until the coming in of the report of sales, and the confirmation thereof. Third. He further insisted that, even if the proceedings under which the Mill tract of land was sold by the sheriff were perfectly regular and legal, he would still be entitled to recover the land, upon the ground that he was entitled to a homestead in the land, and, the sheriff not having done his duty in laying it off to him, the sheriff had no authority to levy and sell the same.

The judge charged the jury fully upon the whole case, but we will not attempt to consider all the questions discussed by him, but confine ourselves to the points complained of. Under the charge, the jury found for the defendant, and the appeal comes to this court upon the following exceptions by plaintiff: "(1) For that his honor erred in charging the jury the following: 'The homestead law, as it existed at that time, gave to the plaintiff, Parr, an exemption of $1,000 of real estate, to be selected by himself, until he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and provided that the remainder of that land might be sold under execution. The then defendant (now plaintiff) proves that he is now (23) twenty-three years of age. This action was commenced this year. So that he would not be entitled, even if the other judgment was out of the way, to recover possession of this land, the term for which it was exempted to him having expired before the commencement of this action.' (2) For that his honor should have charged the jury that the homestead laws create no new estate, nor do they invest estates already existing with any new qualities or restrictions, but secure and provide for an exemption by forbidding the process of the court to sell certain property for the payment of debts, and that, if the jury believe that the plaintiff's ancestor owned the land in dispute in fee, that such fee, upon his death intestate, descended to his heirs, who, upon such showing, would be entitled to recover, unless the defendant could prove title out of him by some process or operation of law. (3) For that his honor should have charged the jury that the judgments and executions through which defendant claimed title were void from a mere inspection of the record, and should have instructed the jury that an execution cannot be issued for a deficiency on a decree for foreclosure until there has been a sale, a judicial ascertainment of such deficiency, and a judgment entered therefor. (4) For that his honor erred in refusing to allow the plaintiff to prove that the judgments and executions through which the defendant claims were fraudulent and void, and that such fraud was known to the defendant, and to all the parties through whom the land in dispute passed to him." The defendant also gave notice that, in the hearing of the appeal herein, he would ask that the judgment appealed from be sustained on other grounds than those named by the trial judge: "(1) His honor correctly excluded the question of homestead from the consideration of the jury for the additional reason that the land in dispute was not the family residence, nor lands appurtenant, of the judgment debtor, when the Pollard debt was contracted, nor at any time thereafter; and the plaintiff has never resided on, nor been in possession of, said lands, and has never been entitled to a homestead therein. (2) The sheriff's deed conveying the land in dispute is fully supported by the judgment, execution, and sale in case of Samuel B. Clawney, as clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and W. B. Elkin, as administrator," etc. From the view which the court takes, it will not be necessary to consider the different questions debated as to the alleged right to homestead, the alleged payment in fact of the case of Clawney, as clerk, or the alleged incapacity of Sheriff Ruff, on account of interest, to make the sale under the execution in that case. As it seems the most natural, we will consider the other exceptions in their inverse order.

Exception 4 of the plaintiff complains of error in refusing to allow him to offer parol testimony to impeach the judgments and executions through which the defendant claims. The records were in evidence, and did not disclose on their face any jurisdictional infirmity, but in that regard seemed to be prima facie regular. We think, therefore, without going again into the argument, that the testimony offered was not admissible for the purpose indicated, in this collateral proceeding, not being a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. We think there was no error in refusing to admit the testimony. See Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 398.

Exception 3 of plaintiff makes the point that the judge erred in charging that the judgments under which the defendant claims were not, as alleged, void from the mere inspection of the records, but were valid, upon which executions for deficiencies could be issued. In subdivision 7, of section 188, of the Code, it is declared that, "in actions to foreclose mortgages, the court shall have power to adjudge and direct the payment by the mortgagor of any residue of the mortgage debt that may remain unsatisfied after a sale of the mortgaged premises, in cases in which the mortgagor shall be personally liable for the debt secured by such mortgage," etc. When must the order for such payment be made? The judge charged as follows: "Upon an inspection of this record, and having considered the objections raised by plaintiff's counsel, I have concluded that, although there are irregularities in them, they are within the jurisdiction of the court, and when rendered were the judgments of the court, and that they were binding and valid judgments of the court. Counsel have called my attention to the case of Young against somebody, in which it was adjudged that no judgment can be rendered for the deficiency at the time that a judgment foreclosing the mortgage was rendered. The judgment of the court in this case has been rendered. If an appeal had been taken, the judgment would have been reversed, as in the case of Young; but the case of Freer and Tupper has been decided, and, although prior to the case of Young, I don't think that the judgment pronounced in that case is affected by the case of Young, because, in the case of Freer and Tupper, the question came up, as it does in this case, upon a question as to whether the judgment was sufficient or not in another case, and not upon a direct proceeding to set aside the judgment. * * * The judgment in these two cases was this: that so much was due, and that the land (mortgaged) be sold and applied to that judgment, and that the defendant (plaintiff) have execution for the deficiency when the report of sales was made. In one of the cases no report of the sales was made, but in the other the report of sales was made, and no order confirming the sales. It shows the deficiency, and that an execution was, by previous order of the court, required to be issued. That involves a very nice question of law, but one which it is my duty to decide, and I decide that the judgment was a judgment upon which the execution could issue," etc. Was this error? We agree with the circuit judge that the general subject of foreclosure was within the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the decree. But there cannot arise here any question as to whether this is a collateral or a direct impeachment, for everything which a mere inspection of the record discloses is already in evidence and before the court. It is simply a question of power. See Tederall v. Bouknight, 25 S. C. 280. Could the court, in advance, render a valid judgment for a deficiency not yet ascertained, which might or might not ever exist? There was no adjudication of the court, after the sale, that there was a deficiency, or, if so, for what specific sum; that being left to the plaintiff himself, or the sheriff, a mere ministerial officer. It seems to us that this was something more than a mere irregularity; indeed, contrary to the very nature of a judgment for the payment of money and the creation of a lien. The case in hand, we think, furnishes a good illustration of the uncertainty and confusion necessarily incident to such a course. The doctrine of the elementary writers is that the judgment for the deficiency must be after the sale, and for a specific sum already ascertained. "A judgment, upon the foreclosure of a mortgage, does not become a lien upon any property not contained in the mortgage until a sale has been made, the deficiency ascertained, and a judgment entered. * * * The judgment must be for a specific sum. If it be that an execution issue for any deficiency which may exist after selling certain designated property, in all these cases there is no judgment lien," etc. See Freem. Judgm. (3d Ed.) §§ 339, 340. "The judgment contemplated is one for the balance of the debt remaining after applying towards it the proceeds of the sale. The first step is to ascertain what the amount of this balance is. Therefore, a judgment for a deficiency can be had only when the sale is completed; and it can only be known what the deficiency is, upon the coming in of the report of sale, and the confirmation of it. The usual practice is for the referee to state the amount of the deficiency in his report of the sale, etc. There can generally be no contingent judgment for such deficiency entered beforehand," etc. 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1709. Besides, we think this question has already been decided in this state. It is true that the case of Freer v. Tupper, (1883,) 21 S. C. 75, is cited as holding the contrary, but that case plainly shows that it was decided on exceptional grounds, one of which was the failure of the defendant to raise the question of no judgment when served with summons to renew the execution. In the case of Dial v. Gary, (1887,) 27 S. C. 171, 3 S. E. 84, this court expressly reserved the question, which was substantially an admission that the question was still an open one. In Hull v. Young, (1888,) 29 S. C. 71, 6 S. E. 938, it was held that, in an action for foreclosure of a mortgage, no personal judgment for a debt, or any part thereof, can be rendered against the mortgagor on his bond until after sale, and then only for the deficiency reported to be unpaid. In delivering the judgment of the court, the chief justice said: "In an action like this, it seems to us that no personal judgment for any specific sum of money can be rendered, even against the mortgagor, until the mortgaged premises have been sold, and the proceeds applied to the mortgage debt, for he can only be called upon, in such an action, to pay any deficiency in the proceeds of sale of the property pledged by him for payment of the debt; and we do not see how such deficiency can be ascertained until the property has been sold, and the proceeds applied, and hence we do not see how any judgment for any specific sum of money can be rendered until the amount of such deficiency has been thus ascertained. This view is supported by the case of Warren v. Raymond, 12 S. C. 9. We think, therefore, it was error to render judgment, to be enforced by execution, for any specific sum of money, before the mortgaged premises were sold, and the proceeds of such sale were found to be insufficient for the payment of the mortgage debt, where the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment for such deficiency, to be enforced against the mortgagor by execution," etc. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to the circuit court for a new trial.

POPE, J. I dissent, and refer to my opinion in the case of Cook v. Jennings, 18 S. E. 640, to be filed to-morrow, as expressive of my views.

McIVER, C. J. I concur fully in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice McGOWAN in the leading opinion in this case, but it may not be amiss to add thereto the following considerations: It being conceded that the title to the land in dispute descended to the plaintiff upon the death of his father, the only question is whether he has legally been divested of such title. This the defendant claims has been done by the sale by the sheriff under the alleged execution issued to enforce the payment of the deficiency remaining after the sale of the mortgaged premises in the case of Clawney, clerk, v. Elkin, as administrator of the mortgagor, and the present plaintiff, as his heir at law, supported by the alleged execution issued to enforce the payment of the deficiency remaining after the sale of the mortgaged premises in the case of Pollard against the same parties. The jury having been instructed that the sale by the sheriff could not be sustained under the execution in the Clawney case, we need not—and, indeed, cannot—consider the correctness of such instruction in a case like this,—trial by a jury,—even under the notice given by respondent's counsel, assailing the correctness of such instruction. Bonham v. Bishop, 23 S. C. 105, recognized in Amaker v. New, 33 S. C. 37, 11 S. E. 386, and Fleming v. Fleming, 33 S. C. 510, 12 S. E. 257. So that it seems to me that the only question now presented in the case is whether the circuit judge erred in charging that the sale might be sustained under the alleged execution issued in the Pollard case. The position taken by counsel for respondent, that this question has not been properly raised by the exceptions, cannot be sustained. That question, as it seems to me, is the turning point in the case, and was sufficiently presented by the third ground of appeal. It, therefore, must be considered. As I understand it, the circuit judge, while recognizing the decision in the case of Hull v. Young, 29 S. C. 64, 6 S. E. 938, in which it was held that, in an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, no personal judgment can be rendered against the mortgagor for any deficiency until the amount of the same has been ascertained by a sale of the mortgaged premises, and an application of the proceeds of such sale has been made to the mortgage debt, yet he instructed the jury that the judgment for the deficiency, not having been appealed from, must stand as a valid judgment, even though erroneous, and therefore constituted a sufficient basis for the execution issued to enforce it, under which the sale in this case was made, or to which it might be referred; and he cited the case of Freer v. Tupper, 21 S. C. 75. That case, however, does not support the view taken by the circuit judge. There the question arose upon a motion for a nonsuit, based upon the claim that there was no evidence of a sale of the mortgaged premises, and hence no basis for a judgment for any deficiency; but the court held that there was some evidence that there had been a sale, and the court held that there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in submitting that question of fact to the jury, and no error in refusing the motion for a nonsuit. Besides, as shown by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, there was another ground amply sufficient to sustain the judgment in that case. If, then, as is most conclusively shown in the opinion of Mr. Justice McGOWAN, no personal judgment can be rendered for any deficiency until after the sale of the mortgaged premises, when, alone, the amount of such deficiency can be ascertained, it follows, necessarily, as it seems to me, that anything purporting to be a judgment for such deficiency, rendered before the amount thereof could possibly be ascertained, would be a mere nullity, and would afford no basis for an execution to enforce it. Indeed, it is utterly incomprehensible to me how a judgment for the payment of money could be rendered before the amount thereof had been, or could possibly be, ascertained. Again, it seems to me that, after a sale of the mortgaged premises has been made, the question whether there is any deficiency, and, if so, the amount thereof, is a judicial question, upon which the mortgagor has a right to be heard, as grave and difficult questions might be presented as to the application of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, which surely ought not to be left to the decision of a mere ministerial officer, who makes the sale, but which should be determined by the court. Indeed, the proceedings in this case, after the sale of the mortgaged premises, furnish a striking illustration of the propriety and necessity for the rule contended for. If, then, no judgment can be rendered for any deficiency until the amount thereof has been judicially ascertained, it is quite clear that no execution can be issued to enforce such so-called "judgment," and any paper purporting to be such is a mere nullity, and affords no authority to the sheriff for making a sale. Inasmuch, therefore, as the validity of a sale made by the sheriff depends upon the inquiry whether the power has been conferred upon him by any valid process of law, it follows that, unless such power has been conferred upon him, any attempted sale is a nullity, and confers no title upon the purchaser. If, as was held in Sims v. Randall, 2 Bay, 524, a sale made by a sheriff under an execution which had lost its active energy before any levy was made is absolutely void, surely a sale under an execution which had never had any vitality must be likewise void. See Sheriff v. Welborn, 14 S. C. 480, and the cases therein cited. This, therefore, is not a case, as the circuit judge seemed to suppose, of a sale under an execution issued to enforce a judgment which was simply erroneous, but it is a case of a sale under an alleged judgment which the court had no authority to render at the time it was entered.

LIMITATIONS—CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATES—ORDER OF PAYMENT—EXEMPTIONS.

1. Under Code, § 131, requiring an acknowledgment of debt or new promise to be in writing signed by the obligor, but providing that "payment of any part of principal or interest is equivalent to a promise in writing," an indorsement on a sealed note, of a payment, with a statement signed by the payor that he made the payment as heir of the maker of the note, arrests the running of the statute.

2. When a decree of foreclosure is rendered against a debtor in his lifetime, with an order that execution issue against him personally for any deficiency, but no sale is made or deficiency ascertained till after his death, the claim for such deficiency does not rank as a judgment against his estate. Pope, J., dissenting. Farr v. Linder, (S. C.) 18 S. E. 636, followed.

3. Where personal property exempt to deceased as head of a family under the act of 1868 has been sold with the rest by the executor, the holder of a specialty executed by deceased before 1868 has no claim on the proceeds of the exempt property, to the exclusion of other specialty creditors, but ranks with them.

4. Where the executor does not ask for a fee for his attorney, the decree of distribution should not provide for it.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Fairfield county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Bill by William A. Cook, Susannah L. Boyd, and James R. Curlee, administrators d. b. n. of the estate of Lawrence J. Cook, deceased, against Robert H. Jennings, executor of the will of Nathan C. Robertson, deceased, George H. McMaster, survivor of the firm of Ketchin & McMaster, Mary C. Rion, executrix of the will of James H. Rion, deceased, W. G. Roche, and Julia R. Robertson. From a decree distributing the estate of said Robertson, plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Ragsdale & Ragsdale, for appellants. James G. McCants, McDonald, Douglass & Obeare, and A. S. & W. D. Douglass, for respondents.

POPE, J. Such proceedings were had in the action of appellants against the respondents in the court of common pleas, on its equity side, for Fairfield county, that his honor, Judge Norton, filed his final decree therein on the 2d January, 1893, wherein he directed the respondent R. H. Jennings, as executor of the last will of Nathan C. Robertson, deceased, to distribute the balance of his testator's estate in his hands, to wit, the sum of $783.84, as follows: "(1) To the costs and expenses of administration, including a reasonable fee to his attorney, if he have one; (2) to the plaintiffs' costs and expenses of this suit, not including counsel fee to their attorneys nor including the proving of their claim before the referee; (3) to the judgment now held by Mrs. Julia R. Robertson, and her costs and expenses in this suit, including proof of her claim before the referee; (4) pro rata to the specialty debts of plaintiffs, of Geo. H. McMaster, and of the estate of Rion, and their respective costs of suit, including proof of their claims; (5) to the account of W. E. Roche, and his costs of suit and proof of claim." From this decree the plaintiffs below have appealed, as follows: "The plaintiffs except," etc., "(1) because the said decree deprives the claim of the plaintiffs of its proper rank in the administration of the assets of the estate of Nathan C. Robertson, deceased; (2) because his honor should have held that the claim of the plaintiffs was superior in rank and preferred to all other claims proved in this action against the estate of Nathan C. Robertson, deceased, and was entitled to be first paid; (3) because his honor should have held that, in so far as the funds in the hands of the executor represented an exemption which was liable only for the payment of the plaintiffs' claim, that the same should be applied exclusively thereto; (4) because his honor erred in holding that the demand of Mrs. Julia Robertson was a judgment at the death of the testator, N. C. Robertson, and superior in rank to the claim of the plaintiffs; (5) because his honor should have held that the claim of Mrs. Julia Robertson was not, at the time of testator's death, a judgment, in contemplation of the act of the general assembly providing for the order of payment of the debts of decedents' estates; (6) because his honor erred in holding that the claims of G. H. McMaster and the estate of Rion be paid pro rata with the claim of plaintiffs; (7) because his honor erred in sustaining the claim presented by the estate of James H. Rion, deceased, against the estate of N. C. Robertson, deceased,—the said claim not being a debt of the said N. C. Robertson, deceased, and no evidence having been submitted by the representative of the estate of Rion to show that the said N. C. Robertson was liable for said debt as heir at law; (8) because his honor should have held that the said claim of the estate of Rion was presumed to have been paid, from lapse of time; (9) because his honor erred in holding and directing that the executor of the estate of N. C. Robertson, deceased, pay to his attorney a fee out of the assets in his hands before paying the claim of the plaintiffs."

As it will be seen, the contention here is between creditors of the estate of N. C. Robertson, deceased; and, to correctly apprehend the status of the claims of each one of said creditors, we will reproduce so much of the report of the referee, Mr. Cathcart, as relates to these claims: "(1) The claim presented by Mrs. Mary C. Rion as executrix, etc., of James H. Rion, deceased. This is a sealed note executed to James H. Rion, dated 19th February, 1868, due on the 19th February, 1869, and signed by Martha P. Robertson. On the back of said note appears the following indorsement, to wit: 'Paid on the within note one hundred dollars. 24th December, 1888. The above amount was paid by me as heir at law. [Signed] N. C. Robertson.' On this note there was due on the 24th September, 1892, $430.36. (2) W. G. Roche. Account against N. C. Robertson for $10.50. (3) G. H. McMaster, as the survivor of the firm of Ketchin & McMaster, sealed note as a claim against N. C. Robertson. Note dated July 5, 1869, and signed by M. P. Robertson and M. C. Robertson. This note had sundry credits indorsed on it. Amount due on said note up to 24th September, 1892, $106.52. (4) Mrs. Julia R. Robertson's claim. Judgment against N. C. Robertson, she being now the holder of, and legal owner of, the judgment in the case of Henry L. Elliott, John P. Matthews, Jr., and Joseph H. Cummings against N. C. Robertson. Amount due on said judgment, for principal and interest, up to 24th September, 1892, $505.06. (5) On bond of N. C. Robertson as administrator of the estate of Lawrence J. Cook, deceased, $5,546.28. This bond bears date 3d November, 1857." The small sum of $783.84, in the hands of the executor, represents the estate to be divided, and this sum arose from a sale of the personal property of testator by the executor.

It seems that the testator, N. C. Robertson, was twice married. His first wife, Martha P. Robertson, died after the 13th January, 1872, but the exact date is not furnished by the case. He then married Julia W. Robertson, who survives him; he having died on 13th April, 1890. By his first wife, Martha P. Robertson, at her death, as her sole heir, he inherited 800 acres of land, which was sold to pay her debt under mortgage, and realized a sufficiency for that purpose; leaving over $1,000 to be applied to his debts, besides 100 acres sold by him for $325. These facts are important, in connection with the claim of Mrs. Rion as executrix. It must be borne in mind, however, that there is no evidence here that the amount now in court is in any manner derived from the estate of the first wife, Mrs. Martha P. Robertson. Just here it may be stated that the evidence does not disclose any application for an exemption under the law by Mrs. Julia W. Robertson out of the personal property of her deceased husband. An examination of the grounds of appeal shows to us that the appellants antagonize Mrs. Rion's right to appear as a claimant here at all, and that they insist that, not only is the claim of Mrs. Julia W. Robertson no judgment, but also that, if that fact were admitted, the proceeds of the sale of personal property in the hands of the executor could not be applied to such judgment, because the appellants alone hold a claim that was anterior to 1868, when a homestead in lands and an exemption of personal property were provided for the head of a family in this state, and which, under the decisions of our courts, could defeat such exemption. All that Mrs. Rion claims that is allowed by the circuit judge is that the claim she presents be regarded as a sealed debt dated prior to April 16, 1868, and for which N. C. Robertson is liable. There can be no question that her claim is under seal, and bears date the 28th February, 1868; but, then, it was not executed by N. C. Robertson, but by M. P. Robertson, his wife. To avoid this difficulty, she claims that N. C. Robertson, having become possessed of her entire estate at her death, as her sole heir at law, and such estate being large in value, as compared with the claim she is now presenting, must be held liable therefor, as a sealed note of the date referred to; and she points to his recognition of this obligation during his lifetime by having paid $100 on her claim in April, 1888, as such heir at law. The appellants complain that the circuit judge failed to declare this sealed note paid by lapse of time, but a moment's reflection will show that this position is untenable, if an heir at law, by making a payment on a note made by one from whom he inherited can arrest the statute, for this note was dated in February, 1868, and did not become due, by its own tenor, until 12 months thereafter,—in February, 1869,—and this payment of $100 by the heir at law was made in April, 1888,—less than 20 years from the maturity of the note. So the question is resolved, at last, into the status fixed by law of the heir at law, as to debts due by that one from whom he inherited. The circuit judge referred this matter to sections 1952, 1953 of the General Statutes of this state. The appellants lay stress upon section 131 of our Code, as well as the case of Sepaugh v. Smith, 35 S. C. 613, 14 S. E. 939. The section of the Code referred to is as follows: "No acknowledgement or promise shall be sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract whereby to take the case out of the operation of this title [Time of Commencing Civil Actions] unless the same be contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby: but payment of any part of principal or interest is equivalent to a promise in writing." No advantage can accrue to the appellants by citing this authority. The law fixed the liability upon Robertson, if he inherited the lands of Mrs. Martha P. Robertson, to pay her debts, if the inherited property was sufficient in amount to do so. In his lifetime, Robertson recognized his duty to pay this debt by paying $100 thereon, and when, on the back of that sealed note, he, in writing, acknowledged that he paid that $100 as heir at law of Martha P. Robertson, he fulfilled all the requirements of this section of the Code. Nor can any support be derived by the appellants from the case of Sepaugh v. Smith, supra. The case just cited was when one action was brought on a note upon which credits were indorsed, but such credits contained no statement by whom such payments were made. Without the credits, the note was barred by the statute of limitations. This court held that, when credits were relied upon to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations, such credits contained the new promises to pay what remains unpaid of the old debt, and should have been complained upon as plaintiff's cause of action; citing Fleming v. Fleming, 33 S. C. 510, 12 S. E. 257. In the appeal at bar, no such question arises. This creditor, Mrs. Rion, as executrix, after the pleadings were made up, under an order of reference, was merely required to present and establish her demand, and she relies upon this new promise in writing of N. C. Robertson to pay what remained unpaid of the old note after the credit was allowed. Exceptions 7 and 8 must be overruled.

Exceptions 4 and 5 present a very interesting and serious question. It seems that Mrs. Julia W. Robertson is now the assignee of what purports to be a judgment amounting on the 24th September, 1892, to $505.06. The history of this alleged judgment is that in 1877 certain plaintiffs brought an action against N. C. Robertson on certain notes secured by mortgages of lands, and such proceedings were had in that action that, by the report of a special referee, it was determined that N. C. Robertson was due such plaintiffs on the notes sued on, to the amount of $2,738.15. This report was ordered by Judge A. P. Aldrich 28th October, 1878, filed and confirmed: "It was further ordered and adjudged that the mortgaged premises described in the complaint," etc., "be sold; * * * that, if the proceeds of sale be insufficient to pay the amount so reported due, * * * the said clerk [who was ordered to make the sale] specify the amount of such deficiency" in his report of sale, and that the defendant pay the same; * * * and that the said Henry L. Elliott and the said plaintiffs have execution thereof." Sale of the lands not having been made, on the 3d March, 1888, an order was passed by his honor, Judge Witherspoon, renewing said order for sale on the first Monday in November, 1888, or some convenient sales day thereafter. N. C. Robertson died the 3d of April, 1890. The mortgaged premises were sold the first Monday in January, 1891, by the clerk of court, who reported such sale to the court, specifying in said report that there was a deficiency of $450.81. This report was confirmed by the court. It is thus manifest (1) that the debt of plaintiffs in that action was ascertained on a day certain, for a certain amount, due by N. C. Robertson, and that Robertson acquiesced therein; (2) that at the same time the mortgages were adjudged to be foreclosed, and a sale ordered to be made, with directions for an application of the proceeds of sale to the certain debt of plaintiffs, as fixed in the decree; (3) that this original order for sale was renewed in 1888; (4) that N. C. Robertson, the defendant in that action, died in 1890; (5) that the mortgaged premises were not sold in his lifetime, but were sold in January, 1891; (6) that a balance of $450.81, was found and reported due after the death of Robertson, to the plaintiffs.

The appellants now contend that, as to this balance of $450.81, it is not entitled to rank as a judgment, and assail the decree of the circuit judge as erroneous, when he adjudged to the contrary. As the appellants state this proposition: "When a simple decree of foreclosure is rendered against a debtor in his lifetime, but no sale is made thereunder, and no deficiency ascertained to exist until after his death, does a claim against his estate for a deficiency reported after his death rank as a judgment, or does it take the rank of the instrument upon which such decree of foreclosure is rendered?" They cite in support of their position Ex parte Farrar, 13 S. C. 254; Hull v. Young, 29 S. C. 65, 6 S. E. 938; 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 240; Schouler, Ex'rs, § 426; Williams, Ex'rs, (5th Amer. Ed.) 905; Redf. Wills, 256; Warren v. Raymond, 12 S. C. 9; Freer v. Tupper, 21 S. C. 75; Jones, Mortg. § 1709. We may as well just now announce our conclusion in this matter, and afterwards compare the authorities with such conclusion by us, to see if there is not a confusion of ideas on this subject, which has arisen more as a question of practice than a substantial difference as to the principles of law by which this question should be settled. At any rate, in this state, we desire that the law on this subject shall be declared. We recognize no difference in this state in judgments at law and decrees in equity. They are now the same, and are defined in section 266 of our Code: "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in the action." Wherever and whenever a court has made a final determination of the rights of the parties in the action, such is a judgment. The distinction between judgments and interlocutory judgments consists in the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action, in the one case; and such determination of those rights of the parties in an action as are not complete or final, needing some other adjudication by the court, is an interlocutory judgment. It frequently happens, in law and in equity, that courts are called upon to pass orders to assist the performance of judgments on the law side and on the equity side of the court, and such orders are administrative, and do not attain the dignity of judgments. It is necessary, in determining upon what is the judgment in any particular case, to look to the pleadings and the parties. When parties, under no disabilities under the law, in an action, procure or submit to a judgment of a court, they are concluded by such judgment, and are so concluded in all cases by the terms of the judgment. When, therefore, parties complain upon an indebtedness as due by the defendant, or for which he is responsible, and at the same time a lien of any character upon property of such defendant exists in favor of such party, who complains, and is set up in said complaint, and the court is asked to adjudge such property sold to pay such indebtedness, and a judgment of the court is passed in the action, wherein is ascertained the exact amount due by the defendant to the plaintiff, and the property covered by the lien is ordered to be sold to satisfy such exact amount so ascertained to be due, with the right in the plaintiff, after a sale of the property covered by the lien has failed to pay that sum so ascertained to be due, to issue an execution for the deficiency so adjudged to be due, such final determination of the rights of the parties to the action is a judgment, and should be so respected everywhere. We think the claim here set up answers all these requirements. Let us examine some of the authorities relied upon, to see wherein they differ from our conclusions, if there be any such difference:

First, the case of Ex parte Farrar, supra: Here, a bill in equity had been filed by Farrar Bros. against Lewis Dial and others; a report thereon made by the commissioner in equity, to which exceptions had been filed by both sides, which came on to be heard by Chancellor Carroll, who, in his decree, sustained some of the exceptions, and overruled the others, and ordered the commissioner to reform his report. An appeal from the decree of the chancellor was taken to the supreme court before the commissioner had acted upon the reformation of his report. This appeal was dismissed. Dial having died, his administratrix was substituted, on circuit, in his stead, as defendant, and a money decree taken against such administratrix. Meantime, an action had been begun in the court of common pleas, on its equity side, by a certain creditor of the estate of Lewis Dial, deceased, against his administratrix, heirs at law, and other creditors, to marshal his estate, sell land to pay debts, call in creditors, etc., and a final decree had, wherein the claim of Farrar Bros. was adjudged a simple contract debt. A petition in this last case was presented by Farrar Bros., claiming that their claim, as presented, was without their authority, and also that they were entitled to rank in the distribution of Lewis Dial's estate as judgment creditors. The circuit judge sustained the views of Farrar Bros., but the supreme court, in a carefully prepared decision, showed conclusively that the claim of Farrar Bros. under the decree of Chancellor Carroll made in 1868 was not a final judgment. It is true, in speaking of the character of that claim, the supreme court did recognize and enforce the doctrine laid down in Haskell v. Raoul, 1 McCord, Eq. 32, that "a decretal order upon which an execution may be taken out is a final decree;" but this test was expressly limited to money decrees, for the language used by the court just before a reference to Haskell v. Raoul, supra, was: "To give it such a character, it must be a final decree, and by that we understand [speaking of a money decree] such a decree as not only ascertains that a definite sum of money is due from one party to another, but orders the payment of the same." Apply these principles to the case at bar, and we can see no matter of difficulty in reconciling the two. In Ex parte Farrar, supra, they were applying for a money decree, and nothing else, while in the action wherein a judgment is attempted to be set up by Mrs. Julia W. Robertson, the plaintiffs in that action sought, not only a money decree against the defendant therein, but also a foreclosure of a mortgage of land given by him to secure the payment of that very indebtedness for which a money decree was sought. To avoid a multiplicity of suits is the end of the court of equity. To hold that there may be a final judgment in the foreclosure of a mortgage, and then that a suit to enforce the payment of the indebtedness left unpaid is necessary, would certainly place the powers of a court of equity in a dwarfed condition. But it is suggested that such is not a legitimate conclusion, because here the court of equity, by its judgment, allowed the plaintiffs, after a sale made of the mortgaged property, to come in and obtain, in this very case, a final money decree for the balance remaining after the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged land had been applied to the indebtedness. This position involves the strange doctrine that there can be two final judgments in the same cause, between the same parties, and it is obliged to be admitted by the parties applying the views entertained by this court that the right to the judgment in foreclosure, and the right to a money decree for the balance, must arise from the allegations of the pleadings, and be within the scope of the relief to which the plaintiffs were entitled under their pleadings, for otherwise the court would violate the fundamental principles of section 297 of the Code: "The relief granted to the plaintiff if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." So, therefore, the pleadings to sustain the dual judgments—one for foreclosure, and one for balance remaining due—must raise such an issue. Where is there any inconsistency in a judgment fixing the amount due, and directing property pledged sold, and proceeds applied to the judgment, awarding execution only for the balance thereafter remaining? Are not administrative orders frequently provided for at the foot of final judgments? Wherein is there any inconsistency in regarding leave to issue execution as belonging to cases when administrative orders are, by the final judgment, permitted? We cannot see it.

We will next examine Hull v. Young, supra: In the case cited, the defendant, S. O. Young, had made a note for $300 to the assignors of plaintiffs, and secured its payment by a mortgage upon three several parcels of land,—the Jay place, the Leard place, and the Findley place. All these parcels of land were subsequently sold under judgments junior to the mortgage. One, the Leard place, was purchased by the plaintiffs; one, by an attorney for certain creditors; and the Findley place, by Mrs. Rachel Young. After such sales, action to foreclose plaintiffs' mortgage on the Findley place alone was brought, and to this action S. O. Young and Mrs. Rachel Young were made parties defendant. They set up the defense that the Findley place, in the hands of Mrs. Young, was only liable for its proportion of the mortgage debt. The decree on circuit sustained this position, and fixed the sum of $80 as the proportion of the debt of $300, and interest thereon, for which the Findley place was liable; but the decree went further, and adjudged that both S. O. Young and Mrs. Rachel Young were liable to pay this sum to plaintiffs, if the lands, when sold, failed to do so. The decree also adjudged that plaintiffs have judgment against S. O. Young for the sum of $213.19, with interest and costs. Both S. O. Young and Mrs. Rachel Young appealed. This court held the circuit decree erroneous (1) as to Mrs. Young, because she was not liable to pay any debt to plaintiffs, although the land in her possession was liable to sale to pay the $80 fixed as its proportionate part of the debt of defendant S. O. Young to plaintiffs, and the circuit decree was so modified. This court held, further, that the circuit judge erred in giving judgment against S. O. Young for $213.19, with leave to issue execution therefor before any sale of the mortgaged premises. This is the language of the opinion: "We think, therefore, that it was error to render judgment to be enforced by execution against S. O. Young for any specific sum of money before the mortgaged premises were sold, and the proceeds of such sale were found to be insufficient for the payment of the mortgage debt, when the plaintiffs would then be entitled to judgment for such deficiency, to be enforced against the mortgagor by execution. Of course, the plaintiffs, if so disposed, might have brought an ordinary action at law on the note, in which event they would have been entitled to recover judgment, and issue execution for the whole amount due upon the note. But they had a choice of remedies,—the ordinary action on the note and a proceeding to foreclose the mortgage,—and, having adopted the latter, they must be required to pursue the course appropriate to such a proceeding." Without going further, we might say that there is a marked distinction to be observed in the case we are now reviewing and that presented by Mrs. Julia W. Robertson. In the former, the party who was entitled to speak, appealed from the circuit decree, and had it reversed. In the latter, N. C. Robertson acquiesced in the decree on circuit, allowing it to become a final decree. We are at a loss to see upon what ground these appellants can now, in effect, appeal from such circuit decree final against N. C. Robertson. It is true, if they could, they might impeach it for fraud, but they are powerless to affect it otherwise. It may not be out of the way, however, to observe that we are not disposed to question the judgment of Hull v. Young, except in this respect,—that a provision should have been added that, when a party plaintiff chooses to unite a legal and equitable cause of action in one suit, the court is not at liberty to disregard such a union, but must, in its decree, provide for both, so that harmony may be preserved, and that such a decree is, under our Code, if a final determination of the rights of the parties to the action, a judgment.

Warren v. Raymond, supra, we will next examine: In the case named, Chancellor Carroll had pronounced a decree in January, 1868, wherein he adjudged that Mary Raymond was due William M. Thomas the sum of $3,371.24, and directed a tract of land that had been mortgaged by Mary Raymond to William M. Thomas to secure this debt sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the same sum of money decreed to be due, but in the decree provided for leave to issue execution only for the balance after application of sale of mortgaged premises. Nevertheless, Thomas had his decree enrolled, and issued execution for the whole debt adjudged due, without waiting for any sale. This course was attempted to be justified under the act of the general assembly of 1840 relating to the necessity of the enrollment of decrees in order to make them liens as to third parties, in the light of the decision of Blake v. Heyward, Bailey, Eq. 201. But this court held, in an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Willard, which was concurred in by Mr. Justice McIver, with a dissent from Mr. Justice Haskell, that the terms of the decree of Chancellor Carroll forbade Thomas from enrolling his decree until after a sale had been made, and, as the judgment on circuit was affirmed by both the state and United States supreme courts, he (Thomas) was bound by the terms of that decree. It will be readily seen that the question in that case was lien or no lien of the decree enrolled prematurely by Thomas in its effect upon third parties, and, in no sense affected the question whether the decree was to be considered as a final determination of the rights of the parties, as between Thomas and Mrs. Raymond, the parties to the original suit, and hence can be of no authority in deciding the issue joined in the case at bar. The case at bar is not a question of lien or no lien. Under our acts for the distribution of intestate or testate estates, provision is made for payment of judgments without regard to the lien of such judgments.

Freer v. Tupper, supra, is the next case cited. This action was a contest wherein the validity of Freer's title to a small parcel of land was raised. It seems that Freer obtained a judgment against one Schultz on note and mortgage. After the mortgage was foreclosed, and sale made thereof, and proceeds applied to the amount ascertained to be due, there was a deficiency, and for this deficiency an execution was issued against Schultz. The active energy of this execution having expired, it was, after notice to Schultz, renewed, and under this renewed execution the land involved between Freer and Tupper was sold, and purchased by Freer. Tupper denied that the original judgment in Freer v. Schultz was good, (1) because there could be no money decree or judgment therein; (2) because the execution was without authority of law. These questions were decided in favor of Freer. Mr. Justice McGowan, who delivered the opinion of the court, said, among other things: "The complaint in the case of Freer v. Schultz is not in the case, and therefore we do not know its precise scope and purpose; but, in the absence of proof to the contrary, we must assume that the action was not for what is called a 'strict foreclosure,'—for the sale of the land, and no more.—but that it was in the usual form, and prayed, not only for the sale of the land, but also judgment for the deficiency of the debt, if there should be any. Taking this view, and reading the decree of foreclosure carefully, it will be found that it adjudged three things: (1) That the sum of $994.75, besides the costs, were due by Schultz to Freer on the mortgage debt; (2) that the sheriff should sell the mortgaged premises at a future day, and pay the plaintiff the amount so reported due, viz. $994.75, or so much thereof as the purchase money of the mortgaged premises will pay of the same; (3) that if the proceeds of such sale be insufficient to pay the amount, etc., the sheriff specify the amount of such deficiency in his report of sale, and that the defendant, Frederick C. Schultz, be required, by execution, to pay the same. It seems to us that, taking the whole decree together, it did authorize an execution to issue for whatever might be the deficiency, if any. It is true that the precise amount for which it should issue was not named in the decree, for the reason that at the time it was rendered it could not be foreseen what the land would realize, but it directed the sheriff to make the sale, and apply the proceeds, and that the execution should issue for the deficiency. * * * But there was a decree for the whole mortgage debt, subject to be reduced by the proceeds of sales, and we cannot say it was fatally defective, in falling "to authorize the issuing an execution for its enforcement." Thus it is manifest that the appellants can derive little comfort from this case. On the contrary, it is similar in the form of the judgment to that complained of in the case at bar.

Let us examine 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 240: The language used is, "A decree that does not authorize the issuing of an execution for its enforcement is not entitled to rank as a final judgment, in the administration of the estate." This language or view is perfectly consistent with the ideas we have advanced hitherto. Of course, for a decree to be pronounced a money decree, it must include within it the right to enforce it by an execution, and so the very decree we have been considering does include the power. It is true the execution is only to be issued for such balance as may be due when the money decree shall have credited upon it the land covered by the mortgage. In opposition to this view, it has been suggested that a second application to a court for its judgment is necessary, in order to know what balance may still remain after the mortgaged premises may be sold. We are unable to perceive any substantial difficulty here. A motion addressed to a court in furtherance of the enforcement of its judgment is often resorted to; and, because the adjudication of such motion by a court becomes necessary, we do not call such determination a "final judgment." No more so does this application to a court for the right to issue an execution for the balance. We must always remember that the main object of a code of procedure is to abolish the distinctions which had been allowed to impede the administration of our courts and to produce a uniformity and simplicity in the application of remedies in courts of justice. In this work we are now considering, reference is made, as its authority for the doctrine we have just quoted from it, to the case of Ex parte Farrar, supra, and also to Williams, Ex'rs, (5th Amer. Ed.) 905. The quotation from this latter work, relied upon, is: "If a decree in equity be not conclusive of the matters in question, as if it be merely to account, and do not ascertain the sum to be paid, [italics ours,] it is analogous to a judgment quoad computat at law, and is no complete judgment until the judgment is paid." Now, these two quotations are all the authorities cited in the American & English Encyclopedia for its position. We have already pointed out the true meaning of the case Ex parte Farrar, supra; but, as to the quotation from Mr. Williams' work, it seems to us that, properly considered, it does not militate against the views we have expressed, for we have admitted that, if a decree is not finally conclusive of the issues raised by and between parties in the action, it is not entitled to the distinction of a final decree. Of course, therefore, a judgment ordering a further account to be taken is in no sense a final judgment, or, if such decree does not ascertain the sum to be paid, it is not to be considered a final judgment. But, mark you, in the matter now discussed by us, there is no further account ordered, nor is there a failure to ascertain the sum due to the plaintiffs by the defendant. The court has decreed what is due, in dollars and cents, by the defendant to the plaintiffs, and in its judgment has ordered how that sum is to be paid by the defendant. But it is made my duty, as the organ of this court, to state that the majority of the court decline to assent to my views herein expressed on the fourth and fifth grounds of appeal herein. They adhere to the views recently expressed by them in the case of Parr v. Lindler, (18 S. E. 636,) (recently filed,) to which case I could not agree. The exceptions 4 and 5 are sustained, but I dissent from this conclusion.

The sixth exception, that alleges error in the circuit decree as to the rank of the claims of George H. McMaster and the estate of Rion, is not tenable. We have already considered the claim of the estate of Rion, and determined that it was entitled to rank as a sealed note, and the claim presented by McMaster is confessedly of the same nature; so that, if we decide the questions raised in the first and second exceptions against the appellees, all difficulties as to the rank and order of payment of these claims pro rata with that of appellants is removed. It has frequently been held by this court that the exemption of personal property to the head of a family, in obedience to the mandates of the constitution, creates no estate in said property in the head of the family. The law leaves the title as it found it. But the appellants lay stress upon the fact that they alone could avoid, in law, this exemption, and would have us adopt the view that therefore they alone should have the right to appropriate the proceeds of sale, but we do not see that this follows. The sale of this personal property had been made by the executor of the will of N. O. Robertson, deceased, without any demand for such sale by the appellants. No process, mesne or final, to procure such sale, has ever been set in motion by them. We find the personal property as having been sold by the executor, and the proceeds of such sale held by him for distribution to such of the creditors of the estate of his testator as may be entitled to it. This court will not decide speculative questions. We must content ourselves with the actual. Therefore, whether we would have sanctioned an order to sell this personal property is such a question, and does not arise here. The party who might have resisted such a sale is a party to this action, and no question of that character was presented or decided on the circuit, where she was entitled to be heard. Certainly, we will not consider it, if raised here for the first time. The laws of this commonwealth provide the order in which claims are to be paid out of the assets of a deceased debtor's estate, and there is no provision in such laws by which appellants' views can be carried into effect. These grounds of appeal are dismissed.

It remains for us to consider the ninth ground of appeal. No question as to the fee to be paid the executor's attorney was raised before the special referee. It seems to have occurred to the mind of the circuit judge as one that might arise, and hence he sought to provide for it. Attorneys are usually careful as to their own rights. We have heard of no such claim presented by any such attorney in this case. It is always safer to meet a question when properly presented to the court. Here, while we can easily see how, as a matter of prudence, the circuit judge felt called upon to so provide in his decree, yet we think he was in error here, and this exception is sustained. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be modified as required by our having sustained the fourth, fifth, and ninth exceptions, but in all other respects it is affirmed. Let the cause be remanded to the circuit court to enforce the views herein adopted by this court.

APPEAL FROM JUSTICE'S COURT — JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

Where suit was brought in a justice's court upon an account for $94.80, to which the defendant filed a plea setting up that he was entitled to sundry credits amounting to $66.18, and also to a set-off of $13, and at the trial the plaintiff admitted that $65.78 of the amounts claimed by the defendant should be allowed, and thereupon a judgment for the plaintiff was rendered for $29.02, the balance claimed by him, from which judgment the defendant entered an appeal to the superior court, it was error to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the amount claimed in the court below was less than $50. The exercise of the right of appeal in such cases depends upon the amounts claimed in the pleadings, and not upon reductions which may be made at the trial. Code, § 4157; Reedy v. Helms, 54 Ga. 121; Taylor v. Blasingame, 73 Ga. 111.

Error from superior court, Burke county; H. McWhorter, Judge.

Action by H. J. Davis against Simeon Bell on account. From a judgment dismissing the appeal from a justice's court after judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

ing dissatisfied with the judgment of the justice of the peace, or notary public, and upon all confessions of judgment, provided the amount claimed in said suit is over $50, may, as a matter of right, enter an appeal from said judgment," etc.

The following is the official report:

Suit was brought in a justice's court on an account for $94.80, as appeared by the bill of particulars attached to the summons. The defendant filed a plea in which he set up that he was entitled to sundry credits, amounting to $66.18. He also pleaded a set-off of $13. On the trial the plaintiff's counsel admitted that $65.78 of the amount in the defendant's plea should be allowed, and, after hearing evidence, the court rendered judgment against the defendant for the balance, $29.02, and he appealed to the superior court. The plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal because the amount claimed on the trial in the court below was under $50. The motion was sustained, and the appeal dismissed. This ruling is assigned as error, the defendant contending that the sum claimed in the suit, and not that claimed by the plaintiff on the trial, should determine the right of appeal.

FREEMAN v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—FAILURE TO DELIVER MESSAGE—NONSUIT.

It appearing from the plaintiff's evidence, fairly construed, that before the telegram offering his son employment was sent the son was under contract to work for another, consistently with which he could not have entered the employment of the sender of the telegram, the nondelivery of the telegram did not cause a failure by the son to obtain the employment to which it related, and there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

Error from superior court, Rockdale county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by S. B. Freeman against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

S. B. Freeman, for himself and as next friend of his minor son, Y. G. Freeman, sued the telegraph company for damages alleged to have arisen from its failure to deliver a telegram sent by S. W. Roberts from Sparta, Ga., November 21, 1887, and addressed to Y. G. Freeman, care of S. B. Freeman, Conyers, Ga. This telegram was: "Will pay your price. Come immediately. Answer." It was alleged that by the failure to deliver this telegram in proper time S. B. Freeman was prevented from getting employment for his son with Roberts, as a printer in Roberts' printing office, at a salary of $25 per month and board for 1888; S. B. Freeman having proposed to Roberts to hire Y. G. Freeman to Roberts for said amount, and the telegram being an acceptance of that proposition. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and to this ruling excepts. Upon the trial plaintiff introduced the telegram, and evidence to the following effect: Roberts sought to obtain the services of Y. G. Freeman to work in Roberts' printing office, and was to pay him $25 a month and his board. He sought Y. G.'s services for an indefinite time, or as long as he gave satisfaction. Was to hire him by the month, but felt bound to keep him as long as he gave satisfaction. He sent the telegram in question. He would not have hired young Freeman if applied to in December, 1887, or in January, 1888, for he had secured another party. S. B. Freeman lived in Conyers in 1887, four or five hundred yards from the telegraph office, and he and his residence were well known to the telegraph operator there. Y. G. Freeman was 16 or 17 years old in November, 1887, and his father controlled his services, and sought to get employment for him. He, S. B., corresponded, among others, with Roberts, and with one Lingo, and made an offer to Roberts, which Roberts finally accepted by the telegram in question. After the telegram was sent by Roberts, Roberts wrote a postal card to S. B. Freeman, postmarked the 28th, asking what Freeman's son was going to do, and stating that he, Roberts, had written young Freeman, telegraphed S. B., and had written Irwin, (young Freeman's former employer,) but got no answer, and that courtesy demanded that he get some answer. S. B. Freeman received this card, and then went to the telegraph office, and asked if there was a telegram for Y. G. or S. B. Freeman, and the operator said there was one for Y. G. The telegram, as handed by this operator to S. B., was addressed to Y. G. Freeman, Conyers, Ga. This postal card was received four or five days after the telegram was sent. S. B. Freeman testified, among other things: Failing to receive the telegram knocked his son out of employment, for he was hunting up little jobs afterwards. Of course he sent him off after they decided Roberts was not going to give the price. He (S. B.) told his son to go down to Irwinton, and go to work there; and if he received any news from Roberts, and Roberts still wished him, he (S. B.) would write him to go from there to Sparta. In a short while young Freeman was out of employment at Irwinton, as his employer there got another printer for a less price. He came home, stayed a while, and went to Elberton for a short time, and the Elberton man got a cheaper printer. He (S. B.) thought his son was in Conyers on November 21, 1887, but did not know for certain what day his son left. His son went to Irwinton with his approval, and he expected his son to stay there if he never heard from Roberts. Thought he (S. B.) wrote to Roberts as soon as he got the postal, and stated that he was "at the first" of the telegram. That was the same day he got the telegram. Wrote immediately, as well as he remembered, to know if the place was filled; and Roberts wrote back that he had no use for young Freeman, having procured another man in his place. S. B. did not telegraph Roberts after he got this letter; did not know that he could. He did not look at the postal in the way that Roberts still wanted his son, but that he simply wanted him (S. B.) to answer. The evidence of young Freeman does not seem materially different from that of his father, except that he (the witness) had left Conyers just before the 21st. He occasionally afterwards obtained employment for short times at $20 per month and board and $15 per month. His father notified him of the telegram, and he wrote to Roberts, stating that he would go from Irwinton to Sparta, and work for Roberts; but Roberts replied he had made other arrangements at that time. This was several weeks after the telegram should have been received. He (witness) was competent and able to do the work at any time from November 1, 1887, to November 1, 1888. His contract to work at Irwinton was for no definite period.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—PROCEDURE—POSTPONEMENT OF TRIAL FOR SETTLEMENT—EFFECT OF.

1. By the act of October 8, 1885, a justice's court may hold from day to day until its business is disposed of. No limit upon this power results from a publication by the magistrate that his court will continue in session 15 days. Transfer Co. v. Clarke, (Oct. Term, 1892,) 18 S. E. 138.

2. When a pending case is suspended to give opportunity to the parties to settle, and a settlement is attempted, but fails, both parties knowing of the failure, neither is entitled to notice when the case will afterwards come up for trial.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; M. J. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Morris & Bro. against J. A. Bostain. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Suit was brought to the March term, 1892, of a justice's court, and the case was set for trial on March 15th. On the trial it appeared that the accounts between the parties were so complicated and mixed up that it would be a hard task to arrive at the true status of the case, and the justice suggested that perhaps a better conclusion could be arrived at by both parties getting together with their accounts, finding out the difference, and settling the matter between themselves. To this both sides agreed, but the case was not dismissed. At the April term the plaintiff's counsel stated to the court that no settlement could be obtained, and the case was reset for trial on the 20th of April, on which day only the plaintiff's side appeared, and judgment was awarded to them. To the levy of the execution the defendant filed an affidavit of illegality, sworn to September 29, 1892. In this affidavit it is alleged that the judgment was not rendered at the legal court day for holding the justice's court, "said court advertising that its court would be open from the first Monday in each month for fifteen days thereafter;" that the 20th of April was not a regular court day, but was two days beyond the April term, which commenced on April 4th; that the court's suggestion that the parties get together and settle the matter between themselves left defendant under the impression that the suit was dismissed so far as the court was concerned, and that he would not have to attend court longer on the case; that it was called up at the April term without notice to him, and without his knowledge or consent; and that "he does not owe said debt, or any part thereof." On demurrer this affidavit was dismissed by the justice, and on certiorari the judgment of dismissal was sustained, whereon the defendant excepts.

In his answer to the writ of certiorari the justice says: "It is true I advertised my court to hold fifteen days after my regular court day, which is the first Monday in each month, in order to dispose of the business of my court; and it is often the case that cases are set beyond the limit when the docket is burdened with cases, but generally by consent of parties. However, this is not the case always." In his petition for certiorari the defendant says that, after the disposition of the case at the March term, he expected the plaintiff to call at his place of business, and they would adjust the differences between them amicably; that plaintiff never called upon him to adjust the matter; and that defendant heard no more of the case until some time in September.

LEWIS v. WESTERN & A. R. CO.

CARRIERS—EJECTION OF PASSENGERS—LIMITATION OF TICKET.

There being no evidence that the plaintiff, in ordering his ticket, communicated to the agent who sold it that a ticket was wanted different from that which he received, and that ticket having expired by its own limitation, according to its face, before he took the train from which he was expelled, there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by John H. Lewis against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Lewis sued the railroad company for damages from personal injuries. He was nonsuited, and to this excepts. Upon the trial, the evidence for plaintiff was: Plaintiff purchased a ticket at Birmingham, Ala., to Atlanta via Chattanooga, over the Queen & Crescent and defendant's lines, of the ticket agent at the depot at Birmingham, just before taking the train for Chattanooga, between 2 and 3 o'clock A. M. on February 1, 1892. Plaintiff just asked for a ticket, which he knew was a one-day limit ticket. He had bought and used similar tickets many times before. He left Chattanooga for Atlanta on February 2, 1892, via defendant's road, between 12 o'clock M. and 1 o'clock P. M. of that day. The conductor came to him to collect fares, and he handed him the ticket above mentioned, which the conductor looked at and returned, saying it was not good, as the limit had expired the day before, and telling plaintiff he would have to pay cash fare if he wanted to ride to the point the ticket read. Plaintiff then told him the ticket was all he had to offer; that he bought the ticket in good faith, expecting a one-day limit on the same, having bought and used the same form of ticket before; and, if the selling agent had made a mistake, it was not his (plaintiff's) fault; and that, in order to protect himself, he must ask the conductor to accept it. The conductor refused to accept it, but said he would see plaintiff later. When the train neared Dalton he came to plaintiff, and asked for the ticket, saying he would wire for instructions on the same. Plaintiff handed him the ticket, and the conductor left him. When the train was approaching Cartersville, the conductor came to him and asked if he had been sick the night before, and incapable of journeying on the last train to Atlanta on the evening of February 1st. Plaintiff told him he (plaintiff) had contracted a very bad cold, and, not knowing the mistake on the ticket, took some medicine to help his cold, and went to bed early, to get the benefit of much needed rest, and to help his cold. The conductor then asked if it would have resulted seriously with him if he had taken that train, and plaintiff told him, "No," he did not think it would have killed him. The conductor then handed him back the ticket, with the remark that under the circumstances he must return it, and collect cash fare, or ask plaintiff to leave the train. Plaintiff received the ticket, and told the conductor he would not leave the train of his own free will. At Cartersville the conductor told him he must get off, and he replied he would not do it. The conductor then said, "You surely do not intend to create a disturbance, and cause me trouble." And plaintiff told him, "No," if the conductor would take his baggage, and assist him by the arm, he would go with the conductor. As the conductor was putting him off, he asked two gentlemen to step to the platform and witness the ejection, which they did. The conductor put him off on the platform, bag and baggage. Plaintiff then said, "Am I off?" and the conductor told him he was. Plaintiff then spoke to the two gentlemen, in the conductor's presence, asking them if they heard and witnessed what was said and passed, and they answered, "Yes." Plaintiff then turned to the conductor, and told him if he would hold the train plaintiff would purchase a ticket to Atlanta, but the conductor refused to do this, saying, if plaintiff got on that train, he would have to pay full cash fare from Chattanooga to Atlanta. The conductor then gave the signal for the train to pull out, and stepped aboard. Plaintiff also stepped on board, and took a seat. When the conductor came to collect fares he demanded of plaintiff full cash fare from Chattanooga to Atlanta. Plaintiff said that, having gotten on the train at Cartersville, bound for Atlanta, he would pay cash fare from Cartersville to Atlanta, provided the conductor gave him a receipt for his money, saying where fare was paid from and to. The conductor said he would not take fare less than from Chattanooga to Atlanta. Plaintiff then stated his view of the matter, and offered the amount of fare from Cartersville to Atlanta, and told conductor if he rejected it he (plaintiff) would use all means in his power to resist an ejectment. The conductor then took the money, and gave him a cash fare receipt for the same. The coach was nearly full of passengers, who heard and witnessed what was said and done, and the people at the depot at Cartersville heard and witnessed much that was said and done. Plaintiff arrived at Chattanooga between 8 and 9 o'clock A. M., February 1, 1892. He testified that he thought the difference in price between a limited and unlimited ticket between the points in question over the route he took was about $2.75 or $3; was not sure whether they sold continuous unlimited tickets from Birmingham to Atlanta via Chattanooga over these roads at that time; and that he could not give the exact hour when trains over defendant's road left Chattanooga for Atlanta, but there were many freight and passenger trains running. The ticket stated, among other things, that it was subject to the stop-over regulations the lines over which it read; that it was good until used unless limited by stamp or written indorsement, or canceled by punch in the margin; and, if limited as to time, would be void after midnight of date canceled by "L" punch in the margin. On the back was stamped: "Union Depot B. Feb. 1, 1892. Birmingham, Ala." And the date, February 1, 1892, appears canceled in the margin.

ISELL v. STATE.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — NEW TRIAL — NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The evidence warranted the verdict, and the newly-discovered evidence was cumulative, as to all of it, except such as imputed a declaration to the person assaulted inconsistent with his evidence at the trial, and this declaration had no materiality, save as tending to impeach the witness.

Error from superior court, Elbert county; H. McWhorter, Judge.

O. F. Isbell was convicted of assault and battery, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Isbell was convicted of assault and battery alleged to have been committed on Eaverson. He moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and for newly-discovered evidence. The motion was overruled, and he excepted. The testimony for the state was substantially as follows: Eaverson was marshal of Bowman. By ordinances of that town, it was penal for any person to be drunk on the streets, and it was the duty of the marshal to arrest persons guilty of drunkenness or disorderly conduct. The defendant was there, and was drinking. Eaverson told one David to take defendant off, or he would have to arrest him. David said he could not do anything with defendant. Later in the evening, defendant rode his horse across the street or square twice, and when Eaverson went near him he galloped off down the street, and stopped in front of Bagwell's shop. Eaverson went to where he was. He was not then doing anything. Eaverson caught hold of him, and told him to come and go before the mayor. He refused to go, and said Eaverson could not arrest him on his horse. Eaverson replied he would carry him and the horse both. He got down from the horse, on the opposite side, and Eaverson ran around to him with a walnut stick drawn. He hit Eaverson on the head, and Eaverson struck him with the stick, which was a foot and a half long and an inch and a half in diameter. Thereupon, defendant caught Eaverson by the hair, jerked him, and bit him on the face. They scuffled, and Bagwell parted them, and pushed defendant into his (Bagwell's) shop. Eaverson started in there, with his stick drawn in a striking position, and defendant told him to go out of there. Defendant did not strike him, or attempt to strike him, with the iron. Testimony for the defendant was, in brief, as follows: On the day in question the defendant was drinking some, talking loud, but was not disturbing anybody. He and Eaverson were near each other during the day until late in the evening, when the difficulty occurred, up to which time Eaverson had not arrested him, or made any effort to do so. The horse defendant was riding had the habit of "taking the studs," and in the evening, as defendant was riding, the horse stopped suddenly on the street. Defendant had a jug of molasses in his hand, and Eaverson started towards him. Defendant galloped down the street towards Bagwell's shop. He laughed at Eaverson, and said: "Go back, marshal. I am gone." He was sitting on his horse doing nothing, when Eaverson came up. One witness testified that when defendant got off of his horse he saw the stick go up and down, and it looked as if Eaverson struck defendant over the horse. Lester Bagwell testified that he was present at the difficulty; that, after some conversation between the parties, Eaverson told defendant to get down from his horse, and defendant got down on the side opposite from Eaverson, and, just as he got down, witness heard a blow from the stick; and that defendant did nothing, and made no effort to do anything, to Eaverson, until Eaverson struck him with the stick. The newly-discovered testimony is contained in the affidavits of A. A. Seymour and M. C. Bagwell, to the effect that Eaverson struck defendant with the stick before defendant struck him, and that, immediately after the difficulty, Bagwell or defendant, in talking with Eaverson, told him he had struck defendant first, and Eaverson replied, "I don't care if I did."

GEORGIA, C. & N. RY. CO. v. PARKS.

DEFECTIVE RAILROAD CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The question as to whether the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence was one of fact, for determination by the jury; and, taking the evidence most favorably for the prevailing party, there was enough to warrant a finding for the plaintiff, though there was also enough in the whole evidence to warrant a finding against him. Lumpkin, J., dissenting.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by John R. Parks against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company to recover for personal injuries. Plaintiff had judgment, and, a new trial having been denied, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Parks brought an action against the railroad company for damages sustained by him in consequence of a fall from his wagon as he was attempting to drive his team over the defendant's track at a public road crossing. A verdict in his favor was rendered, and the defendant moved for a new trial on the grounds that the same was contrary to law and evidence. The motion was overruled. The declaration alleges that the company, through its agents and employees, was engaged in working upon its roadbed, laying rails, and doing other work thereon, at a point where a public road had been in existence and used by the public, and where the company located its line so as to cross the public highway. In doing this work the company's employees dug up the roadbed at the crossing, and placed cross-ties and tracks upon it, leaving holes or sinks between them, and leaving the crossing in a dangerous and unsafe condition for use by the public, and so kept and maintained it, without notice or warning to those passing along the road, which facts were known to the company, its agents and employees, but unknown to the plaintiff until he was injured. He approached the crossing with a view to passing over it with a loaded wagon, but owing to the elevation of the roadbed, and the manner in which the dirt had been left at its sides, he did not and could not see its dangerous condition. No warning was given him, although the company's agents and employees were near at hand, saw him approaching, and were aware that he was about to cross the roadbed on the public road, relying upon its safe and proper condition for use by the public. On reaching the crossing, by reason of the careless and negligent manner in which it had been placed and left by the company's employees, the wagon on which he was riding was caused to sink or fall into the opening left by the company at the crossing, and he was thrown violently forward off the wagon, and was injured in a stated manner. He alleges that the injuries were the result of the carelessness and negligence of the company, its agents and employees, in each and all of the acts above set forth. The evidence was directly conflicting. It appeared that the plaintiff was driving a two-horse wagon containing a bale of cotton, on top of which the plaintiff was sitting and driving. The wagon road was inclined upward on each side of the railroad. The company's employees were at work upon the track at this point, and some of them were on the opposite side of the railroad from the plaintiff. He drove up, and stopped his wagon 20 or 25 feet from the railroad, and stood there 10 or 15 minutes. One of the railroad wagons was driven empty over the crossing, and then the plaintiff started to drive over. The railroad track had been filled with earth outside the rails, but not between them, and there was a sink of about a foot in depth from the top of the rails. As the plaintiff attempted to drive across, the mules became frightened when they stepped inside the track, and began to jump. He tried to stop them, but could not, and was thrown from the wagon as it lunged over the rails. He testified that he could not see the condition of the road inside the track until he got there, and first discovered it when he drove into it, and that he had no notice or warning that it was out of repair or unsafe to cross, though he could have been warned by those in charge of the work, who were on the other side of the railroad. On the other hand, the testimony for the company is that the plaintiff could have seen the condition of the premises from where he sat in his wagon, and that he was expressly warned by the company's agent in charge of the track-laying that he could not cross, and would have to wait until they made the crossing, which they would do as soon as possible, and which would have taken about three-quarters of an hour. Other witnesses who were present testified that they did not hear any warning given to the plaintiff, nor anything said to him, and that the injury occurred about 10 o'clock in the morning, and it was after 2 o'clock before the crossing was fixed. There was testimony that the reason why the plaintiff stopped when he drove up was because he saw the condition of the crossing, and was waiting for it to be so prepared that he could cross in safety. He testified that he stopped to look at the hands work, and let his mules rest, and that, if he had known the crossing was dangerous, he would not have attempted to go over.

Erwin & Cobb, for plaintiff in error. C. H. Brand, J. H. Lumpkin, and Harrison & Peeples, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

LUMPKIN, J., (dissenting.) It being, to my mind, conclusively shown by the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in driving his wagon on the track of the railroad at a public crossing while the railroad was in progress of construction, that it was obviously dangerous to cross the same in this manner, and that the exercise of ordinary care and diligence upon his part would have prevented his so doing, the verdict in his favor was contrary to law, although the railroad company may have been guilty of negligence in leaving the crossing in a dangerous condition, and in failing to warn the plaintiff of this fact.

DARGAN et al. v. CAROLINA CENT. R. CO.

EMINENT DOMAIN—RAILROAD COMPANIES—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Under the charter of a railroad company, (Acts 1854-55, c. 225, §§ 24, 26, 28,) providing that it may purchase land necessary for its road, and may condemn land in the absence of an agreement in regard thereto; and declaring that, in the absence of any contract in relation to land through which its road may pass, signed by the owner, it shall be presumed that the land, together with a space of 100 feet on each side of the road, has been granted to the company by the owner, unless the latter shall apply for an assessment of its value within two years after completion of the road on his land,—the presumption of a grant only arises where there is no contract with the owner; and where it appears that the owner of a lot deeded one-half thereof to the company, keeping the remaining half, which is within 100 feet of the road through the half deeded, and that the company has not exercised dominion over the half not deeded for two years, an action by the owner for an assessment of the value of such half is not barred.

D. A. Covington, F. I. Osborne, and Haywood & Haywood, for appellants. Batchelor & Devereux, for appellee.

AVERY, J. The right of the state to take private property rests upon the ground that there is public necessity for such appropriation, and can be exercised only where the law provides the means of giving adequate compensation to the owner. Where the power to appropriate has been given by statute without sufficient provision for the payment of damages, it has been held to be the intent of the legislature that the right of eminent domain should be exercised only after first obtaining the consent of those affected. Boston & L. R. Corp. v. Salem & L. R. Co., 2 Gray, 1; In re Flatbush Ave., 1 Barb. 286; In re Hamilton Ave., 14 Barb. 414; 1 Potter, Corp. § 168. Text writers and courts classify the methods of obtaining the right of way for railroads as of three or four kinds; the difference between two of the modes being only that which arises from entering into an executory contract for purchase in one instance, and taking an executed conveyance for the same interest in the other. 1 Harris, Dom. Corp. 35; Beattie v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 436, 12 S. E. 913. The charter of the defendant company (Acts 1854-55, c. 55, §§ 26, 28¹) followed substantially the usual formula adopted in framing nearly all of the earlier acts of incorporation in this country, when it provided that "in the absence of any contract or contracts in relation to land, through which said road or any of its branches may pass, signed by the owner thereof * * *. It shall be presumed that the land over which said road or any of its branches may be constructed, together with a space of one hundred feet on each side of the center of said road, has been granted to said company by the owner or owners thereof," etc. Where no such contract was shown, the undisturbed use by the company of such right of way over a tract of land for two years after the road should be finished, and running over it, by the terms of the act, raised the presumption of a grant of the easement by the owner. Hendrick v. Railroad Co., 101 N. C. 623, 8 S. E. 236; Beattie v. Railroad Co., supra. Though the provision in reference to a previous attempt to make some agreement with the owner by which the necessity for instituting condemnation proceedings might be obviated was in different charters couched in terms somewhat variant, many of the ablest courts in this country construed them as imposing the duty upon corporations, as a condition precedent to the exercise of the right of condemnation, of alleging and proving that an effort had been made to purchase the privilege of passing over the land sought to be condemned directly from the owners, or that such proprietors were not sui juris. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 301, with note 2, p. 394, and notes 6, 7, p. 395; 1 Wood, Ry. Law, p. 711. While it is not necessary to give our approval to this doctrine, which has no direct application to our case, it illustrates the rule that statutory provisions for taking property in the exercise of eminent domain must be always construed strictly. 1 Wood, Ry. Law, p. 643, and note 2.

The right of the owner to recover damages for the taking by a railway company depends, in any case, upon the answer to the test question whether the corporation has already acquired a vested interest in the land, and whether the owner has a still subsisting right to recover damages for the assertion of dominion over it. Westbrook v. North, 2 Me. 179; Hampton v. Coffin, 4 N. H. 517; Railroad Co. v. Nesbit, 10 How. 395. An interest in the entire right of way of 100 feet on each side would not vest in the company unless it took possession in the exercise of the privilege of appropriating private property conferred by the charter, (sections 26-28,) and the correlative right to sue for the damages would not accrue till the title to the interest vested in the company by such unequivocal entry. It was only in the absence of such a contract as would enable the company to construct and operate its road over the land on which its line was located that its occupation and use of the land for corporate purposes for two years after its line was finished over it could be justly held to have started the statute to running so as to raise a presumption of a grant to the right of way for 100 feet on each side of the center of the track. This is not only a fair construction of the language of the charter, but it establishes a rule that is in accord with a familiar principle of the common law in reference to adverse possession. In order to ripen title in the occupant, "possession [said Pearson, C. J., in Osborne v. Johnston, 65 N. C. 26] must be adverse, uninterrupted, open, and unequivocal, so as to expose the party to an action. This is the test." McLean v. Smith, 106 N. C. 178, 11 S. E. 184. The general rule is that when one enters upon land under a deed, and occupies some portion of it, his constructive possession extends to the boundary line of his deed, unless, by reason of the lappage of a better title on some part of it, the possession on such interference is deemed in law to be in the claimant under such title. McLean v. Smith, supra.

The company constructed its track in November, 1874, across the Simpson lot, but entirely upon the half of said lot which was afterwards, on July 7, 1875, conveyed to it by Simpson and wife in fee simple. The company did not attempt to enter upon the other half, though it was situate within 100 feet of the center of the track, until within two years before this proceeding was instituted, on the 16th of March, 1893. The plaintiff alleges that there was no attempt to take actual possession of the half of the lot which was conveyed by Simpson and wife to the plaintiff on the 23d of June, 1883, until within such period; and the answer, by evading a direct admission or denial, is deemed to have conceded the truth of the allegation. If the plaintiff had commenced this condemnation proceeding prior to any assertion of dominion by the defendant, the company or its predecessors might well have answered that they had accepted the conveyance from Simpson in lieu of condemnation, and that the plaintiff could not demand compensation for land outside of that covered by its boundaries,—certainly, until the company should have entered upon and used it for corporate purposes, if at all. We are not called upon to determine whether the plaintiff could have maintained an action for possession and damages for the wrongful withholding of the possession of the land conveyed to her by Simpson. 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 603, and note 3, and p. 606, note 1. It lies, however, within 100 feet of the center of defendant's track; and, if she could have maintained such civil action for the trespass, we think she might nevertheless waive the tortious character of the entry, when actually made in the assertion of a claim by the defendant under its charter, and demand compensation in damages for the easement claimed. Id. p. 595, and note 6. The defendant cannot take advantage of its equivocal conduct in confining its occupation for 15 years to the limits of its deed from Simpson, so that it was not subjected to any liability for trespass beyond its bounds, and then claim the advantage of holding under the privilege granted in the charter up to the margin of the usual right of way, instead of to the outer lines of the deed. Even though it may not have been incumbent on the defendant, as a condition precedent to setting up a claim that he acquired an easement in the land from the state in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, to show that he had made an effort previously to purchase the privilege by private agreement, and had failed, yet if the plaintiff, taking the laboring oar upon herself, proposed to prove that another agree ment was made, in lieu of instituting condemnation proceedings, in 1875, by which the defendant's predecessor accepted (probably for a smaller price) a more restricted territory in fee simple, instead of the easement in a larger boundary, we can conceive of no sufficient ground for objecting to the competency of the testimony. It was only in the absence of such agreement as to the right of way that the statute, upon the completion of the line over the land of an owner, was put in motion so as to raise a presumption of a grant of the easement within two years thereafter. The company, like an individual, can acquire a right as an incident to occupation, only where the possession is unequivocal. It was clearly competent to show that the agent of the company accepted said deed because, as he said, the company did not need as much as 100 feet on either side of the center of the track. We think that the presumption is, in all cases where a deed from a landowner to an area more limited than that allowed by its charter for the location of its line has been accepted by the company, that the conveyance was, within the contemplation of the charter, a contract entered into in lieu of the resort to condemnation proceedings. In this particular instance the defendant has no cause to complain, if the land is really needed for corporate purposes on account of the growth and development of its business, that the plaintiff has waived objection, and conceded, instead of contesting, its right of condemnation. 6 Amer. Eng. Enc. Law, p. 595, and note 6. The rights of the defendant are not impaired, and its liabilities are not affected, as a rule, by reason of the successive sales of the franchise. Hendrick v. Railroad Co. and Beattie v. Railroad Co., supra. For the reasons given, we think that the court below erred in instructing the jury that the plaintiffs' claim was barred by the lapse of time, and a new trial must therefore be awarded. New trial.

FAGG v. SOUTHERN BLDG. & LOAN ASS'N.

CONTRACTS—ACTION FOR BREACH—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. In an action against a loan association to recover, as damages for breach of contract, money paid to the association, the complaint is sufficient where it alleges that defendant's local agent promised verbally and by printed representations that a loan to plaintiff should be made by defendant if plaintiff would subscribe for stock in the association, pay $260 in advance and $20 for counsel fees, and furnish real estate security; that plaintiff complied with all such conditions of the association in applying for the loan; that defendant refused to make the loan, though it knew the loan was the only inducement for plaintiff to pay the money and to take the stock; and that plaintiff returned the stock, and demanded the return of the money paid, which was refused.

2. The complaint is sufficient without an allegation that the local agent had authority to make the contract for defendant, since it alleges "that defendant knew that the loan of the money was the only inducement to the payment of the money by plaintiff and to the taking of the stock."

3. An averment in an answer that defendant has no knowledge of the fourth paragraph of the complaint, and demands proof, is an insufficient denial of such paragraph.

4. Where the trial court made up the issues on the pleadings, and submitted them to the jury, without objection or the tender of other issues by defendant, the appellate court will presume that defendant was satisfied with the issues, and desired no others.

5. Defendant's exception that, "on all the evidence, plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict," cannot be considered on appeal where it was taken after verdict.

6. The first two issues submitted to the jury were respectively, "Did plaintiff enter into a contract with defendant for the sole purpose of borrowing money?" and "Did plaintiff become a member of defendant association?" The court charged the jury "that if, from the evidence, they found that plaintiff entered into a contract with defendant simply to borrow money, and did not become a member of the association, they would so find; otherwise, they would so find,—the burden being on plaintiff." Held, that the charge placed the burden of both issues on plaintiff, and was not objectionable.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Winston, Judge.

Action by J. O. Fagg against the Southern Building & Loan Association to recover, as damages for breach of contract, money paid to the association. Judgment entered on verdict for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff alleges: (1) That defendant is a corporation duly organized and doing business in North Carolina. (2) That on or about the — day of —, 1891, the plaintiff, being in need of money, applied to the local agent of the defendant for a loan of $5,000; that the said agent promised and agreed with the plaintiff, verbally and by printed representations furnished to the plaintiff by the company, that if the plaintiff would subscribe for 50 shares of stock in the defendant corporation, and pay in advance, the sum of $260, and certain counsel fees, amounting to $20, making in all $280, and would furnish real-estate security, as required by the corporation, the company would loan to the plaintiff said $5,000. (3) That plaintiff had no money to invest in stock in the company, but, relying on said representations and promise, paid the aforesaid sum, aggregating $280, and applied for the loan of the money, complying with all conditions of the corporation, and offering real-estate security; but the defendant corporation, in violation of its contract, refused to make such loan to plaintiff, although the defendant knew that the loan of money was the only inducement to the payment of the money by plaintiff and the taking of the stock. (4) That, after the refusal of the defendant to furnish the money as promised, plaintiff returned the stock to the company, and demanded the return of his money, which was refused. Plaintiff demands judgment for $280, with interest until paid, etc. The defendant, answering the complaint, says that the second paragraph of the complaint is not true; that the third paragraph is not true; that the defendant has no knowledge of the fourth, and demands proof. As a second defense, the defendants say that they have never promised to loan money to the plaintiff through their literature or printed representations, except what appears in such printed matter, and that the local agent has no authority to make contracts for this company other than appears in the prospectus containing contract and by-laws of the company, a copy of which is hereto attached, and made a part of this answer, marked "A," and copy of stock application, marked "B;" that the company has loaned thousands of dollars in the city, but always upon approved security and applications satisfactory to the board of directors of the company. Defendants demand judgment that the complaint be dismissed, and they recover their costs, etc. The following issues were submitted to the jury: "(1) Did the plaintiff enter into a contract with the defendant company for the sole purpose of borrowing money? Yes. (2) Did the plaintiff become a member of the defendant association? No. (3) What sum, if any, did the plaintiff pay the defendant under and by virtue of such contract? Two hundred and sixty-five dollars. (4) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what sum? Yes; the sum of two hundred and sixty-five dollars, with 6% interest from date of payment." From verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appealed.

Watson & Buxton, for appellant. J. S. Grogan, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. The first exception is in the nature of a demurrer ore tenus, on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and this objection may be taken for the first time in this court. Jackson v. Jackson, 105 N. C. 433, 11 S. E. 173. In examining this question, we can only look at the complaint itself, from which it appears that the plaintiff seeks to recover back money alleged to have been paid by him to the defendant upon an alleged contract made by plaintiff with the local agent of defendant, to the effect that, upon the subscribing by plaintiff for 50 shares of stock in defendant corporation, and the payment by plaintiff of the sum named, and the furnishing of real-estate security, as required by the said corporation, the defendant would loan the plaintiff the sum of $5,000. The complaint further alleges that plaintiff fully complied with his part of said contract, and that defendant failed and refused to loan the said sum of $5,000 to plaintiff, and that thereupon the plaintiff returned the stock to defendant, and demanded the repayment to him of the money so paid by him, and defendant refused to repay the same. Upon the foregoing facts, taken as true,—for they are admitted for the purposes of this exception,—it will appear that the plaintiff has stated a cause of action; for it is clear that upon this statement, if admitted, he would be entitled to recover the money paid by him as damages for the breach of contract by defendant.

It is not alleged, however, in the complaint, that the local agent had authority to make the contract for defendant. If it be contended that there is nothing to show that said agent had such authority, and therefore the defendant is not bound, still there is a cause of action stated, for the plaintiff would be entitled to relief, because it is alleged in the complaint "that the defendant knew that the loan of money was the only inducement to the payment of money by plaintiff and the taking of stock," the only meaning of which allegation is that the defendant knew of the inducement offered by its agent, and accepted the plaintiff's money with such knowledge. A bare statement of the proposition shows that the defendant would not be permitted at law or in equity to retain the money so paid by the plaintiff, and refuse to loan him the $5,000 upon sufficient security. Follette v. Association, 110 N. C. 377, 14 S. E. 923; Bergeron v. Banking Co., 111 N. C. 47, 15 S. E. 883. The case does not make out a voluntary payment, with a knowledge of all the facts, which could not be recovered back, but a payment in subscription to stock, upon a condition known to defendant when it accepted the payment. Adams v. Reeves, 68 N. C. 134. We are not incumbered upon this point with any questions which might arise if it appeared that this payment was made with notice to the plaintiff of any conditions of subscription which may appear in the prospectus or other notice of defendant, for we are now considering the case simply upon the complaint, and in this view we think it states a cause of action.

The second exception is that, upon all the evidence, the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict. The answer denies the allegations of the second and third articles of the complaint. We do not think that the fourth article, alleging the return of the stock and demand for the return of the money, has been sufficiently denied by the answer; for it is simply a denial of knowledge, and not of information sufficient to form a belief. Durden v. Simmons, 84 N. C. 555; Code, § 243. For a second defense, the defendants, in their answer, deny that they have ever promised to loan money to plaintiff, "through their literature or printed representations, except what appears in their printed matter," and they further deny the authority of their local agent to make contracts for this company other than appears in the prospectus, etc. The effect of this second defense is simply to deny the authority of their local agent to make the contract set out in the complaint. Upon these pleadings, which are copied in full, issues were made up by the court, and submitted to the jury. To these issues there was no objection on the part of defendant. There were no other issues tendered. We must presume, then, that defendant was satisfied with them, and desired no others. Clark's Code, p. 357, § 395. There were no objections to testimony, except the one objection stated in the third exception, to be considered hereafter, and no prayers for instructions. This exception, taken for the first time after verdict, cannot now be considered. The point ought to have been made in the court below, before the case was submitted to the jury. Taylor v. Steamship Co., 88 N. C. 15.

The third exception was to the exclusion of the question asked the plaintiff as to the value of his real estate. It was urged by defendant's counsel that this question and its answer were relevant, because the plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he had offered defendant ample security for the loan, and that this was denied in the answer. It will appear that no issue upon this allegation and denial was tendered by defendant, and, upon the issues submitted without objection, this testimony was not relevant.

We find another exception in the case, though not in the assignment of errors. His honor, among other things, charged the jury "that if, from the evidence, they found that the plaintiff entered into a contract with defendant simply to borrow money, and did not become a member of the company, they would so find; otherwise, they would so find,—the burden being on the plaintiff." "To this the defendant excepts." The meaning of this part of the instruction was that, upon the first and second issues, the burden was on the plaintiff, and we see no valid ground of objection to this charge, for the burden was on the plaintiff, not only upon those, but upon all of the issues. There is no error of which the defendant can complain. Affirmed.

STATE v. WINCHESTER.

CRIMINAL LAW—DIRECTION OF VERDICT—INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. It is error in a criminal cause to direct the rendition of a verdict of guilty.

2. Error cannot be predicated on the trying together of pleas of former conviction and not guilty, where no exception was taken to such course.

Appeal from superior court, Union county; Armfield, Judge.

v.188.E.no.15—42

W. R. Winchester was convicted of crime, and appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Redwine, for appellant. The Attorney General and Armistead Jones, for the State.

CLARK, J. The case on appeal states: "At the close of the testimony his honor instructed the jury that upon the testimony of the justice of the peace, Irby, there had been no former conviction, and upon the testimony of the defendant he was guilty, and directed a verdict to be rendered accordingly." If the evidence justified it, (as to which we need express no opinion,) it would have been proper for the court to have instructed the jury that if they believed the evidence of Irby, witness for defendant, they should find that there was no former conviction; and if they believed the defendant's own testimony he was guilty of the offense charged. State v. Vines, 93 N. C. 493, 498. But in directing a verdict the judge exceeded his powers in a criminal action. The jury must pass upon the credibility of the testimony offered. The subject has been so recently discussed in State v. Riley, 18 S. E. 168, (at this term,) that we need not repeat what is there said. Regularly, the two pleas of former conviction and not guilty should be tried separately, since the plea of former conviction "implies an admission of the criminal act, and is inconsistent with an absolute denial." State v. Pollard, 83 N. C. 597; State v. Respass, 85 N. C. 534. But the practice of trying them together has become not unusual, and is often convenient. There being no exception on that ground, this court must assume that this course was pursued with the assent of the defendant. But in directing a verdict there was error.

STATE v. BURTON.

BASTARDY—PUNISHMENT.

1. A father of a bastard child, who, in default of paying the fine and allowance to the mother, imposed by the court, has been committed to the county jail, as provided by Code, § 35, from which he has been discharged on taking the insolvent debtor's oath, as authorized by section 2967, cannot, at a subsequent term of court, be again sentenced to imprisonment, under section 38, which authorizes imprisonment for 12 months in the house of correction, in addition to the fine and allowance authorized by section 35.

2. The fact that the order for his first commitment in default of paying the fine and allowance was verbal, and that no record thereof was ever made, does not authorize his reimprisonment.

Appeal from superior court, Vance county; Shuford, Judge.

Proceeding by the state and Sally Henderson for the imprisonment of James M. Burton, who had been adjudged the father of Sally's bastard child. From a judgment sentencing him to imprisonment, he appeals. Reversed.

Burton had been adjudged the father of Sally's bastard child at the February term, 1893, of the district court, and sentenced to pay a fine and an allowance to the mother. On failure to comply with the order of the court aforesaid, he was committed to the common jail of Vance county, whence he was regularly discharged, by order of the clerk, March 13, 1893, under the provisions of Code, §§ 2967-2972. At the next term of the said superior court, (May term, 1893,) the solicitor for the state refusing to move in the matter, W. B. Shaw, Esq., who appeared on the trial of the proceeding at February term, 1893, with the solicitor, at the instance of the prosecutrix, on the affidavit set out in the record, moved the court for a capias against the defendant, which motion was allowed. The defendant being brought into court, the said W. B. Shaw, assuming to act for the state, moved the court that he be imprisoned, under section 38 of the Code. The defendant, by his counsel, insisted that, the solicitor having refused to act in the matter, the court could not, on motion of another than the solicitor, make any order for his imprisonment under said section 38. Thereupon his honor, Judge Shuford, stated that he would act on the matter of his own motion. The defendant then insisted that, having been committed to prison at the February term, 1893, in default of payment and compliance with the order and judgment of the court then rendered, he is not subject to be committed to prison in default of paying the same; that it is not competent for the court, of its own motion, or on the motion of another than the solicitor, and without the motion of the solicitor prosecuting on behalf of the state, to arrest or punish this defendant; that having been once imprisoned, and discharged according to law, he cannot now be resented or reimprisoned for the same offense; that, there being no house of correction in the county of Vance, the said section 38 is inoperative; that section 38 of the Code applies only before the commitment of defendant in default of complying with the judgment of the court, and not after his discharge from imprisonment, under section 2967; and moved for his discharge. His honor was of opinion against the defendant on all these questions, and held that, the record of the court at February term, 1893, showing no order for the commitment of the defendant for failing to comply with said judgment, he is subject to be imprisoned under section 38 of the Code, and pronounced the judgment accordingly.

T. T. Hicks, for appellant. The Attorney General and Pittman & Shaw, for the State.

AVERY, J. Upon conviction at the February term the court had the power to "sentence" the defendant either to prison, or, if the county authorities had established a house of correction, to hard labor therein, in addition to the judgment pronounced against him, which imposed the payment of the usual fine and allowance. This conclusion is inevitable if we construe the two sections (Code, §§ 35, 38)¹ relating to the judgment in bastardy cases together, and give effect to both, as a familiar rule of construction requires us to do. Instead of imposing the additional judgment of imprisonment in the county jail, however, the judge, on motion of the solicitor, ordered the sheriff to take the defendant into his custody for failure to comply with the first order, and so left him at the end of the term. During that term the sentence could have been modified, as its execution had not begun. 21 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1084. But no further steps were taken till the term held in May following. If there had been a house of correction in Vance county, the defendant would nevertheless have been entitled to his discharge upon filing his petition and taking the insolvent debtor's oath, if he had been ordered into custody till fine and costs should be paid. Code §§ 2968-2974; State v. Williams, 97 N. C. 414, 2 S. E. 370; State v. McNeely, 92 N. C. 829. But in our case the defendant, at the instance of the solicitor, "was placed in custody of the sheriff, by whom he was, on failure to comply with the order of the court, committed to the common jail of Vance county, whence he was regularly discharged by order of the clerk on March 13, 1893, under the provisions of Code, §§ 2967-2972."

We think that the order to the sheriff to take the defendant into his custody was by necessary implication an order to imprison upon failure to pay the fine and costs. The court was presumed to act within the purview of its power, and had no authority to place the defendant in custody, except for the purpose of compelling such payment. The sheriff so construed the order, and we do not think that in acting upon it he exceeded his authority, or made himself amenable for damages for false imprisonment. An order that a defendant be placed in custody of the sheriff is construed, according to the practice prevailing in all the courts, as a commitment till fine and costs are paid, or, with the sanction of the court, secured. When such is the order, the prisoner may be lawfully discharged either upon the payment of fine and costs or upon taking the prescribed oath. State v. Williams and State v. McNeely, supra. When it is admitted, as in this case, that a verbal order was given to the sheriff to take the defendant into custody, after it had been adjudged that he pay fine and costs, and that the sheriff took and held him till, upon petition, he was discharged in accordance with the provisions of the statute, (Code, §§ 2967-2972,) unquestionably it was the right of the prisoner to demand that a record of the order placing him in custody be entered upon the minutes. State v. Harrison, 104 N. C. 728, 10 S. E. 131; State v. Farrar, 104 N. C. 702, 10 S. E. 159. The persons entitled to be so released are specifically mentioned, and among them is "every putative father of a bastard committed for a failure to give bond or to pay any sum of money ordered to be paid for its maintenance." Section 2967 (1.) If there is room to doubt whether the language quoted includes the fine as well as the allowance for the maintenance of the child, the omission in the first is supplied by the provision of the second subsection, which extends the right of discharge to those committed for the "fine and costs of any criminal proceeding." We must concede that a comparison of the cases cited by counsel does not lead to a very clear understanding of what was meant when a bastardy proceeding was declared a civil action, but partaking somewhat of the nature of a criminal action. It is, however, manifest that the defendant may be committed to prison in default in paying the fine as well as the allowance, since the statute (Code, §§ 35, 38) plainly so provides; and it has been expressly held that the judgment for a fine and costs imposed by a court is not deemed a debt within the meaning of article 1, § 16, of the constitution. State v. Cannady, 78 N. C. 539. In that case the conclusion of the court rested upon the position that the constitution did not prohibit the enactment of a law, subjecting a prosecutor to imprisonment on failure to pay a judgment for costs. We think that upon the same principle the legislature had the power by the express provisions of a statute to make it the duty of the court to commit the putative father of a bastard on default in satisfying a judgment for fine, allowance, and costs.

² Section 2967 provides as follows: "The following persons may also be discharged from imprisonment upon complying with this chapter: (1) Every putative father of a bastard committed for a failure to give bond, or to pay any sum of money ordered to be paid for its maintenance. (2) Every person committed for the fine and costs of any criminal prosecution."

Speaking for myself only, however, I must say that I think the act of 1879, by imposing a fine, made the putative father indictable for a criminal misdemeanor, and also liable to imprisonment for nonpayment of the allowance. The manifest intention of the legislature, as evinced in the enactment of sections 35 and 38 of the Code, was that the proceedings against the putative father of a bastard should be "prosecuted by the state," like a "public offense," with a view to insuring the payment of fine and costs, and an allowance appropriated to the support of the child in order to indemnify the county. But while a bastardy proceeding is not prosecuted "for the enforcement or protection of an individual right" or "the redress or prosecution of a wrong," (Code, §§ 126, 127,) it was held by this court in State v. Pate, Busb. 244, that the statute in force before 1879 did not make it a criminal action, because a person "could not be put to answer any criminal charge but by indictment, presentment, or impeachment." Const. art. 1, § 12. Though prosecuted in the name of the state, it was declared that the "object of the suit was not to punish the defendant for an act done to the injury of the public, but to indemnify the county against liability for the support of a bastard child." State v. Pate, supra. The statute from 1741 to 1879 contained substantially the same provision, using precisely the same language as to the consequences of a finding against the putative father, viz. that he should "stand charged with the maintenance of the same [the child] as the county court shall order, and give security," etc. Act 1741, c. 30, (1 Potter's Revisal, p. 144, § 10; Hayw. Man. p. 446; Act 1814, cc. 870, 871, (2 Potter's Revisal, p. 304;) 1 Rev. St. c. 12, § 4; Rev. Code, c. 12, § 4; Battle's Revisal, c. 9, § 4. It was because of the marked distinction between a statute of that kind and one that imposed fine or imprisonment as a punishment that Judge Daniel drew the marked distinction between the proceeding in bastardy and the trial of a criminal action by a justice of the peace. State v. Carson, 2 Dev. & B. 370. "Before we quit the case," said the learned judge, "perhaps it may not be improper to remark that there is some difference of construction by the courts in cases of orders of justices in bastardy and convictions of justices under penal statutes and for petty offenses. Orders of justices in bastardy cases are police regulations, having for their object solely an indemnity of the county from money liabilities. They do not partake of the nature of criminal offenses. Therefore every intendment will be made to support an order of justices in bastardy. Convictions before justices are generally for petty offenses which partake of a criminal nature. Generally, the offenses are created and the jurisdiction to the justices is given by acts of the legislature. The court thus created, being an inferior one, and of a limited jurisdiction, proceeding not according to the course of the common law, it has been invariably the practice, in favor of liberty and law, for the superior courts of general superintending jurisdiction to hold these inferior courts to strict rules when they attempt to exercise a jurisdiction in any matter savoring of a criminal nature." When, however, the legislature passed the act of 1879, (chapter 92, § 2, Code, § 35,) providing that "when the issue of paternity shall be found against the putative father, or when he admits the paternity, he shall be fined by the justice not exceeding the sum of ten dollars, which shall go to the school fund of the county," like all other fines imposed on conviction in criminal prosecutions, it would seem that the obvious effect of the change in the law was to create a petty criminal misdemeanor, and to so limit the punishment as to make it cognizable before a justice of the peace. The constitution of 1868, and also the amended constitution of 1875, conferred this power on the legislature in plain terms, (article 1, § 13, and article 4, § 27;) while under the constitution of 1835 there was no exception to the rule that all criminal prosecutions must begin by indictment, presentment, or impeachment, (State v. Pate, supra.) The reasons given by Judge Pearson for declaring the old proceeding a civil one seem to have been fully met when we consider the effect of the later act construed in the light of the new provisions in the organic law. One of the objects of the law is to punish the offender by imposing a fine. The defendant can be lawfully convicted of a petty misdemeanor when the punishment cannot exceed a fine of $50 or imprisonment for one month, without the intervention of a grand jury, on the warrant of a justice of the peace in the nature of an indictment. Unless, therefore, we were to concede that the imposition of a fine, to be appropriated to the same purpose as all fines imposed on conviction upon indictments, is not a punishment, we are driven to the conclusion that the legislature, in the exercise of its power, created another petty misdemeanor by the act of 1879, attaching as an additional consequence of conviction the old police regulation for the indemnity of the county against the cost of supporting the child. It may be well, therefore, to determine what is the legal effect of imposing a fine. Says Lord Coke (1 Co. Litt. 126b): "Here a fine signifieth a pecuniary punishment for an offense or a contempt committed against the king." "A fine is a pecuniary punishment for an offense or a contempt committed, imposed by the judgment of a court." 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 991. "The ordinary punishment for misdemeanors is fine or imprisonment at the discretion of the court. * * * Where the statute commands an act of a public nature, and is silent as to the punishment, the common law provides fine or imprisonment." 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 940. The act, therefore, not only brings the warrant for bastardy within the definition given by the court in Pate's Case, but also within the statutory definition of "an action prosecuted by the state as a party, against a person charged with a public offense for the punishment thereof." Code, § 129. The parties to a warrant for bastardy are the state and the putative father, and if a fine of not exceeding $10 is a punishment, then the statute creates a criminal offense, which is the subject of a criminal action. The word "criminal" means "punishable by law, human or divine." Cent. Dict. Since other corporal punishments than hanging were forbidden by the constitution of 1868, the legislature can impose as a penalty for crime only fine or imprisonment in the common jail or in the state prison, or any two or all three of these punishments. "In criminal law, a fine is a sum of money ordered to be paid by an offender as a punishment for an offense. A fine at common law is one of the punishments for misdemeanor, and it has been made a punishment for many offenses by modern statutes." 1 Rap. & L. Law Dict. There can be no question as to the power of the legislature to make the begetting of a bastard child a misdemeanor, and to so limit the punishment as to make it cognizable before a justice of the peace, or to create a special court with concurrent jurisdiction of such petty misdemeanors, or the exclusive right to try higher offenses. State v. Powell, 97 N. C. 417, 1 S. E. 482. It is true that while the question of the construction to be given to the act of 1879 had never been raised until this appeal was argued on appeal, this court has obiter conceded that the proceeding was still civil in its character, without adverting to the fact that the act of 1741 had imposed a fine. See State v. Bryan, 83 N. C. 611; State v. Peeples, 108 N. C. 768, 13 S. E. 8; State v. Edwards, 110 N. C. 511, 14 S. E. 741. In none of these cases was the attention of the court directed to the act of 1879, and the alteration in the organic law since the older cases of State v. Carson and State v. Pate were decided. It is true that in State v. Crouse, 86 N. C. 617, an exception was taken on the ground that the proceeding was a criminal one, but we search in vain for an intimation that the attention of the court was called to the fact that the act of 1879 imposed a fine. It is evident that the justice (Ashe) who delivered the opinion was not advertent to that change, since he does not notice it, and says, what is not correct, that the only change made in the old law was "to leave it entirely to the option of the woman, as a general rule, whether she would institute proceedings against the father." Did the legislature intend to leave the allowance unaffected when the amount was limited to $50, and a fine was substituted instead of the additional sum that might have been previously exacted for the support of the child? I think not. But, however that may be, we think that we cannot classify a warrant charging a defendant with bastardy as a civil action, or a special proceeding, since he is subject to a fine imposed as a punishment. It does not follow that the rule of evidence which gives artificial effect to the examination of the woman is altered. The legislature has the power to make cases of this nature an exception to the general rule, and to make the examination of the woman presumptive evidence, just as it has made the fact of escape by one lawfully committed and charged with a crime prima facie evidence on an indictment against the sheriff or jailer. Code, § 32; State v. Rogers, 79 N. C. 609; State v. Bennett, 75 N. C. 305.

I have examined very carefully the decisions of other states of the Union upon this subject, and, while most of them have construed statutes of similar import to our act of 1741 (kept in force till 1879) as police regulations, as distinguished from criminal laws on the one hand, and, on the other hand, as not within the inhibition of the constitutional provision in reference to imprisonment for debt, adopted in all of the states, and expressed in almost the same words, we have failed to find a single act elsewhere which imposes a fine in addition to the allowance exacted for the support of the bastard and the indemnity bond. See 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 144, 145. If the sentence to pay a fine and costs was imposed upon conviction of a criminal offense, and the defendant had already taken the prescribed oath, he was not liable to arrest for failure to pay the fine. So it follows that he is now neither liable to imprisonment on account of the nonpayment of the fine to the state, which was imposed as a punishment, nor for default in the payment of the allowance exacted of him for the indemnity of the county. In either of the double aspects of the case, and in both, whether the proceeding be criminal or civil in its nature, the ruling of the court below was erroneous. The judgment is reversed, and the defendant is entitled to be discharged.

CLARK, J. I assent to that part of the opinion which is the opinion of the court, but dissent from the views of Mr. Justice Avery as to the nature of the action. The getting a bastard child is bad in morals, but I do not think the legislature ever intended to make it either a crime or an indictable offense. The statute is, in substance, such as it has always been, and which has uniformly been held a purely fiscal arrangement, or a police regulation, to prevent the child becoming a charge upon the county. The addition by the act of 1879 (Code, § 35) of a fine of "ten dollars, which shall go to the school fund of the county," is not sufficient to turn the matter into a crime. The imposition of the $10 is in furtherance of the main design of a fiscal provision, and rather in the nature of a tax to be contributed towards educating the children of the county. This is shown by the fact that it is placed at a definite, fixed sum, and not "not to exceed" a certain sum, or "in the discretion of the court," as is usual in prescribing a punishment for criminal offenses; also by the fact that in the numerous cases which have come to this court since 1879 the court has never held or intimated that the addition of these words had changed the action, heretofore always held to be a civil proceeding, into a criminal one. Owing to its peculiar nature,—the enforcement of a police regulation for fiscal purposes,—this action has some anomalous features. These have been recently pointed out, and the authorities reviewed, in State v. Edwards, 110 N. C. 511, 14 S. E. 741. In that case it is expressly noted that a fine is imposed. The court was not inadvertent to it. But it held, as had uniformly always been held, ever since the act of 1879, that it was a civil proceeding. State v. Peebles, 108 N. C. 768, 13 S. E. 8; State v. Wilkie, 85 N. C. 513; State v. Bryan, 83 N. C. 611,—all of which were since the act of 1879. Indeed, in State v. Crouse, 86 N. C. 617, the point was expressly taken that the act of 1879 (now Code, § 35) made the action a criminal one, and hence that no appeal lay. The court held that it was still a civil proceeding, and that the woman could appeal. Ashe, J., says that "the only alteration of the law with regard to bastardy effected by the act of 1879, and all that we think was intended to be effected," was that it was to become optional with the woman to institute proceedings, except where the child was likely to become a charge upon the county. If the intent of the act of 1879 was to make this a criminal proceeding, it is singular, to say the least, that the Code of 1883 should retain the provision in section 32 that "the affiant, the woman, or the defendant," may appeal; or that by the same section the examination of the woman should not only be competent to be read as evidence, but is presumptive evidence.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF BLADEN COUNTY v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF BLADEN COUNTY.

CAPITATION TAX—DIVISION FOR POOR AND EDUCATION—PENSIONS FOR VETERANS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Necessitous Confederate veterans and their widows are a portion of the poor, within the meaning of Const. art. 5, § 2, which requires the proceeds of state and county capitation taxes to be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor, but which prohibits more than 25 per cent. thereof to be appropriated to the latter purpose; and hence Laws 1891, c. 323, § 2, which imposes a capitation tax of 75 cents on every male person, and devotes 9 cents thereof (less than one-fourth) to the payment of pensions to indigent and disabled soldiers, is valid.

2. The 9 cents appropriated to the payment of pensions by the above act must be deducted by the county commissioners from the 25 per cent. of the total capitation tax appropriated by them to the support of the poor; and it is error for them to deduct 9 cents from each poll for pensions, and then devote one-fourth of the remainder to the support of the county poor, since this would leave less than three-fourths of the entire capitation tax for the purposes of education, in violation of the above constitutional provision.

3. County commissioners who, acting in good faith and in mistake of law, have directed a greater proportion than one-fourth of the capitation tax to be applied to the support of the poor, in violation of Const. art. 5, § 2, which appropriates three-fourths of such tax to the purposes of education, are not liable to the board of education for such misappropriation, either as individuals or as a corporation; and the only remedy of the board of education is by mandamus against the county treasurer, to compel the application of the unexpended portion of the school fund, so wrongfully diverted, to the purpose for which it was intended by the constitution.

Appeal from superior court, Bladen county; Winston, Judge.

Action by the board of education of Bladen county against the board of commissioners of Bladen county for the unauthorized diversion of taxes from educational purposes. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The complaint is as follows: "The plaintiffs complain, and allege (1) that the plaintiffs are a corporation created by the general laws of North Carolina, with power to sue and be sued; (2) that the defendants are a corporation created by the laws of North Carolina, with power to sue and be sued; (3) that the defendants did not require enough of the poll taxes which were levied to be appropriated and applied to the school fund of Bladen county for the years 1890, 1891, and 1892, the total levies on each poll for all purposes being $1.80, and of that amount only the sum of $1.26 was appropriated and applied to the said school fund, which amount so applied was less three-fourths of the amount levied; (4) that out of the amounts levied upon polls and realized from that source there was about five hundred and forty dollars applied to purposes other than the school fund in the county for the years aforesaid, which amounts ought to have been applied by the defendants to the school fund of Bladen county. Wherefore the plaintiffs demand judgment (1) for the sum of five hundred and forty dollars, and cost of this action; (2) that a writ of mandamus issue from this honorable court, commanding the defendants to apply the aforesaid sum already levied to the school fund of Bladen county, in accordance with law and the prayer of the plaintiff; (3) for such other relief as the plaintiffs have right to demand." The defendants, answering the complaint, say.

"(1) That the allegations contained in articles Nos. 1 and 2 are admitted. (2) That article 3 of the complaint is admitted, except that portion that alleges the defendants did not levy up to the constitutional limit in the year 1890, and that part of said complaint is denied. In further answer to said article No. 3, the defendants allege that, under the constitution, (article 5, § 2,) the defendants had the right to apply twenty-five per centum of the capitation tax to the support of the poor of the county. (3) That the allegations contained in article No. 4 are denied."

C. C. Lyon and Busbee & Busbee, for appellants.

AVERY, J. Under the provisions of section 2, c. 323, Laws 1891, a capitation tax of 75 cents was levied upon every male person not exempted as therein declared, to be devoted to the purposes of education and the support of the poor, as may be prescribed by law, not inconsistent with the apportionment established by section 2 of article 5 of the constitution of the state. This levy was made, as expressly stated, in contemplation of the statute (section 17, c. 198, Laws 1889) which devotes 9 cents of the proceeds arising from the tax on each poll, together with 3 cents of the 25 derived from the tax on every $100 in value of taxable property, to the payment of pensions of indigent and disabled soldiers, provided for in the same act. The county of Bladen supplemented the state capitation tax so as to make the aggregate $1.80 on every taxable poll, of which 9 cents on each head was paid over to the proper authorities of the state. Of the sum remaining to be appropriated under the orders of the defendants, $1.26 arising from each poll was paid over to the plaintiffs, and 45 cents per capita to the support of the poor. The plaintiffs contend that three-fourths of the aggregate capitation tax, or $1.35 of the $1.80 derived from each poll, was devoted by the constitution, to "the purposes of education," and should have been paid over to them; while the defendants insist that one-fourth of the whole levy on polls or 45 cents of each poll tax was properly expended for the support of the indigent in the county of Bladen.

The questions raised by the appeal depend upon the construction of section 2, art. 5, of the constitution, which is as follows: "The proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor, but in no one year shall more than twenty-five per cent. thereof be appropriated to the latter purpose." The application of the proportion of the capitation tax specified in the constitution to the support of the poor must be made necessarily under the direction of the legislature, whose exclusive right it is, in the exercise of the general police power, to determine and declare by whom and how the names of the indigent of the state who are entitled to assistance from the public, in order to their maintenance, shall be ascertained, and subject to the restrictions of the constitution from what fund and by whom allowances for their support shall be made. Counties are the creatures of the lawmaking department, and their powers may be enlarged, abridged, or withdrawn at the pleasure of the legislature, provided no right guaranteed by the organic law be infringed. Lilly v. Taylor, 88 N. C. 489; Commissioners of Dare Co. v. Commissioners of Currituck Co., 95 N. C. 189. If the legislature were not clothed with power to alter, amend, or repeal section 2, art. 7, the general supervision of the poor of the county would still be exercised only as may be prescribed by law. Another clause of the constitution (section 5, art. 11) enjoins upon the legislature the duty of making beneficent provision for the poor, the unfortunate, and orphans. The law which provides pensions for different classes of persons who were disabled during the war, and for certain widows, (Laws 1889, c. 198.) was therefore enacted, in the discharge of a legal as well as a moral obligation. As the unfortunate, blind, deaf and dumb, and insane, are cared for in different institutions, adapted in all their appointments to the wants of each class, so provision is made for the wounded and disabled soldiers, by aiding in furnishing a home, food, clothing, and medical attention to some, and by giving pecuniary aid to others, who are in charge of their relatives. The act under which 9 cents of the whole levy of 75 cents on each poll is devoted, with 3 cents of the levy on every $100 in value on property, to the payment of these yearly stipends, shows by its terms an intent to provide only for old soldiers who are poor as well as disabled, and for no widows except such as are indigent and unmarried. No person can become a beneficiary under the statute who owns, or has disposed of by gift to wife, child, children, or next of kin, or to any other person, since May 11, 1885, property worth more than $500. Section 2. The whole number of poor pensioners is divided into four classes, with a view to increasing the allowance according to the extent of the disability resulting from wounds. The legislature clearly has the power to delegate authority to the county officials to provide and care for one class of the indigent or unfortunate inhabitants of the state, and to disburse a part of the fund devoted by the constitution to the support of the poor by appropriating it more directly to another class, whose wants, in the opinion of the lawmakers, can be best supplied through public agencies of a different kind. As the levy of nine cents did not exceed one-fourth of the total state levy on the poll, the general assembly unquestionably had the right to appropriate it to this particular class of the indigent, and to provide by general or special legislation for the other poor, through the county commissioners of the various counties. In other words, a sum not exceeding one-fourth of the amount levied by the state upon the poll could, without violating the constitution, be appropriated, with a corresponding amount, upon the equation plan of the tax derived from property, to the support of indigent soldiers and poor widows of soldiers. But if there is no warrant in the organic law for the appropriation, except the authority given by section 2, art. 5, of the constitution, to expend 25 per cent. of the sum derived from the capitation tax for the support of the poor, it would follow that the amount of this fund applicable to the maintenance of other classes of indigent persons would be correspondingly diminished. The language of the constitution is plain and peremptory, and forbids the application of the fund arising from the tax on polls to any purposes other than to education and the support of the poor, or of any greater proportion for the maintenance of the poor than that prescribed in the instrument, until the levy reaches the limit of two dollars. So far this court, in construing the constitution, has given its affirmative sanction to a levy on the poll in excess of the limit of two dollars, made directly by legislative act, only where the tax is intended to suppress insurrection or repel invasion, or to meet payments due on the public debt of the state, or a debt created before the adoption of the constitution of 1868; while it has declared unconstitutional a levy by a county, even in pursuance of legislative authority, except for the payment of an ante-constitution debt, or by virtue of specific authority under section 6, art. 5, to levy a special tax. Board of Education of Bladen Co. v. Board of Com'rs, 111 N. C. 578, 16 S. E. 621; Barksdale v. Commissioners, 93 N. C. 472; Railroad Co. v. Holden, 63 N. C. 410. It is still an open question, however, whether the legislature has the power to exceed the usual limit in order to provide for the maintenance of public schools, as required by article 9, § 3, of the constitution. Board of Education of Bladen Co. v. Board of Com'rs, supra. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the legislature had no authority to impose a tax of nine cents on each poll, except as a levy for the maintenance of the poor, under article 5, § 2, but that no constitutional inhibition prohibited the appropriation of one-fourth of any state tax levied upon each head to the support of the poor of any or all classes. As the organic law, in unmistakable terms, devotes three-fourths of such levy to educational purposes, it follows that whatever portion of the capitation levy (not to exceed one-fourth) is directly appropriated by the legislature to any given class of the poor, to be disbursed by some agency other than the various boards of county commissioners, must be deducted by the county authorities

(if less than one-fourth) from the 25 per cent. of the capitation tax usually subject to appropriation by them for the support of the indigent, while three-fourths of the entire sum derived from that source must at all events be paid over to the educational board, who are constituted the custodians and disbursers of the school fund of the county.

We concur with the learned judge who tried the case below in the opinion that the legislature was warranted in making the levy of nine cents on the poll only upon the idea that necessitous veterans constituted a portion of the poor, within the contemplation of section 2, art. 5, of the constitution. But we think, in the absence of any express statute providing otherwise, the county authorities may ascertain the amount of the capitation tax that is subject to appropriation for the poor of the county by deducting the amount of the state levy for indigent soldiers from the one-fourth of the aggregate levy for state and county purposes, as they may then determine what proportion of the same fund is left to be devoted to educational purposes in the county by deducting from the three-fourths of the aggregate levy the amount devoted by the legislature to the state school fund, and paid over to the state treasurer. If it were a practical question, this would lead to some modification of the calculation adopted as the basis of the judgment rendered in the court below. But while there are urgent reasons for passing upon the question raised in this cause, especially as a guide to the auditor, who would otherwise be at a loss in giving the instructions which he is required to send out to the counties, the judgment of the court from which the defendants appeal, if treated as a final judgment, upon the idea that it leaves only a computation like that as to costs to be made, is nevertheless clearly erroneous. Judgment was demanded against the county commissioners of Bladen county for the sum of $540, the alleged amount of the tax for the years 1890, 1891, and 1892, which ought to have been applied for the maintenance of the public schools of that county, but which was applied to other purposes. It seems to us that there are several insurmountable objections to the rendition of such a judgment, or of a judgment that the plaintiffs recover a sum to be ascertained by a calculation on the basis of a given rate on each taxable poll of the county.

If the repeal of chapter 199 of the Laws of 1889, by chapter 166 of the Laws of 1893, restored the the Acts of 1885 and the provisions of the Code in reference to education which are not inconsistent with the last-named act, or if this proceeding be governed in any respect by the act of 1889, in any view of the question, it was the duty of the county treasurer, as treasurer of the county board of education, to collect from the sheriff "the whole amount levied (less such sum as may be allowed on account of insolvents for the current year) by both state and county for school purposes, (Code, § 2563,) and to receive and disburse all public school funds." True, section 2563 of the Code was so amended by the act of 1889 (section 28) as to provide that suit should be instituted "on relation" of the board of education of the county, instead of "on relation" of the county commissioners; but we fail to find any statute or any principle of law under which an action would lie against the county commissioners, either as individuals or as a corporation, for money belonging to the school fund, which was paid over by the treasurer on his general account, as treasurer of the county, for the support of the poor of the county. If they had in good faith mistaken the law, and ordered an improper division of the capitation tax between the county and the educational board, it is familiar learning that they would not thereby have incurred personal liability to the other board, because they would have been acting in a judicial capacity. Thomas v. Wilton, 40 Ohio St. 516; Boseker v. Board of Com'rs, 88 Ind. 267; People v. Stocking, 50 Barb. 573; Hill v. Charlotte, 72 N. C. 55. On the other hand, the county is not liable for a misapplication of a fund of which county commissioners direct the disbursement, under the general power delegated to them by section 753 of the Code, in good faith, but under a misapprehension of the law. Long v. Commissioners, 76 N. C. 273. If the plaintiff board is entitled to recover judgment against the defendant board, which has the general oversight of county government, it would follow that the courts would be required, if it should become necessary, to enforce the levy of a sufficient tax upon the property of the county to replace the amount belonging to the school fund, which has already been wrongfully, but honestly, expended for the support of the poor. The taxpayers of a county are under no legal obligation to submit to additional burdens, in order to repay sums belonging to one fund that may have been in good faith mingled with another fund, and diverted from the purpose for which it was intended. If, however, it had appeared that a part of the school fund had been transferred to the general fund of the county, and was still held by the county treasurer, subject to the orders of the defendant board, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to recover so much of the fund as was still unexpended, and to demand a writ of mandamus to compel the payment of such specific sum in order to its application to the purpose for which it was intended. But it would seem that all of the money collected for educational purposes should have been paid over by the sheriff to the county treasurer, in his capacity as treasurer of the board of education, and held by him subject to the orders of said board. Code, §§ 2554, 2563. The defendant board, as such, had no power over that fund, (unless it was its duty to prosecute a suit to compel its payment to him as a part of the county school fund,) and the treasurer was not bound to transfer it, on the order of the county commissioners, to the fund held by the county for general purposes; so that the misapplication of the of the fund was made by the treasurer of the board of education, and he is not a party to this action. He was required by law (Code, §§ 2558, 2559) to make the most minute reports of his receipts from all sources, and his expenditures for all purposes, to the plaintiff board. As silence on the subject might lead to the bringing of almost innumerable actions against county treasurers, we deem it proper to say further that, in our opinion, if the plaintiff board had brought the action against the treasurer in his capacity as the custodian and disbursing of its own funds, or upon his official bond, it would not have been entitled to recover. Liles v. Rogers, 18 S. E. 104, (at this term.) For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

ATTACHMENT AGAINST NONRESIDENT—VALIDITY—ORDER OF CONDEMNATION—WHO MAY ATTACK.

1. Where money due defendant is attached in the hands of the debtor, another person who claims the fund under an assignment from defendant, and asks the court for leave to contest the ownership with plaintiffs, which leave is refused, cannot, unless he excepts to such refusal, contest in the appellate court a subsequent judgment for plaintiffs.

2. An affidavit on which a warrant of attachment against a nonresident was issued was not defective because it did not allege that defendant "had property in this state." Branch v. Frank, 81 N. C. 180, followed.

3. Defendant cannot complain of a judgment condemning a fund attached to the payment of a debt due by him on the ground that he had transferred the fund before the attachment to another person.

4. A nonresident defendant, funds belonging to whom have been attached, cannot complain, after a judgment against him, of the order condemning such funds to the satisfaction of the debt.

Appeal from superior court, McDowell county; Boykin, Judge.

Action by Parks & Nichols against S. R. Adams. A warrant of attachment was issued, and a levy made on money in the hands of J. G. Neal, trustee. From a judgment condemning such fund to the payment of plaintiff's claim, said Adams appeals. Affirmed.

The warrant of attachment was issued in aid of the principal relief sought by the plaintiff, and a motion was made by the defendant before the clerk to vacate the same. One W. S. Dodd claimed the fund attached, and at the hearing of the said motion leave was granted by the clerk to the plaintiff and the defendant to file affidavits raising an issue of title to the fund. Before the jury were impaneled, the plaintiff moved the court to strike out the affidavit raising the issue of title to the fund, for that the defendant had not filed the bond provided for in section 331 of the Code, and the plaintiff's counsel stated in open court that he had given the claimant Dodd's attorney full notice that he should require him to file the bond before any issue as to the title should be submitted to the jury; and this was not denied. The attorney for the claimant insisted that the filing of the affidavit by the plaintiff was an implied waiver of the bond. His honor offered the claimant the privilege of filing the bond, which he refused to do, and thereupon his honor refused to allow the claimant, Dodd, to be made a party without bond for the purpose of trying a collateral issue of title. No exception was taken to the ruling of his honor. Verdict for the plaintiff. Defendant's counsel then insisted upon his appeal from the clerk's order refusing to dissolve the attachment, and asked that the judge should then hear the appeal. The court refused to vacate the warrant of attachment, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant excepted to so much of the judgment as provides that the money in the hands of J. G. Neal, trustee, belonging to S. R. Adams, be, and the same is hereby, condemned to be paid in satisfaction of the said debt, interest, and cost. Appeal by defendant and William S. Dodd.

BURWELL, J. An examination of this record shows very conclusively, we think, that neither of the appellants, Adams nor Dodd, have any cause to complain of the judgment they ask us to review. The defendant, a nonresident, appeared in the action, and filed an answer, denying the alleged indebtedness to the plaintiffs. The issue thus raised was tried, the court having acquired by his appearance and the filing of his answer jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter. A verdict was rendered, and a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant for the sum found by the jury to be due from him to them, and to none of this does the defendant object. It may be noted here that this is not one of those cases in which the jurisdiction of the court is dependent upon the fact that property of the nonresident defendant has been seized under process issuing in the action. In those cases, if it appear that the defendant's property has not in fact been levied on and taken, the very foundation of the court's jurisdiction has failed, and any judgment in the cause is, of course, a nullity. The contest here is not about the main action between the plaintiffs and the defendant, but solely about the regularity and effect of the ancillary proceeding of attachment, which the plaintiffs called to their aid.

The record states that there was an "appeal by defendant and William S. Dodd." The latter had asserted that the debt or fund alleged to be due to the defendant by one Neal, trustee, on which the plaintiffs claimed that they had acquired a lien by virtue of the levy of their warrant of attachment, was really due to him because of an assignment of it to him by the defendant; and he had asked the court to allow him in this action to contest with the plaintiffs for the ownership of this money or debt. The court refused to allow him so to do. He took no exception to that ruling. Thereafter he was out of the case. His rights, if he has any, to this fund are not affected by the judgment, and he has no standing as a party to the cause, and none as an appellant here. It may have behooved the debtor, Neal, trustee, in whose hands was the attached fund or debt, to have it well settled, in the face of the conflicting claims of the plaintiffs and of Dodd, to whom he should pay the money. But he, for good reasons, no doubt, neither asked for the protection of such a judicial determination nor does he appeal from the judgment which we are here called upon to review. Thus the defendant Adams is left to be the sole appellant in this cause. He alone objects to the judgment, and to the ruling of his honor. He insists that the affidavit upon which the warrant of attachment was issued was defective, in that it did not allege that the defendant "had property in this state." The case of Windley v. Bradway, 77 N. C. 333, sustains him in this, but the inadvertence of the court in its ruling there is corrected in Branch v. Frank, 81 N. C. 180, where the provisions of the Code in this regard are fully and correctly set out. The point, therefore, was not well taken. The judgment, after declaring that the plaintiffs recover of the defendant Adams the amount found due by the verdict, provides "that the money in the hands of J. G. Neal, trustee, belonging to said S. R. Adams, be, and the same is hereby, condemned to be paid in satisfaction of said debt, interest, and costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk;" and the exception is to this proviso alone, and comes, as we have said, from the defendant Adams alone. Neal, trustee, is content. Now, if this exception of the defendant is founded upon the hypothesis that this fund or debt, because of his transfer of it to Dodd, does not belong to him, (the defendant,) and did not belong to him when the warrant was legally levied upon it, then we have, as it seems to us, an exception on the nonresident defendant's part, because another man's property is to be applied to the satisfaction of his indebtedness to plaintiffs. The rights of the defendant's transferee, who is no party to this judgment, and is not bound thereby, may well be left, as they must be, to his own care. And if the exception is founded upon the hypothesis that this fund or debt does still belong to him in spite of his alleged transfer to Dodd, (which the defendant insists was made by him bona fide, and before the attachment of plaintiffs' lien,) then it would seem that after a verdict in plaintiffs' favor, establishing their right to recover, the court having jurisdiction by appearance of the defendant, it did not lie in his mouth to raise objections to the manner in which the officer who was charged with the execution of the warrant of attachment had performed his duty. He owes the plaintiffs. Upon this theory, Neal, trustee, owes him. The latter does not complain of the order which directs him to apply what he owes to or holds for the defendant to the satisfaction of plaintiffs' judgment. It is for him, not the defendant, to be careful that the sheriff's receipt for this fund shall be a valid acquittance to him from all claimants, including the defendant; and as to him the provision of Code, § 489, furnishes an easily secured and safe protection, independent of any reliance upon the attachment proceedings. We purposely omit to express any opinion as to the effect of the alleged levies of the warrants of attachment to create liens in plaintiffs' favor on the debt or fund, for those are matters that may affect the rights of the defendant's transferee, Dodd, and they do not in any way concern the rights of the defendant. It would serve no good purpose to discuss them here. Affirmed.

HOMESTEAD — REVERSIONARY INTEREST—ATTAINMENT OF MAJORITY BY HOMESTEADER'S CHILDREN—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where, in an action by a judgment creditor to recover his reversionary interest in the homestead of the deceased judgment debtor, it appears that the debtor had children, and it is not shown that they had attained their majority at the institution of the action, a nonsuit was properly entered.

2. A judgment creditor, who does not appeal to the United States supreme court from an erroneous decision of a state court that the homestead provisions of the state constitution operated retroactively, is estopped from denying the validity of the allotment of a homestead made in accordance with the state decision, though the United States supreme court in a similar case has overruled the state court.

Appeal from superior court, Wilkes county; Boykin, Judge.

Ejectment by Aaron Ladd against L. C. Byrd and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Holton and Watson & Buxton, for appellant.

AVERY, J. Prior to the passage of the act of 1870, when the reversionary interest could still be sold under execution, the judgment creditor might, at his option, recognize the claim of the debtor to a homestead by exposing to sale only such reversionary interest, without affecting the validity of the sale, or in any way impairing the right of the purchaser to the possession of the land on the expiration of the prescribed period of exemption. Long v. Walker, 105 N. C. 108, 10 S. E. 858; Wyche v. Wyche, 85 N. C. 96; Barrett v. Richardson, 76 N. C. 423. When made expressly "subject to the homestead" it was held that the sale was valid, and "passed the reversionary interest only." In such cases it is clear that those holding under and enjoying the right of exemption, and their assignees, are in privity with a purchaser whose right to the possession is postponed by the clemency of the execution creditor; and their possession in no event becomes adverse to his claim till his right of entry and of action accrues on the termination of the exemption. Corpening v. Kincaid, 82 N. C. 202; Lowdermilk v. Corpening, 92 N. C. 333. The same principle prevails as that which governs in the case of life tenants and remainder-men or reversioners; the statute does not run until the new claimant can maintain an action for the possession, and fails to bring it. Melvin v. Waddell, 75 N. C. 361; Staton v. Mullis, 92 N. C. 623; Avent v. Arrington, 105 N. C. 377, 10 S. E. 991. But in the case at bar it seems that the present plaintiff, Ladd, recovered a judgment against one Adams on an old debt, and at a sale under execution thereon on the 2d day of August, 1868, made without allotting a homestead to the debtor, became the purchaser, and took the plaintiff's deed for the land. When, however, the plaintiff attempted to enforce his right by an action for possession, it was decided that Adams, the debtor under whom the present defendants claim as heirs at law, was entitled to a homestead in the land, (Ladd v. Adams, 66 N. C. 164,) and the plaintiff was forced to submit to judgment of nonsuit in accordance with the view which then received the sanction of this court, that the homestead provisions of the constitution operated retroactively. Notwithstanding the fact that the decision of the supreme court of the United States, subsequently rendered, led to the overruling of that doctrine, Adams, having had his homestead previously allotted so as to embrace the whole tract of land in controversy, continued to occupy it till his death, in 1889, and since his death the defendants have held possession, claiming as heirs at law of Adams. We think that the judgment in the former action is conclusive upon both parties to the extent only that the plaintiff (having failed to raise the federal question by appeal to the supreme court of the United States) was precluded from demanding the possession till the falling in of the exemption, while the defendant, and those claiming under him, were estopped from denying, as against the plaintiff and those claiming under him, that they occupied the land in dispute as a homestead, and not in the assertion of a title adverse to that of the plaintiff, so long as the homestead right subsisted. The creditor, though he acquired a good title under the sale, has recognized, by his inaction, the validity of the allotment of the homestead; and is in no worse plight than if he had not proceeded to sell until Adams died in 1889. If the sale had not been made until that time, a good title would have passed, as has been expressly held by this court. Cobb v. Haliburton, 92 N. C. 652. It would therefore be strangely inconsistent with the doctrine laid down in the cases cited that the creditor, who sold subject to the homestead when not bound to do so, or who calmly awaited without action the termination of the exemption and thereby recognized its validity, was not barred when the right expired, if we should hold that another creditor, who did not sleep upon his rights, but was compelled to acquiesce in the ruling of the highest court in the state, is either concluded by the adjudication that the defendant was entitled to his homestead, or is barred by the lapse of time during the occupancy under the claim of exemption. The judgment of nonsuit was affirmed solely upon the ground that the homestead was valid, not because the reversionary interest could not be subjected for the debt. The sale was valid, and unquestionably a good title passed to plaintiff by virtue of the sheriff's deed. Long v. Walker, supra. Actions for possession are conclusive as to title only where an issue involving the title is raised and passed upon by the jury. Allen v. Salinger, 103 N. C. 14, 8 S. E. 913. Therefore the judgment in the former proceeding binds both parties as to the validity of the allotment of the homestead to Adams, and no further. Cobb v. Haliburton, supra. Although the ruling of this court in Ladd v. Adams, supra, is admitted now to have been erroneous, those who claim under and in privity with Adams will not be heard, after his enjoyment of the benefits of the exemption to which the court declared him entitled up to the time of his death, to claim all of the advantages of an adverse holding during an occupancy which was protected by the courts as lawful only upon the idea that it was not adverse to the claims of creditors. But it did not appear as a fact whether the homesteader, Adams, left surviving him any minor children, or whether he left a widow. The action for possession cannot be maintained while one of the children of Adams is still a minor. Cobb v. Haliburton, supra. The homestead right, having been shown to exist, is presumed to continue, and the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that it had terminated. The burden is always upon the remainder-man, whose estate is expectant upon the determination of a life estate, to show that his right of action had accrued by the termination of the particular estate when suit was brought. Lewis v. Mobley, 4 Dev. & B. 323. The plaintiff must show title good against the world; and after it appeared that Adams was entitled to a homestead, and had it allotted to him, and the plaintiff acquiesced in the adjudication in his favor, and it appeared that there were children of Adams surviving him, it became thereupon incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the exemption had terminated, or the attainment of the age of 21 by the youngest of such children. Holman, a witness, married Martha, a daughter of Jesse Adams, (we know not when, but since the death of Adams, the homesteader, in 1889, said Holman and his wife have been in possession.) Another witness had testified that in 1869 Adams and his wife and daughter were living with him on the land. It does not appear whether her name was Martha, or whether she was a daughter by the same or a different marriage. There is no testimony tending to show her to be the same person as Martha, who married Holman, and first appears upon the scene as an occupant of the land since 1889. If it had appeared that Martha was the only surviving child at the death of Adams, we could not even then have jumped to the conclusion that she was the same daughter who was with her mother in 1869, nor could we conclude because she was married in 1889 that she had necessarily attained her majority (on the 7th of February, 1890) when this action was brought. The general rule is that a party whose right depends upon the death of another must either show by direct proof that such person is dead, or raise the presumption that he is dead by proving that he has not been heard of in seven years. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 41. We think in the same way that, while the burden is on a plaintiff who sues, as remainderman, to offer evidence that will at least raise a presumption of the death of the life tenant, so one who sues for the reversionary interest in a homestead must, when it appears that the homesteader has a child or children, offer testimony, not only to prove that the homesteader is dead, but that the exemption has terminated by reason of the age of the child. Besides the evidence in relation to Martha, the judge who tried the case below seemed to rest his ruling in part upon the ground that "there was no evidence whether the children of said Adams are yet minors." From this statement we might reasonably infer that there was evidence of the existence of other children besides Martha, though the testimony as to her was sufficient to shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff. We see no force in the suggestion of inconvenience likely to arise as to families moving out of the state, when we recollect that any person not heard of for seven years is presumed to be dead. There can be no great hardship in holding a plaintiff to the duty of complying with that rule. While, therefore, the court erred if we are to understand his honor as holding that the possession of the defendants was adverse to the plaintiff, it was not error to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover, because the action appeared to have been prematurely brought. The judgment is affirmed.

PRITCHARD v. BAILEY.

DEED—CONSTRUCTION — RESTRAINT OF POWER OF ALIENATION.

1. Though a deed to a person and her heirs and assigns forever provides that the land is "not to be sold during her life, then to belong to her heirs," she takes a fee simple, the later provision being void, as repugnant to the estate granted.

2. The provision is void for the further reason that it imposes an unreasonable restraint on the power of alienation, and is against public policy.

3. Where husband and wife join in a deed of trust in fee of the wife's land to secure their joint indebtedness, the trustee takes a fee simple, though the deed recites that the wife's joinder is only for the purpose of releasing her dower and homestead, the draughtsman having neglected to strike this clause from the printed form; since, as there is no dower or homestead right if such clause is to control, there is nothing upon which the deed can operate.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; J. F. Graves, Judge.

Action by J. C. Pritchard against J. M. Bailey for purchase money due for land sold by plaintiff as trustee under a deed of trust from S. D. Chambers and Sarah M. Chambers, his wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The land in question, before execution of the deed of trust, had been conveyed by one Daniel Payne to said Sarah M. Chambers by a deed providing as follows: "To have and to hold the aforesaid tract, and all the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, to the said Sarah M. Chambers and heirs and assigns, forever, to her only use and behoof, not to be sold during the life of said Sarah M. Chambers; then to belong to her heirs."

Chas. A. Webb, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The deed from Daniel Payne to Sarah M. Chambers, executed in 1882, conferred upon her an estate in fee simple; and under the doctrine declared in Hardy v. Galloway, 111 N. C. 519, 15 S. E. 890, and the authorities therein cited, the provision that she should not sell the property during her life was repugnant to the grant, and in contravention of the principle of public policy which forbids the imposition of unreasonable restrictions upon the right of alienation. The property, not having been conveyed in trust, but directly to

Mrs. Chambers, she acquired the legal title; and, as she had the legal capacity to convey with the consent of her husband, the only question remaining to be considered is whether the deed from herself and husband did actually convey to the trustee a fee-simple estate in the land in controversy. The indebtedness secured in said trust was, so far as we are informed, the joint indebtedness of herself and husband, and the recital shows that the sole object of the conveyance was to secure the payment of the same. The conveyance is in fee, with a warranty that the parties of the first part are seised in fee; and the trustee is directed, in case of default, to sell the land at public auction, and convey title to the purchaser, the surplus, after paying the indebtedness and expenses, to be paid to the parties of the first part. The husband having no title to the property, it is manifest that not only the whole purpose of the deed, but also its operative words, will be entirely defeated if the joinder of Mrs. Chambers was simply for the purpose of releasing the right of dower and homestead in the land. It is a cardinal rule in the interpretation of writings that they shall, if possible, be so interpreted "ut res magis valeat quam pereat," so that they shall have some effect rather than none, and that such a meaning shall be given to them as may carry out and most fully effectuate the intention of the parties. Broom, Leg. Max. 413. Every part of the instrument must be considered in arriving at the intention, and it should be kept in mind that where the language is susceptible of two constructions the one less favorable to the grantor is to be adopted. It is also a well-settled principle that, unless a contrary intent is manifest, "a deed must be construed in all its parts with respect to the actual, rightful state of the property at the time at which the deed is executed." 2 Devl. Deeds, 848-851. Applying these rules to the case before us, we are entirely satisfied that Mrs. Chambers intended to convey her interest in the said land. It was her property, and the printed words, (which it is agreed the draughtsman neglected to strike out of the form,) to the effect that she joined in the deed for the purpose of releasing her dower and homestead, when she could by no possibility have had any such interests, are wholly inconsistent with her intention, as indicated by the entire scope and meaning of the instrument. As we have said, she alone had the title, and she joined in the deed as a conveying party for the declared purpose of securing the indebtedness. There was no dower or homestead interest to be released, and, if the printed words are to control, there is nothing upon which the deed can operate. We think his honor was correct in holding that the true intent and meaning of the deed was that Mrs. Chambers conveyed the property in fee to the trustee. Affirmed.

CRINKLEY et al. v. EGERTON et al.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—WHAT CONSTITUTES RELATION—REVIEW—LIEN FOR RENT.

1. A contract for a term of years, at a stipulated rental per year, providing that "all crops that may be made on the said tract of land are bound for said rent," is a lease, even though it contains a provision that, upon the payment of a certain amount of rent, the lease was to terminate, and the lessor was to make the lessee a deed in fee of the land.

2. Under such lease, the landlord retained the statutory lien for rent, superior to agricultural liens for advances. Shepherd, C. J., and Burwell, J., dissenting.

3. Where no exception was taken that a lease, under which plaintiff claimed title to certain crops by virtue of a landlord's lien, was not recorded, an objection to the want of recordation will not avail on appeal.

Appeal from superior court, Warren county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Action by A. and W. B. Crinkley against B. I. Egerton and another for the proceeds of certain crops. From a judgment for plaintiffs for only part of the relief demanded by them, they appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs claim the proceeds of certain crops, and the only question involved is the construction of a contract, a copy of which is as follows: "Contract made December 30, 1887, by and between B. I. Egerton, of Macon, Warren county, N. C., of the first part, and Major Williams, (a colored man,) of Warren county, N. C., of the second part, witnesseth, that said B. I. Egerton has leased to the said Major Williams, for a term of ten years, (beginning from this day,) his tract of land lying in Warren county, N. C., known as the 'William and John Powell Tract,' adjoining the lands of S. P. Arrington, Mrs. Emma Egerton's heirs, and others, and containing sixty-six acres; the said Major Williams to pay the said B. I. Egerton, on or before November 1 of each year, beginning November 1, 1888, and continuing to the termination of the lease, three bales cotton, (lint,) to weigh each 400 pounds, making a total of 1,200 pounds lint cotton, to be paid as rent for each of the ten years. The said B. I. Egerton agrees to and with the said Major Williams, and as an inducement for the said Williams to pay the rent promptly each year as it matures, that whenever he has been paid as much as six hundred dollars, ($600,) with interest on the same from this day at eight per cent., as rent on the said tract of land, that this lease is to terminate, and that he will make to the said Major Williams a good and sufficient deed in fee simple to the said tract of sixty-six acres of land; but the said Major Williams shall lose the above option if he fails to pay the said B. I. Egerton the rent of 1,200 pounds lint cotton each year. In order to ascertain when the said $600 and interest has been paid, the said B. I. Egerton is to keep a correct account of all rents paid to him by the said Williams. This paper writing is to be considered as a rent bond, and all crops that may be made on the said tract of land are bound for the said rent of 1,200 pounds lint cotton, as in cases of other agreements for rent between landlords and tenants. In witness whereof, the said B. I. Egerton and Major Williams have hereunto affixed their seals, this December 30, 1887. [Signed] B. I. Egerton. [Seal.] [Signed] Major X Williams. [Seal.] Witness: [Signed] W. G. Egerton." The plaintiffs contended that the above instrument created the relation of vendor and vendee between the defendant and Williams, but the court held that it created the relation of landlord and tenant between them, and the plaintiffs excepted, and appealed from the judgment rendered.

T. T. Hicks, for appellants. Batchelor & Devereux, for appellees.

CLARK, J. The instrument is in all respects a valid lease of land for 10 years at a stipulated rent of 1,200 pounds of lint cotton per year, but upon condition that on payment of rent to the value of $600 and interest, and as an inducement to the prompt and punctual payment of the rent, the lessor will thereupon make a conveyance in fee to the lessee of the land. There is nothing in morals or in law which prohibits or restricts the power of contracting so as to render this valid as a lease until, upon performance of the condition, it shall become a sale; and, being a valid lease, the landlord retains his statutory lien on the crop for the rents. There is naught which shows an intention of the parties to release it. On the contrary, there is an explicit agreement that "all crops that may be made on said tract of land are bound for said rent of 1,200 pounds lint cotton, as in other agreements between landlord and tenant." The intent to retain the landlord's lien was a moving inducement to this form of contract, which the parties had a legal right to enter into. It is true that in Manufacturing Co. v. Lucas, 112 N. C. 377, 17 S. E. 174, the court held that, as between the parties, if the lessor attempted, after sundry payments made, to declare them forfeited, and to retake possession of the property, the court would in equity, in such case, hold the contract a mortgage, and direct an accounting and sale as on a foreclosure; and so it would here, as to this land, should the landlord attempt to resume possession of it. But it was not held in Manufacturing Co. v. Lucas, supra, that the lessor could not elect to let the lease remain in force, and collect the installments of rent by suit. Indeed, it approves Foreman v. Drake, 98 N. C. 311, 3 S. E. 842, which had held a contract, somewhat like the present, a contract of hiring, and not a conditional sale. Nor here is there anything to prohibit the lessor electing to permit the lease to remain in force, and collect his installments out of the crops by virtue of his landlord's lien. In both cases it is only when the lessor elects to put an end to the contract of lease, and resumes possession of the property, that a court of equity will hold him to an account and settlement, as upon a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage. Of course, an assignee of the lessee, either by purchase from him or by purchase at execution sale, would have the same right as the lessee to call for an accounting. A person may so use his own property as not to injure or infringe upon the rights of others, which society undertakes to protect. Upon this principle, one has the right and the power to dispose of his property, when and how he may elect, if the law, for sufficient reason, has not declared the contract illegal, immoral, or contrary to public policy, and therefore void. Neither does any express provision of a statute, nor any reason founded upon public policy, prohibit the fair surrender of a contract of a purchase by a vendee, and a voluntary change of his position to that of lessee, without even a surrender of the possession. Taylor v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 27, 16 S. E. 924. Why should the converse of this proposition be hedged about with any restrictions except those which are plainly intended to prevent inequitable oppression, such as may ensue where the lessee is not allowed to retain possession until the time for the performance of the condition arrives? This view is in consonance with the real intent of the parties and especially reasonable, since, mortgages on crops of future years being invalid, (Loftin v. Hines, 107 N. C. 360, 12 S. E. 197, the owner of land would not sell it on credit if he must part with all liens upon the crop. This lien, being only for rent, does not come under the evil of a mortgage for the whole crop of future years, which is denounced by Loftin v. Hines, supra. This case also differs from Manufacturing Co. v. Lucas, supra, in that there were, in that case, no rents or crops issuing out of the leased property upon which the lessor possessed a lien by virtue of the statute. While the court, with some hesitation, held, in Loftin v. Hines, that a mortgage upon the crops of future years was invalid for the reason there given, there is nothing in that decision which restricts the freedom of contracts, so that a vendor of land who takes a mortgage on the land to secure the price may not stipulate that, until the mortgage is paid, the relation of the parties shall be landlord and tenant, to the extent that the landlord shall have his lien for the rent to be applied on the debt. This is because the mortgagee of the land, having the right of possession, may stipulate that the mortgagor may keep possession only on rendering rent. There is nothing oppressive in this when the rent is applied on the debt. This gives only a landlord's lien for rent, and not a mortgage on the whole crop, which is forbidden in Loflin v. Hines, in return for yielding possession. Such contracts are very common, and serve a most useful purpose. The court, in the absence of oppression or grave reasons of public policy, cannot interfere with the freedom of all persons to make their own contracts. State v. Moore, 18 S. E. 342, (at this term.) The cases of McCombs v. Wallace, 66 N. C. 481; Parker v. Allen, 84 N. C. 466; Hughes v. Mason, 84 N. C. 472; and Killebrew v. Hines, 104 N. C. 182, 10 S. E. 159, 251,—relied upon by plaintiffs, are the reverse of this, and have no application. Those cases were contracts of bargain and sale of land, with a provision that, in case of a failure by vendee, for a specified time, to comply with the terms of sale, the contract should be void, and the vendee should pay rent or a forfeit. The court, of course, held these to be contracts of sale, and, as to the first three cases, held that, there being a dispute as to the forfeiture, the superior court had jurisdiction. There being an equity, the justice of the peace could not administer it, and summary ejectment would not lie. As to the last case, it was held that the mortgagor could not, upon default made, oust the lien upon the crop given to another by mortgagee for advances while that relation existed. There was no stipulation in that case, as there is in this, reserving a landlord's lien for rent ab initio, and to elect to assert it after default made was unjust to the party who had made advances. These were cases of sales with a power to resume possession upon default made. Such have always been decreed mortgages; but until the vendor elects to move, they are deeds of bargain and sale, and the bargainor has no lien upon the crop. While in them it was held that, there being an equity in the lessor, the justice of the peace could not summarily eject under Code, § 1768, it was not held that the parties could not, by their contract, reserve the landlord's lien for rent under section 1754. Taylor v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 27, is equally inapplicable. It merely holds that when the relation of the parties is simply that of vendor and vendee or mortgagor and mortgagee, there is no landlord's lien for rent under section 1754, because there is "no agreement" reserving rent or creating the relation of landlord and tenant. In the present case we have the relation of lessor and lessee established by the express contract of the parties. They had a right to so contract. Until the lessor attempts to retake possession, that relation continues. The lessor, by virtue of the nature of his agreement and its express terms, retains the statutory lien upon the crops. The record does not show whether or not the contract between Egerton and Williams was shown to have been recorded. There being no exception, it is presumed to have been in evidence. Even if registration were not shown, in the absence of exception, the presumption of fact is to be taken most favorable to the appellee. Such exception could not be taken for the first time in this court, and, in fact, was not made either here or below. His honor correctly charged the jury that the instrument created the relation of landlord and tenant between Egerton and Williams, and that by virtue thereof Egerton had a lien on the crop for rent and advances out of the crop of 1891 superior to the agricultural liens held by the plaintiffs. Code, § 1754.¹ No error.

BURWELL, J., (dissenting.) It is conceded that the crop which the plaintiffs seek to recover of the defendant was grown by one Williams upon land of which he was in possession. The plaintiffs claimed the property by virtue of duly-registered mortgages thereon made to them by Williams for advancements of supplies. The validity of plaintiffs' liens was admitted, but defendant alleged that his statutory lien for rent (Code, § 1754) was superior to those of the plaintiffs, because Williams was his tenant. To prove that Williams was his tenant, and also the amount due for rent, he introduced the contract between himself and Williams, under which the latter held the land when the crop was grown, and when plaintiffs' mortgages or liens were made. He did not show that it was registered at all. It seems to be decided by the court that that contract created between the defendant Egerton and Williams the relation of vendor and vendee, or, at any rate, that it vested in Williams an equity or right to call for a title when he had fulfilled his part of that contract. The rule of interpretation laid down with so much emphasis in the late case of Manufacturing Co. v. Lucas, 112 N. C. 377, 17 S. E. 174, makes any other conclusion impossible, if that decision is to stand as an authority to guide us. Hence the relation of Egerton to Williams was not only that of landlord and tenant, but also that of vendor and vendee.

In McCombs v. Wallace, 66 N. C. 481; McMillan v. Love, 72 N. C. 18; Parker v. Allen, 84 N. C. 466; and Hughes v. Mason, Id. 472.—it was decided that section 1766 of the Code has no application to cases where the relation of vendor and vendee exists, although for some purposes the latter may also be a tenant in contemplation of law. Those decisions are founded upon the idea that, if the tenant has an equity in the land, that section has no application,—that he is not a tenant, and his vendor is not a landlord, within the meaning of that section. Now, in Taylor v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 27, 16 S. E. 924, we decided that whenever the relation of the so-called "landlord and tenant" was such, by the terms of their contract, that, under the rule laid down in the cases cited above, (which we there referred to,) section 1766 had no application to any controversy about the possession, neither could section 1754 apply to any controversy about the rent. In other words, we distinctly affirm in Taylor v. Taylor, supra, that, if such a relation existed as would prevent the recovery of the land under section 1766, the owner or "landlord" or "vender," call him what we may, could have no statutory lien for so-called "rent" under section 1754. Upon careful consideration of these authorities, (Taylor v. Taylor, Manufacturing Co. v. Lucas, and McCombs v. Wallace, supra,) I cannot see how it is possible to escape the conclusion that the defendant has no statutory lien, under section 1754, on the crop in controversy. He neither asserted, nor attempted to prove, any other right to hold it. If it be contended that, though the defendant had no right to take and hold the crop by virtue of a lien under section 1754, the contract itself gave him a right to so take and hold it, the reply is that, if he proposed to establish a right arising out of that instrument which would be better than plaintiffs' title, it was incumbent on him to prove, not only the existence of this contract, but that it was registered before plaintiff's mortgages. Between Egerton and Williams, the so-called "lease" was valid without registration, but, considered as a lien on the crops of successive years in favor of the former, it could have no validity against the plaintiffs, who also claimed under Williams, unless it was registered before plaintiffs' mortgages. It was the duty of the defendant to prove that the contract was registered, if he wished to assert title under it as a lien or mortgage. The interjection of the relation of landlord and tenant, with its statutory lien and peculiar legal remedies, into the relation of vendor and vendee, is such a blending of inconsistent principles that it is open to the objection of Lord Brougham as being "against the science of the law," and will, I greatly fear, lead to much confusion and uncertainty, both in the law as well as its administration. I think it better to adhere to well-defined principles.

¹ Code, § 1754, provides that "when lands shall be rented or leased by agreement for agricultural purposes, unless otherwise agreed between the parties to the lease or agreement, any and all crops raised on said lands shall be deemed and held to be vested in possession of the lessor until the rents for said lands shall be paid * * * and that this lien shall be preferred to all other liens."

SHEPHERD, C. J. I concur in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice BURWELL.

WILLIAMS et al. v. JUSTICE et al.

REFERENCE TO ARBITRATOR—ADMITTING NEW PARTIES.

Where an arbitrator, to whom a cause has been submitted under a rule of court, admits new parties at the request of one of the defendants, and against the objection of the others, his award should be set aside.

Appeal from superior court, Haywood county; J. F. Graves, Judge.

Action by G. W. Williams and others against J. R. Justice and others. The cause was by consent referred to an arbitrator, who made an award in favor of plaintiffs. The court set the award aside, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. L. Norwood and J. M. Moody, for appellants. G. S. Ferguson and Geo. H. Smathers, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. While an arbitrator in a submission, under a rule of court, has a limited power to make amendments, (Morse, Arb. 207,) it does not extend to the making of new parties; and when such are made the award will be set aside, unless it appears that all of the parties consented. There are several defendants, and it appears that their attorney objected to the making of new parties. This, of course, must be taken as the objection of all of the defendants, and it is not insisted that more than one of them consented. As to this defendant, Chapman, he asked the court, in his answer, to hold that there was no cause of action stated in the complaint against him, and prayed that if the court held otherwise the Hyatts should be made parties plaintiff. The arbitrator, over the objection of all of the defendants, made the new parties upon the ground that the said defendant Chapman had asked for such an order; but this was not binding on the other defendants, and it must follow that his honor was correct in his ruling. Affirmed.

BURWELL, J., did not sit on the hearing of this case.

HOWELL et al. v. JONES et al.

BAIL—QUALIFICATION—SHERIFF'S LIABILITY.

1. Under Code, § 306, requiring bail for one arrested in a civil action to be residents and freeholders within the state, plaintiff may properly refuse a bond which does not show these facts on its face.

2. Under Code, § 305, providing that when plaintiff objects to bail for defendant taken by the sheriff, the latter shall notify him when and where the bail will justify, such notice must be in writing; otherwise, though plaintiff were near by, and knew of the justification, and the sheriff acted in good faith, the sheriff is liable as special bail, under section 313, as for failure to take or justify bail.

Appeal from superior court, Stanly county; Robert W. Winston, Judge.

Action by Howell & Hardister against W. C. Jones and others, wherein an order of arrest was issued against P. S. Jones, one of the defendants. Motion by plaintiffs to hold I. W. Snuggs, sheriff of Stanly county, liable as special bail, under Code, § 313, for failure to justify bail for said P. S. Jones. Motion denied. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Brown & Jerome, for appellants. Robins & Long, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. We do not think that the facts found by his honor justify the conclusion that the defendant sheriff is not liable to plaintiffs as special bail, according to the provisions of section 313 of the Code. The defendant was not to be discharged from arrest until he had given bail, or deposited the amount mentioned in the order. Code, § 298. No one but "a resident and freeholder within the state" is qualified to act as such bail. The sheriff should not have accepted an undertaking that did not show on its face that the surety thereon had those qualifications, or, if he did so, he should have required that the surety's justification should have established those facts. It was most reasonable that plaintiffs should except to such an undertaking. When notified by plaintiffs that they excepted to the undertaking given by defendant, it was his duty to give notice to plaintiffs as required in section 306. The evident intent of the statute is that it shall be a written notice, in which shall be mentioned the time when and place where the bail will justify. It is not found that any such notice, oral or written, was given to plaintiffs. The fact that one of the plaintiffs was near the place where the alleged justification took place, and knew what was doing there, cannot, we think, exonerate the sheriff from liability. This second omission of duty prescribed for him by the law confirmed his liability to plaintiffs as special bail. He failed to carry out the plain mandates of the Code, made for his guidance and the protection of plaintiffs' rights, and the "good faith" with which he acted cannot shield him from liability. We confine ourselves to the consideration of the facts found by his honor. It was unnecessary to send up in the record the various affidavits offered by the parties, since we cannot examine them to ascertain other facts that might tend to the sheriff's exoneration. Error.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 11, 1894.)

CARRIERS — VALIDITY OF REGULATIONS — CHARGE FOR DETENTION OF CARS.

Code, §§ 1202, 1203, allow railroad companies to make a certain charge for the shipment of produce and other articles; and "for the weighing, storage, and delivery of articles at any depot or warehouse of the company, a charge may also be made, not exceeding the ordinary warehouse rates charged in the city or town in which, or nearest to which, the depot or warehouse is situated;" but forbid a railroad company "to charge or receive any fee or commission other than the regular transportation fees, storage, and other charges authorized by law for manifesting, receiving, or shipping any goods or other articles for transportation on such railroad." Held, that said statutes do not forbid a charge of $1 per day for the detention of a car more than 72 hours after notice to the consignee of its arrival. Lacy and Hinton, JJ., dissenting.

Error to circuit court, Roanoke county.

Action by Adams, Clement & Co. against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company to recover back certain sums of money paid by said plaintiffs to said railroad company as charges for the detention of freight cars consigned to said plaintiffs beyond 72 hours after notice of arrival, that being the limit within which the cars were allowed to be unloaded without additional charges attaching. It was a rule of the railroad company, with which the plaintiffs were familiar, to make a charge of $1 per car per day for detention of cars beyond 72 hours, and the shipments in question were made with the agreement that said rule should be enforced. The plaintiffs, however, contended that said rule was in violation of the statutes of Virginia regulating the charges of carriers of passengers and freight. The two sections relied on are as follows, Code Va. 1887: "Sec. 1202. Rates of Toll on Railroads. On a railroad on which different rates are not prescribed by law, the following rates of toll may be charged for transportation, to wit: Of a person and his baggage within one hundred and fifty pounds, not exceeding six cents per mile; of produce and other articles, except gypsum, lime, guano and other specific manures not exceeding eight cents per ton per mile; and gypsum, lime, guano and other specific manures, not exceeding four cents per ton of twenty-two hundred and forty pounds per mile; and for the transportation of any person, or of any produce or other articles for a distance less than ten miles, a charge may be made at the foregoing rates as for ten miles. * * * For the weighing, storage and delivery of articles at any depot or warehouse of the company, a charge may also be made not exceeding the ordinary warehouse rates charged in the city or town in which, or nearest to which, the depot or warehouse is situated. Sec. 1203. What Charges are Prohibited. It shall not be lawful for any railroad company, or its agent, to charge or receive any fee or commissions other than the regular transportation fees, storage, and other charges authorized by law, for manifesting, receiving, or shipping any goods or other articles for transportation on such railroad. * * * A verdict was rendered and judgment entered for the full amount claimed by the plaintiffs, from which the defendant obtained a writ of error. Reversed.

Kirkpatrick & Blackford and Watts, Robertson & Robertson, for plaintiff in error. Pugh & Moffett, for defendants in error.

FAUNTLEROY, J. The petition of the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company complains of a judgment of the circuit court of

Roanoke county, rendered therein at the April term, 1893, in favor of Adams, Clement & Co. against the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company for the sum of $488, with interest thereon from September 1, 1891, until paid, in which suit the said Adams, Clement & Co. are plaintiffs and the petitioner is defendant. The suit is an action of assumpsit against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company to recover back certain sums of money alleged to have been illegally exacted from and paid by the said Adams, Clement & Co. to the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, and a verdict was rendered and a judgment entered for the full amount of the plaintiff's claim. The case is here upon a writ of error obtained by the defendant company.

The Norfolk & Western Railroad is a common carrier, owning and operating a line of railroad in the state of Virginia, and the town of Salem is upon the said line. The plaintiffs are lumber dealers, doing business at the said town of Salem; and between February 16 and August 31, 1891, they received a large number of shipments of lumber in car load, lots, consigned to them from points on the line of the said Norfolk & Western Railroad, and from points in the state of Virginia, and other points in other states. These shipments were made with the understanding and agreement that the lumber was to be unloaded by the consignee at Salem depot upon the arrival of the shipments at that point. The railroads of Virginia and of other states, for their own protection as well as for the protection and benefit of the public, have a car service set of rules, designed and enforced to secure the prompt movement of freight cars; and under the rules of this car service association the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company have a charge of one dollar per car per day for the use of their cars and their side or switch tracks for every day that the cars remain unloaded after notice of their arrival to the consignee and the lapse of three days. Under the abuses that prevailed previous to the establishment of this rule, serious loss and inconvenience were caused both to the shipping public and the railroad company by the unreasonable and protracted delay of consignees in unloading the cars; the railroad company being unable thereby to furnish cars when called upon by shippers of freight, and their side tracks being incumbered, and the movement of freight impeded, causing heavy expense, and a demand for more track room to accommodate idle cars standing unloaded upon their tracks, and the company being unable, therefore, when called upon, to furnish cars for the shipping public. The railroad company, as a common carrier, is bound to furnish cars for transportation of freight; and they must have control over their cars in order to perform their duties to the public. A car in motion is a useful thing, but a car standing idle and unloaded on the track is useless, and an incumbrance. If A. be allowed to hold a car unloaded at his pleasure or convenience, without cost or charge, and thus deprive the railroad company of the use of its vehicles for transportation of the freight of B. it is evident that both the railroad company and the shipping public will suffer injury. The plaintiffs in this suit had notice of the existence and operation of these rules, and they had paid the charges for the detention of cars long before the commencement of the account sued upon; and they knew and agreed when the shipments were made that such a charge would be made, unless they unloaded their cars in compliance with the rule of the company which gave to them 72 hours in which to unload their freight after notice of the arrival of the cars which they had stipulated to unload. It is well settled in this state and in other states that a common carrier may make reasonable rules and regulations for the convenient transaction of business between itself and those dealing with it, either as passengers or as shippers. See Railroad Co. v. Wysor, 82 Va. 250; Railroad Co. v. Harman's Admr., 84 Va. 553, 8 S. E. 251. That this rule is reasonable and proper, and that the railroad company can make such a charge, has been decided in a number of states; the question never having arisen before in this state. See Miller v. Banking Co., reported in (Ga.) 15 S. E. 316; Miller v. Mansfield, 112 Mass. 260; Railroad Co. v. Cooke, 50 Amer. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 89, note; Kentucky Wagon Manufg Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 50 Amer. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 90, note; Beach, Ry. Law, § 924, and cases there cited; Jones, Liens, § 284, and cases cited; 4 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. p. 3146, §§ 1831, 1832; Wood, Ry. Law, pp. 1592, 1593, 1600; 2 Wat. Corp. pp. 245, 246; 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 878-881, and notes; Redf. R. R. (6th Ed.) pp. 67-83. In addition to this long line of authorities holding the right of a railroad company to make such charge, and the reasonableness of such charge, there have been numerous investigations and rulings upon the point by the railroad commissioners of the various states. In Texas, the railroad commissioner, Judge Reagan, after full investigation, made an order fixing $3 per day per car as a reasonable charge for delay in unloading after 48 hours' notice. The railroad commissioner of Illinois, and those of other states, after full investigations, have decided in favor of the right and reasonableness of such a charge; and when it is considered that these railroad commissioners are appointed for the express purpose of regulating railroads in the interest of the public, the weight of their decisions as to the reasonableness of such charge is apparent. It is contended, however, that the sections of the Code of Virginia of 1887, 1202 and 1203, make such a charge illegal; and the judge of the trial court took the view of the plaintiff, and instructed the jury that, under the law of Virginia, such charge is unlawful, whether it be reasonable or not. We think that the trial court erred in so holding, and in so instructing the jury. The charge made by the railroad company for the detention of its cars, and the occupation of its tracks after due notice, and the allowance of three days to the consignees to unload the cars and disincumber the track, is not within the purview, purpose, or prescription of the statute, and is not of the character of weighing, storage, and delivery of articles of freight contemplated by the makers of the statute. The charge is not for transportation, storage, or delivery of freight, and it is not a device or a pretext for exacting of the shipper or the consignee more than the rate prescribed by law and fixed by schedule; but it is for the use and occupation of the cars, and the obstruction of their tracks by the consignee, for weeks and months after the contract for transporting and delivering the freight had been fulfilled and ended. It is neither a transportation charge, nor a storage charge, nor a terminal charge, nor a subterfuge for adding to the cost of transportation in excess of the rates prescribed. After arrival at the place of consignment, and notice to the consignee of the arrival, and the allowance of a reasonable time for the unloading of the cars by the consignee, according to his contract obligation to unload, the duties and the liabilities of the carrier cease, and the carrier becomes simply a bailee for hire, and can make reasonable rules and regulations and charges for such service as bailee, as it may see fit. Such charges are not carrier charges in the meaning, intentment, or prescription of the statute. Under the head of "Carriers," the American & English Encyclopædia of Law, (page 880, vol. 2:) "A carrier fulfilling the duties of a warehouseman is not obliged to accept the goods subject to his ordinary liability. He may impose such terms as he pleases; and the consignor, [consignee,] with notice thereof, will be bound. Whether such terms are or are not reasonable is an irrelevant inquiry." In a note to this section is the following: "We can see no reason why a railroad company, as a common carrier, cannot stipulate, by a contract express or implied, that their liability as carrier shall terminate with delivery at a particular point, and they will assume no liability at all in such case as warehousemen. If the consignee is fully advised at the time of the shipment that the company has no agent at a particular station, or the place to which the consignment is made, and the failure to employ such agent is not shown to be unreasonable in view of the condition of the company's business, there is, in the absence of rebutting circumstances, an implied consent that the carrier's responsibility shall be dissolved, when he has done all that the nature of the case permits him to do, according to the reasonable and proper usages of his business." Hutchinson on Carriers (section 378) says: "The custody and protection of the goods in his new character as warehouseman is a distinct service from that of their transportation, which entitles him to additional compensation, in consideration for which he continues liable for their safe-keeping as the hired bailee of the owner."

The record in this case shows that at the time of the shipments of this lumber the plaintiffs knew that there was a depot at Salem for the ordinary business of the company, but not for the accommodation of car loads of lumber; and that, if they did not unload the cars, according to the contemplation of the contract, within seventy-two hours (exclusive of Sunday and holidays) after one day for placing the cars and notice, they would have to pay one dollar per car, per day, thereafter; not for transportation and delivery, but for the detention of cars, and use and occupation of the tracks of the railroad company. The statute provides solely for the transportation, storage, and delivery of freight to the carrier, to be shipped by it, and delivered at the other end of the journey to the consignee; but it makes no provision or regulation for the hiring of cars to be loaded and unloaded by the customer, according to such contract as the carrier and the customer may make, express or implied. "A railroad company is not required by law to keep a warehouse or depot at every station along its route or line, and it may stipulate, either expressly or by implication, that it will assume no liability as warehouseman at a flag station where it has no depot or agent; and when the consignee is fully advised, at the time of the shipment, that the company has no depot or agent at such station, and it is not shown that the exigencies of its business required that it should have an agent at the place, the liability as common carrier terminates with the safe delivery of the goods on the side track at that point, and it assumes no liability as a warehouseman." It is shown in evidence that this rule and charge of one dollar a day for the unreasonable, and even long-continued, detention of the car, and obstruction of the tracks and business of the railroad, is not made for compensation to the company, but for the benefit of the public, and a stimulus to the consignee to unload the car, and disincumber the track and the business of the road. The evidence in the record is that the car is much more valuable to the company than the charge of one dollar per day; and it is manifest that, if cars can be delayed and held by shippers or consignees for months, (as the record shows was done in this case, in some instances,) without any regulation that would be operative, the business of the railroad and the public service must necessarily suffer. In view of the authorities and the facts of this case, we are of opinion the money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant company was properly charged by the said company, and was due to it by the plaintiffs, Adams, Clement & Co., and that they had no right to recover it back; and that the circuit court of Roanoke county erred in the law as applicable to the facts of the case, and erred in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury; that the judgment complained of is erroneous, and the same is reversed and annulled; and this court, proceeding to enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have entered upon the pleadings, will dismiss the plaintiffs' suit. Reversed.

STATE v. WAY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 2, 1894.)

HOMICIDE—NEW TRIAL AFTER APPEAL—LEAVE OF APPELLATE COURT.

A conviction of murder having been affirmed on appeal, and the case remanded, with an order to fix a day for execution, defendant moved for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The court declined to hear the motion for want of jurisdiction without leave of the appellate court, and, from this ruling, defendant appealed. Held that, though the appellate court may have lost jurisdiction of the case by the remittitur, it regained jurisdiction by the second appeal, so as to enable it to suspend the appeal, and grant to the trial court leave to hear the motion.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Orangeburg county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Indictment of Jefferson M. Way for murder. After defendant's conviction was affirmed, (17 S. E. 39,) he moved for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. From an order dismissing the motion, defendant appealed, and now moves to suspend the appeal, and for leave to renew the motion for new trial in the trial court. Motion granted.

Glaze & Herbert, Raysor & Summers, and S. P. Mayfield, for appellant. W. St. J. Jervey, for the State.

McIVER, C. J. The defendant, after having been tried and convicted of the murder of Elliott W. Whetstone, at the May term of the court of general sessions for Orangeburg county in the year 1892, duly appealed to this court. His appeal was heard during the November term for 1892 of this court, and on the 23d of February, 1893, the judgment of this court was rendered, affirming the judgment of the circuit court, and remanding the case to the circuit court for the purpose of having a new day assigned for the execution of the sentence originally imposed. 17 S. E. 39. Prior to the May term of the court of sessions for Orangeburg county in the year 1893, the defendant gave notice, based on accompanying affidavits, of a motion to that court for a new trial upon the ground of subsequently-discovered evidence. For some reason not stated, the hearing of this motion was postponed until the next succeeding term,—September, 1893,—and a new day, to wit, 17th of November, 1893, was assigned for the execution of the original sentence. When the motion for a new trial came up before his honor, Judge Norton, at the September term, 1893, he declined to hear the motion, upon the ground "that the circuit court has no jurisdiction to hear a motion for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence, after an appeal to the supreme court and an affirmance of the judgment appealed from, and the case has been remanded for the purpose of assigning a new day for the execution of the sentence, and such new day has been assigned by the circuit court;" referring to the recent case of State v. Turner, heard by the same judge, in which he had given his grounds for the conclusion adopted by him, saying that he was unable to distinguish this case from that of Turner. From this judgment the defendant appeals, upon the several grounds set out in the record, which really make the single question whether the circuit judge erred in declining to take jurisdiction of the motion.

Pending this appeal, a motion has been made to this court to suspend this appeal for the purpose of enabling the appellant to apply to the circuit court for a new trial upon the ground of after-discovered evidence; and this is the only matter which we propose now to decide, though it will be necessary to discuss, incidentally, the question whether the circuit judge erred, in declining to take jurisdiction of the motion heard by him at September term, 1893. If this case cannot be distinguished from Turner's Case, then it is clear that there was no error on the part of the circuit judge. It will be observed that the case of State v. Turner has been several times before this court. 36 S. C. 534, 608, 15 S. E. 602, and 16 S. E. 687; Id., 17 S. E. 752, 885. From a careful examination of the several phases of that case, we are unable to discover any material difference between that case and the one now under consideration, so far as the question which we are now called upon to determine is concerned. The only difference between that case and the one now before us is that in the former the motion for a new trial upon the ground of after-discovered evidence was submitted to the circuit court, by leave of this court, (for which purpose the appeal from a similar order to that appealed from here was suspended,) before a new day was assigned by the circuit court for the execution of the original sentence; while here, though the motion was submitted before the new day was actually assigned, it was not actually heard (the hearing having been postponed to the next succeeding term) until after the new day was assigned. This is an immaterial difference, and cannot affect the question of jurisdiction. As was held in State v. Merriman, 34 S. C. 576, 13 S. E. 328, the circuit court, in assigning a new day.

is merely carrying out the mandate of the supreme court, and its action in that respect is not appealable, as there can be no error of law in assigning one day rather than another. It seems that counsel, by their argument of this appeal, seek to assail the correctness of the action of this court in Turner's Case, rather than to show that this case is distinguishable from that case; but the important fact that there may be two appeals in the same case has been overlooked. While it may be true that after this court has determined an appeal, and its judgment has been duly remitted to the circuit court for the purpose of having its judgment carried into effect, this court thereby loses its jurisdiction, and cannot, therefore, grant any order in the cause, yet it is equally true that this court may again acquire jurisdiction by another appeal. This is exactly what was done, both in Turner's Case and in the present case. When the original appeals were determined by this court, and its judgments duly remitted to the circuit court, this court thereby lost its jurisdiction, and the circuit court thereby regained its jurisdiction only for the purpose of carrying out the mandates of the supreme court. But if the circuit court is then called upon to take any other action in the premises, and either refuses or undertakes to exercise such jurisdiction, its action is reviewable by appeal; and, when such appeal is perfected, this court again acquires jurisdiction of the matter appealed from, and, having thus regained jurisdiction, may make such order, within its jurisdictional limits, as may be deemed proper. But as the supreme court has not been invested with power to determine questions of fact, except in a class of cases to which the present case does not belong, and as the determination of a motion for a new trial upon the ground of after-discovered evidence necessarily involves the determination of questions of fact, though questions of law, also, may sometimes be involved, it is very obvious that this court has no power to decide such a motion; and, as the circuit court cannot exercise any jurisdiction in a case while an appeal is pending, the practice has been adopted, from the necessity of the case, of suspending the appeal for the purpose of enabling the moving party to apply to the circuit court—a tribunal which is invested with the power to determine questions of fact—for a new trial upon the ground of after-discovered evidence, provided a proper showing is made to this court for that purpose. The only inquiry for this court is whether the appellant has made a prima facie showing, leaving it entirely for the circuit court to determine whether the showing made is sufficient, uninfluenced by the fact that this court has determined that a prima facie showing has been made here, for such prima facie showing may be rebutted or overthrown by the showing before the circuit court. Hence, that court, in considering the motion for a new trial, should regard the matter as res integra, and without being in any way influenced by the fact that this court has granted permission for the motion to be made to the circuit court. The only inquiry, therefore, is whether such a showing has been made here as will warrant this court in permitting the appellant to move the circuit court for a new trial upon the ground of after-discovered evidence, and, in the mean time, suspending the appeal until the result of such motion in the circuit court has been certified to this court. Without going into any discussion of the facts stated in the affidavits submitted, which perhaps would be improper, as tending to prejudice the one party or the other, it is sufficient for us to say that we think the required showing has been made here. It is therefore ordered that the appellant have leave to apply to the circuit court for a new trial upon the ground of after-discovered evidence, and that the result of such motion be certified to this court by the circuit judge before whom the motion is made, and, for this purpose, that the present appeal be suspended until the coming in of such certificate.

MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—DISTRIBUTING PROCEEDS.

1. When a second mortgagee is made a foreclosure defendant, a decree directing the sheriff, out of the proceeds of sale, to pay "the costs of this action," authorizes payment of the costs of the second mortgagee.

2. In foreclosure of a first mortgage against junior judgment liens followed by a second mortgage, plaintiff claimed homestead against the judgments, and the court directed the sheriff to pay, first, the costs, next, plaintiff's mortgage, and "out of the remainder, exclusive of costs and expenses," the second mortgage, "but not to exceed in all, to both mortgages, the sum of $1,000, which is regarded as the homestead." Held, that the costs were not chargeable against the homestead, but against the whole proceeds of sale.

3. The balance of the proceeds after paying costs being less than $1,000, and the second mortgage not fully paid, the judgment creditors could not object that an item of costs smaller than such deficiency was wrongly allowed.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lancaster county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

In the matter of the American Freehold Land Mortgage Company, Limited, against C. J. L. Moody and others, being a foreclosure of mortgage. Rule on John P. Hunter, sheriff, in behalf of certain judgment creditors of defendant Moody, to pay over to said creditors certain proceeds of the foreclosure sale. Rule made absolute, and Hunter appeals. Reversed.

Jones & Williams, for appellant. Wylie & Wylie and R. E. & R. B. Allison, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. In this case the plaintiff brought its action to foreclose a mortgage of real estate executed to it by the defendant Moody, making as parties defendant the judgment creditors of said Moody, as well as Heath, Springs & Co., who held a second mortgage on the same land, junior to the plaintiff's mortgage as well as to the said judgments. The case was heard by his honor, Judge Kershaw, who rendered a decree adjudging that the defendant Moody was entitled to a homestead; that the mortgaged premises be sold by the sheriff, and the proceeds of such sale be applied as specifically directed in the decree, which will be more particularly adverted to hereinafter. In pursuance of this decree the premises were sold by the sheriff on the 7th of December, 1891, for the sum of $1,135. On the 16th of March, 1892, the costs of the case were taxed by the clerk, as follows:

Plaintiff's costs, including expenses of sale.....	$81 50
Costs of Atty. for defendants Heath, Springs & Co.....	80 00
Costs of Atty. for defendant Moody.....	30 00
	$141 50

And on the same day the proceeds of sale—$1,135—were applied by the sheriff as follows:

To costs as above	$141 50
Plaintiff's mortgage.....	785 94
Heath, Springs & Co.....	257 56

The "case" does not show that any written notice of the taxation of the costs as above was ever given, nor was there any evidence upon that subject given; but it was stated by one of the counsel for appellant that the written statement of the costs as taxed was submitted to one of the attorneys for the judgment creditors, who made no objection thereto, though the gentleman thus referred to said he had no recollection of any such statement being shown him. Subsequently, to wit, on the 15th of April, 1892, a written notice was given to the sheriff by the attorneys for the judgment creditors, or some of them, that the proceeds of the sale should be disbursed in the manner therein specified; and in pursuance of such notice a rule was taken out requiring him to show cause why the sum of $135—the amount of the proceeds of sale in excess of the homestead—should not be paid over to the judgment creditors. To this rule the sheriff answered that, before any notice was given to him requiring a different application, he had applied such proceeds in the manner directed by the decree of Judge Kershaw. The rule, and answer thereto, came before his honor,

Judge Norton, who rendered his decree, adjudging, substantially, that the sheriff had misapplied so much of the proceeds of the sale as exceeded the homestead exemption, to wit, the sum of $135, and that he was liable therefor to the judgment creditors in the order of their priorities. From this judgment, Sheriff Hunter, as well as Heath, Springs & Co., appeal on the several grounds set out in the record; for although the name of Sheriff Hunter is not embraced in the notice of appeal as originally served, yet it is embraced in the exceptions subsequently served, and no motion to dismiss the appeal of Hunter has ever been made. Inasmuch as the decree of Judge Kershaw was never excepted to or appealed from, it must be regarded, whether right or wrong, as the law of this case, at least so far as the parties hereto are concerned. Whether it would have been binding on the sheriff, who was not a party to the original case, need not be considered, as he does not now attack that decree. So, too, whether the sheriff would be justified in paying out the costs, as they are found taxed in the record, by the proper officer, which had not been excepted to and reformed, in an ordinary case of a sale made by him under an execution, need not now be considered, as the only question here is whether the sheriff has properly applied the proceeds of a sale made by him under the order of the court directing how such proceeds should be applied.

The sole question, therefore, is as to the proper construction of Judge Kershaw's decree. It must be admitted that the language of that decree is not as plain as it might have been. Indeed, one portion of the decree appears to be somewhat inconsistent with a subsequent portion, for, after adjudging that Moody was entitled to a homestead, the judge uses this language: "The mortgages are to be first paid out of the homestead, and then the judgments are entitled out of the remainder of the property, in the order of their priority, if anything remains after exhausting the homestead exemption in favor of the mortgages." But, when he comes to that part of the decree in which the sheriff is directed how to apply the proceeds of the sale,—the part to which the sheriff would most naturally and properly look for guidance,—his language is: "That out of the proceeds of the sale the sheriff pay, first, the costs of this action and the expenses of said sale, and, next, that he pay to the plaintiff or their attorneys the amount due them on their mortgage debt, as hereinafter stated, with the interest thereon." It will be observed that "the costs of this action" are to be first paid, not out of the homestead, but "out of the proceeds of the sale," to wit, $1,135, and next the plaintiff's mortgage debt. Now, what is meant by the words, "the costs of this action?" Do they mean only the costs of the American Freehold Mortgage Company, or do they embrace also the costs of Heath, Springs & Co.? It is true that the latter are not named as plaintiffs; but it is well settled that, in a proceeding like this, on the equity side of the court, the manner in which the parties are arrayed on the record, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, is a matter of no moment. When Heath, Springs & Co., as holding the junior mortgage, were brought in as parties,—nominally as defendants,—the object was to have both mortgages foreclosed. They were then substantially plaintiffs, though nominally defendants, and their costs should be considered as a part of "the costs of the action," the object of which was to foreclose both mortgages, as was done. It will further be observed that Judge Kershaw does not use the words, "the plaintiff's costs in this action," but his language is, "the costs of this action," which may be well construed as embracing something more than the nominal plaintiff's costs. According to this construction, the sheriff was directed to make this application of the proceeds of sale,—$1,135:

First to the costs of this action	30.00
111.50
Next to plaintiff's mortgage debt.....	735.94
	<hr/>
	847.44
	<hr/>

To be applied to the debt of Heath, Springs & Co.....$287.58

There being nothing in the decree warranting the payment of the costs of the defendant Moody, there was clearly a misapplication to his costs; but of this only the appellants, Heath, Springs & Co. could complain, and they make no such complaint.

The next paragraph in the decree is in the following words: "That out of the remainder of the said proceeds of sale, exclusive of costs and expenses, he pay to the defendants Heath, Springs & Co. the amount of their mortgage debt, as hereinbefore stated, with the interest thereon, but not to exceed in all, to both mortgages, the sum of one thousand dollars, which is regarded as the homestead of the defendant Moody, and applicable to the payment of said mortgage debts in the order of their priority." It must be confessed that it is somewhat difficult to understand exactly what was meant by the language used, especially the expression, "exclusive of costs and expenses." But, construing this paragraph in connection with the one just previously quoted, the meaning would be the same as that which has been found to be the proper construction of the next preceding paragraph, and that this last-quoted paragraph was inserted simply for the purpose of emphasizing the intention, previously indicated, that no more than the balance which would remain of the $1,000 after satisfying the first mortgage should be applied to the mortgage debt in favor of Heath, Springs & Co. until judgments were satisfied; for it will be remembered that Judge Kershaw made his decree before he knew, or could possibly have known, what would be the amount of the proceeds of the sale. If the land had brought double the sum which it did bring at the sale subsequently made, it would have been very important to have made some distinct provision that in no event should Heath, Springs & Co. receive anything more than would remain of the $1,000 after the first mortgage was satisfied, until all the judgments senior to the mortgage of Heath, Springs & Co. had been satisfied; and this, no doubt, looking to such a contingency, was the true intent of the paragraph now under consideration. In the judgment appealed from, Judge Norton clearly misconceives the decree of Judge Kershaw when he says: "Under the two-fund doctrine, as adopted by Judge Kershaw, plaintiff was bound, being able to do so, to make its debt and costs out of the homestead, in exoneration of the property of the defendant in excess of the homestead." As has been shown, Judge Kershaw did not adopt any such view of the two-fund doctrine. Indeed, he made no allusion to any such doctrine, though it may be that he had it in mind in drawing his decree. But he certainly did not adopt any such view of that doctrine as is attributed to him by Judge Norton, for he not only did not hold that the senior mortgagee was bound to make its debt and costs out of the homestead in exoneration of the property of the defendant in excess of the homestead, but, on the contrary, expressly held that the costs of this action should first be paid out of the proceeds of the sale,—not of the homestead alone, but the whole property,—and, next, the mortgage debt due to plaintiff. This was exactly in conformity to the two-fund doctrine, whereas the view erroneously attributed to Judge Kershaw would not have been in conformity to that doctrine, for, while it recognizes the equity of the judgment creditors, it ignores a like equity of Heath, Springs & Co.

The question raised here by the appellant, as to the propriety of a proceeding by rule on the sheriff, while perhaps admitting of grave doubt, under the cases of State v. Sheriff of Charleston Dist., 1 Const. S. C. 145; Dawkins v. Pearson, 2 Bailey, 619; Cooper v. Scott, 2 McMul. 150; Cannady v. Odum, 2 Rich. Law, 527; Brown v. Furze, Id. 530; and Hooks v. Byrd, 10 Rich. Law, 120,—cannot now be considered, as no such question was presented to or decided by the circuit court. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court with instructions to discharge the rule on the sheriff.

EJECTMENT—ORAL SALE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An alienee, by executor's sale of land of a deceased person, is not deceased's "assignee," within the protection of Code, § 400, against testimony of an adverse party as to the latter's transactions with deceased.

2. In ejectment by a wife, defendant cannot object to evidence that plaintiff's husband, who had bargained and paid for the land, had orally assigned to her the contract of purchase, the husband and his creditors acquiescing.

3. In ejectment by a wife on a contract of purchase made by her husband with one deceased, receipts for payments from deceased and his executor to the husband, and one to the wife, not showing that they related to the same land or the land in dispute, are admissible as subject to parol explanation.

4. A deed of land known as the "W. Homestead," 200 acres, more or less; bounded by the lands of certain persons named, "and of others,"—may be explained by the grantor so as to identify the land, and show the names of the "others," adjoining owners.

5. A "sketch of a plat" not marked with course and distances, made by a nonexpert grantor, and annexed to his deed, is admissible with the deed, as an illustration merely.

6. When a surveyor has, as an expert, fully explained a plat, and all that he saw or could find in regard to the lines therein, a question whether there were any marks to show that any persons, other than those he had mentioned, got any of the land, is leading and irrelevant, and calls for witness' opinion as to facts.

7. A receipt "in part payment of land sold" to S., "adjoining R.," and another to S.'s wife, "in part payment of land sold her husband," coupled with possession delivered to S. and his wife, take the oral contract of sale out of the statute.

8. A contract to convey land on payment of the price gives the vendee at once the right to specific performance, defeasible only by his failure to pay; and a grantee of the vendor's executor, with notice, cannot claim such land as included in his deed, merely because, when his deed was executed, said contract had not been fully performed.

9. A charge that the possession of plaintiff under an oral contract of sale was notice of her claim to the vendor's subsequent grantee is not erroneous for failure, in the absence of request, to add that such possession must be open, actual, notorious, and unequivocal.

10. When the president of a company is charged with notice as to a claim to certain land, which may or may not be included in the terms of a deed to the company, and the company resolves to sell, without warranty, its lands embraced in such deed, to its president and its secretary, (defendant,) there present recording the resolution, as individuals, and so conveys, it is proper to refuse to charge that notice to said company was not notice to a stockholder, and to charge that, if defendant were present when the resolution was passed, he was put upon notice.

11. In such case the court's affirmance of a charge that notice to the president was not notice to defendant, with the condition that it was notice to such president as an individual merely, could not be complained of by defendant.

12. The court, after charging defendant's point that plaintiff must prove the location of his claim plainly enough to enable the court to have it located and its judgment executed, does not err in adding that the question of sufficient location is for the jury.

13. The supreme court will not reverse for an instruction contravening a rule that exemplary damages must be pleaded, when the verdict makes it plain that no such damages were allowed.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court, Abbeville county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by Rachel Rapley against James C. Klugh for possession of land, and damages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Pending appeal, on the death of complainant her heirs were substituted. Affirmed.

Plaintiff's receipts for alleged payments on the land claimed were as follows: "(a) Received from Samson Rapley six dollars in part payment for land sold him, adjoining Robin Guy. R. H. Wardlaw. 23 January, 1886." "(b) Received, 7 October, from Rachel Rapley, eighteen dollars 75 cents, in part payment for land sold to her husband, Samson Rapley; it being the amount of her account for washing my clothes from 1 July, 1885, to 1 October, 1886. For any previous payment made, I gave him a receipt. Robt. H. Wardlaw." "(c) Received of Rachel Rapley twenty dollars, in part payment of land purchased from the late Robt. H. Wardlaw, at the rate of $40 per acre. W. C. Wardlaw, Exct. Estate R. H. Wardlaw. Nov. 27, 1889." "(d) Received of Samson Rapley twenty-five dollars, the balance due upon tract of land, 2 acres, bought from estate of Robt. H. Wardlaw. W. C. Wardlaw, Exctr. Est. R. H. Wardlaw. Nov. 10, 1890."

Beach & Caron, for appellant. De Bruhl & Bradley, for respondents.

POPE, J. This was an action instituted by Rachel Rapley in the court of common pleas for Abbeville county against James C. Klugh, as defendant, for the recovery of 2 acres of land situated in said county, and $150 damages. The action came on to be heard before his honor Judge Izlar and a jury at the January, 1893, term of such court, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the land in dispute, and $100 damages. After the entry of judgment,—which was preceded by a motion for a new trial, that was denied,—the defendant appealed upon the following grounds: "(1) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in allowing the plaintiff, against the objections of the defendant, to testify to transactions between herself and Robert H. Wardlaw, deceased, to wit: That she and her husband purchased land from Mr. Wardlaw; that they got from him papers about the land, and receipts for money; and that she paid him part of the purchase money, and worked for him to make payments on said land. (2) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in permitting the plaintiff, against the defendant's objection, to testify that her husband, Samson Rapley, allowed the title to said land made to her; the written transfer of the contract to purchase being the best evidence. (3) Because his honor erred in admitting, against defendant's objection, proof by the plaintiff and her husband of a verbal assignment of the contract to purchase said land, and in holding that said assignment need not be in writing. (4) Because his honor erred in admitting in evidence, against defendant's objection, the receipts for money paid on said land, the same not having been properly proved. (5) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in admitting in evidence, against defendant's objection, the receipts referred to; said receipts being to different parties, and there being no evidence that they related to the same land, or to the land in dispute. (6) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in admitting, against defendant's objection, the testimony of W. C. Wardlaw, in answer to plaintiff's fourth interrogatory, that "the Wardlaw home tract, in the town of Abbeville, was sold to A. L. Gillespie;" the deed being the best evidence. (7) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in admitting, against the defendant's objection, the testimony of W. C. Wardlaw, given in answer to plaintiff's fifth interrogatory, that the tract of land sold to A. L. Gillespie did not embrace all of the homestead of R. N. Wardlaw, and that several persons, naming them, had previously bought portions of it; said testimony tending to vary the terms of the Gillespie deed, and the deeds to portions sold off being the best evidence. (8) Because his honor erred in overruling defendant's objection to plaintiff's sixth interrogatory propounded to W. C. Wardlaw, because it is leading, and because the deed is the best evidence. (9) Because his honor erred in overruling defendant's objection to plaintiff's seventh interrogatory propounded to W. C. Wardlaw, because it was an effort to vary the terms of the deed to Gillespie, and because the testimony sought to be introduced was irrelevant. (10) Because his honor erred in overruling defendant's objection to plaintiff's eighth interrogatory to W. C. Wardlaw, because the testimony sought was irrelevant. (11) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in allowing the witness Samson Rapley to testify, against the objection of defendant, to transactions between the plaintiff and Robert H. Wardlaw, deceased, to wit, that Mr. Wardlaw put the plaintiff in possession of the land; the alleged contract to purchase having been made between himself and Mr. Wardlaw, and he having had an interest. (12) Because his honor erred in allowing the plaintiff, against the objection of the defendant, to put in evidence, and explain to the jury, the alleged 'sketch of a plat' attached to the deed of W. C. Wardlaw, executor, to Rachel Rapley, without proof of the same, and in holding that the defendant had not the right to object. (13) Because his honor erred in sustaining the plaintiff's objection to the following question, asked R. J. Robinson: 'Were there any marks there to show that any persons, other than those you have mentioned,—Grey and others,—ever got any of this land?' (14) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in overruling defendant's motion for a nonsuit—First. Because the alleged assignment or transfer to the plaintiff of the contract between Samson Rapley and Robert H. Wardlaw for the purchase of the said land was not in writing, and was within the statute of frauds; second, because the rights of the plaintiff, as between her and the defendant, are fixed by the contract between Samson Rapley and Robert H. Wardlaw for the purchase of said land, as it stood at the time of defendant's purchase; third, because the alleged contract between Samson Rapley and Robert H. Wardlaw for the purchase of said land, and part performance thereof, was not sufficient to sustain an action for specific performance, and plaintiff's equity cannot prevail; fourth, because there was no evidence of the location of the said land under the alleged contract to purchase. (15) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'I say that the main question is, were the two acres in dispute included in the Gillespie conveyance and purchase? He purchased 200 acres, more or less, bounded by certain named persons, and "others." If these two acres were not in the Gillespie purchase, then it was not conveyed to the defendant, * * * and the plaintiff would be entitled to prevail in this action,'—and in failing to charge that the Gillespie conveyance and purchase included all the land covered by the descriptions in the deeds, and plat accompanying the same. (16) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in charging the jury that if 'the plaintiff, or her husband for her,' was 'in possession of these two acres at the time the defendant, and those under whom he claims, purchased, * * * the defendant could not occupy the position of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice,' and in failing to charge that such possession must be actual, open, notorious, and unequivocal at the time the defendant purchased. (17) Because his honor the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge the defendant's third and fourth requests to charge, which are as follows: 'Third. That notice to the Abbeville Land, Loan, and Improvement Company of plaintiff's claim, through its president, J. Allen Smith, was not notice to an individual stockholder who purchased from said company without receiving notice himself. Fourth. That if this defendant purchased from the land, loan, and improvement company without notice of the plaintiff's claim, and paid the purchase money, and took title, he will be protected in his purchase, although the said land, loan, and improvement company, in which he is a stockholder, had notice of the claim of the plaintiff.' (18) Because his honor erred in charging the jury: 'If the testimony satisfies you that Mr. J. Allen Smith, the president of the land, loan, and improvement company, had notice of the claim of Rachel Rapley and her husband, and that Mr. Klugh was secretary of the company, and was present at that meeting when the resolution was passed that they would convey this land to Mr. Klugh and Mr. J. Allen Smith without warranty, that would be sufficient to put him upon notice, and was sufficient to charge him with notice.' (19) Because his honor the presiding judge should have charged the jury as requested in defendant's sixth request to charge, which is as follows: 'That notice to J. Allen Smith of plaintiff's claim, before he and this defendant purchased said land, was not notice to this defendant; and, if he purchased without notice, the plaintiff cannot recover.' (20) Because his honor the presiding judge should have charged the jury as requested in defendant's seventh request to charge, which is as follows: 'That the plaintiff must, by testimony, make the location of the land claimed sufficiently plain to enable the court to have the same located, and its judgment carried out, should there be a judgment for the plaintiff; and, if this is not done, the plaintiff cannot recover.' (21) Because his honor erred in charging the jury 'that the question of location is a question of fact for you, and you must determine whether or not this land in dispute has been sufficiently located to enable the plaintiff to recover in this action,' and then failing to instruct them what constitutes sufficient location. (22) Because his honor erred, when referring to the descriptions of the Wardlaw land contained in the deeds, in charging the jury as follows: 'The descriptions show that it was bounded by so and so, and others. That is an important matter for you to consider, when you come to consider the whole case,'—and then failing to charge the jury in what respect it was important, and what was the effect of it. (23) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If you conclude that she was willfully and wrongfully turned out of her land, then, if you conclude to do so, you can give her such damages as you think she is entitled to, but not unless she was turned out of her land wantonly, willfully, and maliciously, and recklessly;' whereas he should have charged that exemplary or punitive damages could not be recovered in an action of this kind. (24) Because, his honor having charged the jury that they could not give exemplary damages unless the plaintiff was turned out of her land wantonly, willfully, and maliciously, and recklessly, he should have granted defendant's motion for a new trial; there being no evidence that she was dispossessed in such manner, and the damages found being largely in excess of the actual damages proved."

At the hearing before us, it having been suggested that Rachel Rapley had died since this appeal had been taken, an order was issued by this court, with the consent of all parties to the appeal, by which Lee Rap-ley and Adolphus Rapley, as the devisees under the will of Rachel Rapley, deceased, and W. E. Bell, as the executor of her will, were substituted for the said Rachel Rapley, as parties in her stead; such order stipulating that the same should be without prejudice to any written agreement heretofore made between counsel in this cause, and that all such agreements in writing should be confirmed.

The grounds of appeal are numerous,—some 24 exceptions. We will first examine the first and eleventh exceptions; involving, as they do, the construction of section 400 of the Code of this state. The questions now presented were raised in the examination of Samson Rapley, who was the husband of the plaintiff, Rachel Rapley, and also who had made the contract with Robert H. Wardlaw for the purchase of the two acres of land now in controversy. Mr. Wardlaw, in his lifetime, executed no deed, but received two payments in part of the purchase money, which payments were evidenced by his receipts therefor in writing, and put the said Samson Rapley in possession of the land. The plaintiff desired this testimony. Also, the plaintiff, Rachel Rapley, desired to testify in regard to communications and transactions with the said Robert H. Wardlaw. Defendant promptly interposed his objection to such testimony on the ground that it was obnoxious to the section of our Code (400) now being considered. Section 399 of the Code provides: "No person offered as a witness shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action;" and thereby a general rule was established. But, as said by Chief Justice Moses in Guery v. Kinsler, 3 S. C. 423, section 400, "was to guard against a mischief which, but for its enactment, would have been the consequence of the section (399) which precedes it. * * * While the living, of sane mind, were able to answer for themselves, there was no one to protect the estate of the dead, the insane, or the lunatic from the effect of testimony derived from their alleged declarations without fear of direct contradiction." Section 400, which is in restriction of the general rules, reads as follows: "* * * Provided however that no party to the action or proceeding, nor any person who has a legal or equitable interest which may be affected by the event of the action or proceeding nor any person who previous to such examination has had such an interest, however the same may have been transferred to or come to the party to the action or proceeding, nor any assignor of any thing in controversy in the action, shall be examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person, at the time of such examination, deceased, insane or lunatic, as a witness against a party then prosecuting or defending the action as executor, administrator, heir at law, next-of-kin, assignee, legatee, devisee or survivor of such deceased person, or as assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic, when such examination or any judgment or determination, in such action or proceeding, can in any manner affect the interest of such witness, or the interest previously owned or represented by him. * * * Many cases may be found in our Reports where this court has construed this last section. In every case it has been held to be in restriction of the general right to testify, and at the same time this court has recognized its inability to extend it beyond the classes expressly denied the right to testify. As was said in Guery v. Kinsler, supra: "When, however, an exception is made by words of description, including only persons referred to as occupying particular relations, it would be transcending our authority, and usurping the functions of another department, to include others who, though they may be within the mischief, have not been so recognized and protected by the enactment." It becomes necessary, therefore, when the competency of a witness is to be determined by the provisions of section 400 of the Code, that it shall appear that the witness objected to shall be shown to belong to one of the interdicted classes named in this statute. The only possible class which these witnesses can be referred to therein is that of "assignees." Is it true that the defendant to the action is in any sense an "assignee" of Robert H. Wardlaw, deceased? Klugh, the defendant, did not purchase and receive his title from Robert H. Wardlaw. His title is derived from J. Allen Smith, who was the alienee of the Abbeville Building, Loan & Investment Company. This corporation purchased from one Gillespie, and he, in turn, purchased from William C. Wardlaw, as executor, etc., of Robert H. Wardlaw. Under the decisions of this court in the cases of Jones v. Plunkett, 9 S. C. 392, and Cantey v. Whitaker, 17 S. C. 527, it could not be held that the defendant here was entitled to be classed as an "assignee," within this provision of the Code. In the case last cited, Mr. Justice McGowan said: "But whilst, as it seems to us, the plaintiff, as alienee, is within the mischief intended to be remedied by the exception, she is not within the express terms. She is the third or fourth alienee of the land from the deceased person, but she is neither 'executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor,' according to the terms of the exception which enumerated those intended to be excepted; and this court, whose only duty it is to declare the law, cannot amend it so that its terms will embrace a case which we may suppose to be within the principle upon which the law was founded, but not within its express terms." The cases of Standridge v. Powell, 11 S. C. 549; Robinson v. Robinson, 20 S. C. 567; Monts v. Koon, 21 S. C. 110, 112; and Moffatt v. Hardin, 22 S. C. 25,—cited in appellant's argument,— have each been examined by us, and it is found that no principle upheld in any of those cases refers to or antagonizes the position here taken by us. These exceptions must be overruled.

We will next consider exceptions 2 and 3. The appellant lays stress upon the decision of this court of Mims v. Chandler, 21 S. C. 494, where it was held that, the contract of purchase having been made by Mims, the husband, he was entitled, in the action for specific performance of such contract, to have the title made to himself, rather than to allow Chandler, of his own motion, to elect to make such title to the wife of Mims. The court was clearly right in its decision in that case. So, in the present case, we would hold if there were a contest between Dr. W. C. Wardlaw, as the executor of Robert H. Wardlaw, deceased, and Samson Rapley, when Dr. Wardlaw claimed the right to convey the lot of land to Rachel, rather than Samson. But we are confronted with no such state of facts. It is Samson who, after having completed his contract by paying every dollar of the purchase money, requires such deed made to his helpmeet,—his wife; and we hear no complaint of Samson, or his heirs at law or his creditors, at what Samson has himself caused to be done. We know of no law which forbids a purchaser, under a parol contract to purchase, with possession being delivered to him of the land in question, and after he has paid to the utmost farthing the purchase money, having the deed made to his wife, if the rights of his creditors are not contravened thereby. The decisions quoted by the appellant: Blackwell v. Ryan, 21 S. C. 121; Watson v. Child, 9 Rich. Eq. 129; Roberts v. Smith, 21 S. C. 461; Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill, Eq. 421; Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 97,—do not in any manner impinge upon the view here expressed. These exceptions are overruled.

Exceptions 4 and 5 relate to the admission in testimony of two receipts given by Robert H. Wardlaw to Samson Rapley and his wife, Rachel, for money paid by them on the parol contract of purchase of the land now in controversy. This court, in the case of Moffatt v. Hardin, 22 S. C. 9, held: "A receipt is not one of those solemn papers in writing as to which parol evidence is not admissible, but is always capable of explanation." These parties, Samson Rapley and Rachel, his wife, presented, when they were testifying under oath, two receipts which they said were given to them by Mr. Robert H. Wardlaw, and two given by his son, Dr. William C., as his executor. They testified that the parties themselves gave them these receipts when they paid the money. There was no error here.

Now let us examine exceptions 6, 7, 8, 9, 10; relating, as they do, to appellant's objections to the answers made by Dr. Wardlaw to plaintiff's interrogatories—4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th interrogatories. Dr. Wardlaw had made a deed to A. L. Gillespie for what was known as the "Robert H. Wardlaw Homestead," containing 200 acres, "more or less;" bounded by lands of certain named individuals, and "of others," whose names were not given. The purpose of these interrogatories was to obtain from this witness the names in his deed, but whose names were not then of the other persons who were referred to given. This witness had a perfect right in this testimony to fully identify the land sold as the "Robert H. Wardlaw Homestead." Not only so, but he could give the names of the "others" whose lands were bounded by the lands he conveyed. The only restriction upon his testimony in regard to these matters was that he could not contradict or vary the terms of his contract with A. L. Gillespie, which contract was expressed in the deed of conveyance from Wardlaw to Gillespie. As was said in Barkley v. Tarrant 20 S. C. 578: "There is no doubt of the general rule that 'parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written agreement.' This is a most salutary rule, necessary to prevent frauds and perjuries, and to protect the real intention of parties; but, if applied without discrimination, it may be found to promote the very things it was intended to prevent. The rule has special reference to the words used in the instrument, and the intention of the parties; as, for example, in the familiar case of a latent ambiguity. Mr. Greenleaf says: 'It is thus apparent that the rule excludes only parol evidence of the language of the parties contradicting, varying or adding to that which is contained in the written instrument; and this because they have themselves committed to writing all which they deemed necessary to give full expression to their meaning, and because of the mischiefs which would result if verbal testimony were in such cases received. But where the agreement in writing is expressed in short and incomplete terms, parol evidence is admissible to explain that which is per se unintelligible, such explanation not being inconsistent with the written terms.' 1 Greenl. Ev. § 282." The deed of Dr. Wardlaw to Mr. Gillespie was expressed in incomplete terms,—the "Robert H. Wardlaw Homestead," lands "of others" as boundaries; hence, under the wise rule just enunciated, this witness could testify on these points. Let the exceptions be overruled. But, before leaving this branch of the case, it is only just to ourselves to say that these principles of law are not inconsistent with those held in the cases of Senterfit v. Reynolds, 3 Rich. Law, 129, 130; Lee v. Fowler, 19 S. C. 608; Cathcart v. Chandler, 5 Strob. 19; Stucky v. Clyburn, Cheves, 186; and 1 Greenl. Ev. § 86,—cited by the appellants.

The twelfth exception has reference to what was known as a "sketch of a plat" which was attached to the deed of conveyance from Dr. William O. Wardlaw, as executor of R. H. Wardlaw, deceased, to Rachel Rapley. Such "sketch of a plat" was not made by any surveyor. It was a diagram of the premises prepared by Dr. Wardlaw, and by him attached to the deed before its delivery. The deed was introduced in evidence without objection, and, when defendant (appellant) objected to any reference to such diagram, the judge ruled that he could not object to it; that it was a part of the deed. Inasmuch as it was used at the trial as an illustration, and not as binding any one,—for it had no courses or distances on it,—we suppose the circuit judge viewed it very much as any diagram made by an ordinary witness, (we mean by "ordinary witness" one who was not an expert, as a surveyor would be,) while on the stand, would indicate his impressions of the form of a house, direction of a road, or, it may be, the way a piece of land appeared to the witness as to its direction from any given place or road, etc. With this view, we cannot see that any harm could have resulted to any one from its consideration. Let the exception be overruled.

The thirteenth exception complains that the circuit judge erred in not allowing Mr. R. J. Robinson, who is a surveyor, to answer a question in this form, propounded by appellant: "Were there any marks there to show that any persons, other than those you have mentioned,—Grey and others,—got any of this land?" The form of this question is objectionable because it was leading. Independently, however, of this objection, it was irrelevant; for it was no part of the issues here presented. Besides, this witness had fully explained the McCord plat, and all that he saw or could find in connection with the lines therein designated; so that, after all, his opinion as to facts was sought by the question, and we are, under all these circumstances, inclined to regard the course of the judge as proper. The exception is overruled.

We now come to consider the fourteenth exception; covering, as it does, the alleged error of the circuit judge in refusing the motion for a nonsuit, in its several phases. (a) The alleged contract between Samson Rapley and Robert H. Wardlaw was not in writing, and was within the statute of frauds. We cannot agree with the appellant that, because there was no written contract between these parties, therefore the statute of frauds would apply. To a certain extent there was an acknowledgment by Mr. Wardlaw in writing of this contract; for he specifies in the receipts he gave, and which he signed, that there was such a contract. Besides all this, he received a considerable part of the purchase money, and at the same time placed the bargainor in possession. We apprehend, if he had lived and refused to perform his contract, Rapley could have forced him to do so. This is a fair test of the applicability of the statute of frauds. We think Rapley showed more than did the plaintiff in Mims v. Chandler, supra, where specific performance was adjudged. (b) Appellant insists that he, having purchased before the contract was actually carried into effect, is entitled to hold his rights as against Rapley, (Samson,) and that at that time Samson Rapley could not have had specific performance of his contract. We hold that Rapley had this right of specific performance throughout his contract, subject to be defeated if he failed to pay the entire purchase money. If, after 1886, Mr. Robert H. Wardlaw, and before defendant purchased, no longer had the power to alienate this land, so as to defeat the rights therein that he (Mr. Wardlaw) had created in Samson Rapley, certainly after his death the executor of Mr. Wardlaw had no such power; and, if this be true, the appellant is helpless, so far as this matter is concerned, for he only has the executor's deed. However, before leaving the consideration of this question of nonsuit, it would have been difficult to defend the circuit judge if he had granted this motion, if there was testimony on the material issues raised by the pleadings. This exception is overruled in all its phases, for (c) and (d) were answered in what was said of (a).

The fifteenth exception complains of the judge's charge as to the Gillespie deed, and then complains of what he ought to have charged, and did not. So far as the latter complaint is concerned, it is the appellant's fault if the judge ought to have charged, and did not so charge, as he alleges, for the appellant never requested any such charge; and we have, over and over, held that, if an appellant omits a request to charge, it is his misfortune, and not the fault of the judge. Now, what did the judge charge that is complained of? Here is that part of his charge: "So, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen, I say that the main question is, were the two acres in dispute included in the Gillespie conveyance and purchase? He purchased 200 acres, 'more or less,' bounded by certain named persons, 'and others.' If these two acres were not in the Gillespie purchase, then they were not conveyed to the defendant, for he only purchased the land conveyed to Gillespie, and by him conveyed to the Abbeville Land, Loan & Investment Company, and the plaintiff would be entitled to prevail in this action. But if it was included, then the defendant would be entitled to prevail, unless the testimony satisfies you that at the time of his purchase he had notice of the plaintiff's claim." This charge of the judge most admirably presents the issues in this action to the jury. It is in exact accord with the admitted and uncontroverted facts of the pleadings and the testimony. The exception is overruled.

Let us now attend to the question embraced in the sixteenth exception. This relates to the judge's charge. Before quoting the language referred to, it may be of moment to state that defendant sought to protect himself, not only by denying that plaintiff had title, but, in case he should fail, then he set up the defense of purchaser for a full and valuable consideration, without notice of plaintiff's rights. Therefore, the judge, without any request for such a charge, felt it his duty, as it was, to explain that issue to the jury, and he did so in these words: "So, the question is, was the plaintiff, or her husband for her, in possession of these two acres at the time the defendant, and those under and through whom he claims, purchased? If so, then the law would charge them with constructive notice of the plaintiff's claim, and the defendant could not occupy the position of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice." This seems to us a fair presentation of the law. Appellant complains that he ought to have enlarged his charge somewhat by stating that such occupation was open, actual, notorious, and unequivocal. It is his (appellant's) fault if the judge did no more; for he made no request, either then or at the close of the charge, as the judge distinctly invited counsel to do. The exception must be overruled.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth exceptions the appellant raises the question whether the judge did not err in refusing to charge his third and fourth requests: "Third. That notice to the Abbeville Land, Loan, and Improvement Company of plaintiff's claim, through its president, J. Allen Smith, was not notice to an individual stockholder who purchased from such company without receiving notice himself. Fourth. That if this defendant purchased from the land, loan, and improvement company without notice of the plaintiff's claim, and paid the purchase money, and took title, he will be protected in his purchase, although the said land, loan, and improvement company, in which he is a stockholder, had notice of the claim of plaintiff." The judge charged: "Well, under certain circumstances I would charge you that these propositions might be true; but if the testimony satisfies you that Mr. J. Allen Smith, the president of the land, loan, and improvement company, had notice of the claim of Rachel Rapley and her husband, and that Mr. Klugh was secretary of the company, and was present at that meeting when the resolution was passed that they would convey this land to Mr. Klugh and Mr. J. Allen Smith, without warranty, that would be sufficient to put him upon notice, and it was sufficient to charge him with notice." This presents a delicate question, and one that has enlisted very great consideration by the courts of the country. The judge, under the issues, did not feel called upon to charge in the form the appellant presented his requests; conceiving, very justly, that, if he charged upon the requests in the exact form in which they were framed, he would be charging upon an abstract question of law in no wise connected with the issues made squarely in this case, and this no judge is required to do. Hence, he framed his charge to apply to the issues involved here, and we are now prepared to pass upon their consonance with the law. In the separate opinion of the present chief justice of this court in the case of Bank v. Anderson, 28 S. C. 150, 5 S. E. 343, he points out very clearly the injustice of imputing to a bank the knowledge possessed by one of its mere stockholders. It is true, the question there involved was the discount by a bank of a negotiable instrument before maturity, in the ordinary course of its business. In such a case it would be unquestionably a great wrong, and prove a serious blow to the business interests of the country, to hold otherwise. That case does not, however,—as it ought not to have done, for such question was not there involved,—pretend to touch the question of the effect of such knowledge by a stockholder of a bank when a meeting is called to pass upon a question, and he is present and takes part in the solution of that question. So much for a stockholder, under the hypothetical case. All corporations act by agencies. Among these agencies are the officers. We apprehend the law makes a distinction between the mere stockholders and the officers of a corporation. The responsibility of the latter is, and ought to be, more stringent. So we see in the later case of Akers v. Rowan, 33 S. C. 451, 12 S. E. 165, where there was an effort to bring home to the bank a knowledge of one Robbins' insolvency through the knowledge thereof imputed to the solicitor of the bank, this distinction is recognized; for in this case the general rule was recognized that notice to the agent is notice to the principal. The bank was exonerated from the responsibility of the knowledge of its agent,—solicitor and director,—because such knowledge of its agent was not acquired while engaged in business for the bank, but was acquired while acting as the solicitor of Robbins himself; thus creating an exception to the general rule. And this exception was sustained by one of the highest authorities in this country, which is fully set forth in that opinion. We have, therefore, to begin with, this as a general rule: that all the knowledge of an agent is imputed to his principal; and of course there are exceptions to this as to all general rules. A recent writer, as set forth in the note to the case of Bank v. Chase, 39 Amer. Rep. 331, has thus set forth the exceptions: "(1) What the agent has forgotten entirely, or may have forgotten during the agency; (2) what he could not tell his principal, e. g. professional confidences; (3) facts which the previous conduct of the agent makes it certain he will conceal." In the case at bar it was admitted that Mr. J. Allen Smith was the president of the corporation, the land, loan, and improvement company, and that the defendant, (appellant,) Mr. Klugh, was its secretary. It was charged that Mr. Smith knew of Rapley's claim to and actual possession of these two acres while he was negotiating, in behalf of his corporation, with Mr. Gillespie, for the purchase of the "R. H. Wardlaw Homestead;" and testimony was introduced on this issue. It was proved that by a resolution of the corporation, the land, loan, and improvement company, after its purchase from Gillespie, the sale of such lands to said Smith and Klugh were directed to be made without warranty of title; and that Mr. Klugh was present as secretary at that meeting of the corporation, and recorded such resolution on its minutes; and, further, that said corporation did actually convey said lands to them in pursuance of such resolution. Wherefore, when the judge made his charge quoted above, he addressed himself to an enunciation of the law applying to the state of facts bearing on these issues; and, after reflection, we are not dissatisfied with his conclusion. The exceptions are therefore overruled.

Nor are we dissatisfied with the action of the judge as complained of in the nineteenth exception. The appellant had requested him to charge, in his sixth request, "that notice to J. Allen Smith of the plaintiff's claim, before he and this defendant purchased said land, was not notice to this defendant; and, if he purchased without notice, the plaintiff cannot recover;" to which the judge replied: "That is, if it was just the individual notice to J. Allen Smith, I charge you that." From these words, as quoted, the judge pointed out a difference in notice to J. Allen Smith as an individual and as president of the corporation. It seems to us that, under the principles of law announced in the branch of this opinion just preceding that now under consideration, this charge of the judge was, if anything, too favorable to the defendant, (appellant.)

Exceptions 20 and 21 relate to the judge's refusal to charge defendant's seventh request, which was "that the plaintiff must, by testimony, make the location of the land claimed sufficiently plain to enable the court to have the same located, and its judgment carried out, should there be a judgment for the plaintiff, and, if this is not done, the plaintiff cannot recover." The response of the judge was in these words: "As a general proposition of law, that is true; but the question of location is a question of fact for you, and you must determine whether or not this land in dispute has been sufficiently located to enable the plaintiff to recover in this action. If it has, why, the court will certainly carry out its judgment, if you find that state of facts." Thus it appears that the judge was careful not to invade the province of the jury in their duty, under the law, without any expression of opinion thereon by the judge, to find what facts were established by the preponderance of the testimony. We are unable to find any error here. The exception is overruled.

Lastly, we will consider the twenty-third and twenty-fourth exceptions, which relate to so much of the judge's charge as refers to exemplary damages. The judge charged: "Now, as to the question of damages, in case you come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, she is entitled to recover damages from the defendant for the withholding the possession of these lands; and you are to take into consideration the value of the timber cut upon the land, and also the use of the land for the time the party was kept out of it; and you will take into consideration, also, whether or not the cutting of the timber off of this land has damaged the plaintiff. You will give her such damages as will compensate her for being deprived of her land in its cultivation; and if you conclude that she was willfully and wrongfully turned out of her land, then, if you conclude to do so, you can give her such damages as you think she is entitled to, but not unless she was turned out of her land wantonly, willfully, and maliciously, and recklessly." (Italics ours.) This court held, in Bonham v. Bishop, 23 S. C. 105: "A verdict is the compound result of the legal instructions given to the jury by the court, and of their findings of fact applied to the legal principles laid down for their guidance; and if there is error in the instructions, then there is necessarily error in the judgment." We are still satisfied with this enunciation of the law, but we apprehend that, if it is apparent from the case here presented that a slight error by the judge in his charge has in no way contributed to the verdict of the jury, in the interest of the proper administration of justice in our courts such a slight error of the judge should not be allowed to vitiate the judgment by having an order entered for a new trial. This court owes it as a contribution to the public welfare that is so largely conserved by having justice administered in our courts with reasonable speed, and, when conclusions are reached by judgments therein, that light, slight, and unimportant errors which may have been committed during the trial of a cause shall be esteemed as cured by the verdict. The Code of this state inculcates this doctrine, and the wisdom derived from long experience sanctions it. We are aware that in the cases of Spellman v. Railroad Co., 35 S. C. 475, 14 S. E. 947; Samuels v. Railroad Co., 35 S. C. 493, 14 S. E. 943; and Cobb v. Railroad Co., 37 S. C. 194, 15 S. E. 878,—this court has endeavored to lay down a general rule to govern cases of exemplary damages, by requiring that the complaint must contain allegations to support such exemplary damages. We still maintain the doctrines there set forth; but in the case at bar it is so manifest that the charge of the judge, a portion of which—accidentally, no doubt—contravened in a measure these doctrines, has really produced no mischief, that we are unable to give our consent, for this slight omission by the judge, to an order for a new trial. In the case of Woody v. Dean, 24 S. C. 503, this court held: "An erroneous instruction to the jury, which could have made no possible difference in their verdict, is not ground for a new trial." In the case at bar it was undisputed that defendant had taken possession of the land in question for three years; had cleared up one acre of timbered land lying within the limits of the town of Abbeville; had sawed up, and used for his own purposes, much of said timber; that for firewood the timber was worth $1.50 a cord. The verdict only allowed $100 damages. We do not feel justified in granting a new trial for this slight error in the judge's charge, with the conclusion forced upon our minds that it in no wise contributed to the verdict rendered; and the exceptions must therefore be overruled.

Besides all this, we are not satisfied that the allegations of the complaint, properly construed, are insufficient to warrant the testimony as to the manner in which the plaintiff was ejected. Moreover, the testimony as to exemplary damages not being objected to when it was offered, the complaint, even if defective, might have been amended so as to correspond with the proof. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., and McGOWAN, J., concur.

CAMPBELL v. PATTON et al.

ACTION ON NOTE—PLEADING—ANSWER—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on a note, by the indorsee against the payee and joint makers, where the complaint does not allege that plaintiff purchased the note before maturity, an answer of one of the joint makers, alleging that he was induced to sign the note by fraudulent conspiracy of his comaker and the payee, constitutes a good defense, since plaintiff's failure to aver a purchase before maturity relieved such joint maker of the necessity of alleging notice.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; R. F. Armfield, Judge.

Action by James M. Campbell against P. F. Patton and others to recover on a note. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Patton appeals. Reversed.

Action tried at August term, 1893, of Buncombe superior court, before Armfield, J. The allegations of the complaint are as follows: "(1) That on the 10th day of July, 1890, the defendants P. F. Patton and Natt Atkinson executed their three promissory notes in writing, for the sum of two thousand and five hundred dollars each, payable, respectively, one, two, and three years, with interest from date at the rate of eight per centum per annum, payable semiannually, to the defendant C. E. Graham, and made payable to his order. (2) That before the commencement of this action the defendant C. E. Graham indorsed said notes, for full value, to the plaintiff. (3) That all of said notes are past due, and no part thereof has been paid, except the interest to January 10, 1893." The answer of the defendant Patton is as follows: "(1) That the allegations set forth in the first paragraph of the complaint he admits to be true. (2) That the allegations contained in paragraph 2 thereof are not of his own knowledge, nor has he information sufficient to form a belief in the truth thereof, and he therefore denies the same to be true. (3) That the allegations contained in the third paragraph thereof he admits to be true. For a further defense this defendant says: (1) That on or about the 10th day of July, 1890, or just prior thereto, the defendant Natt Atkinson approached this defendant, and represented to him that if he, this defendant, would join him, the said Atkinson, in purchasing a certain piece of land situated in the western portion of the city of Asheville, belonging to the defendant C. E. Graham, for the price of $9,000, he, the said Atkinson, could sell the same for a much greater sum, and led this defendant to believe that he had at that time arranged for selling the said land at a greatly advanced price, much in excess of the said sum of $9,000. (2) That induced by the representations so made by the said Atkinson, and having then great confidence in the said Atkinson, this defendant consented to join the said Atkinson in the purchase of the said land for the said sum of $9,000, and the notes which are the subject of this action were given for the balance of the purchase money for the said land. (3) That this defendant is informed and believes that at the time the said representations were so made to him by the said Atkinson as aforesaid, to the effect that the said Atkinson had already arranged to sell the said land, as is set forth in the first paragraph of this further defense, the said Atkinson had not obtained a purchaser for said land, nor had he arranged to sell the same as was represented by him, but that the said Atkinson was acting as the agent of the said C. E. Graham, the owner of the said land, and that they combined to cheat and defraud this defendant by inducing him to purchase said land at a price far in excess of its true value, to wit, five thousand dollars. (4) That, by the false and fraudulent representations and inducements of the said Atkinson and Graham made to this defendant as aforesaid, this defendant was induced to purchase said land, and to execute said notes. (5) That he is willing, ready, and able to cancel the deed made to him, so far as any interest was conveyed to him, and reconvey all interest that he may have acquired by reason of said sale to him. Wherefore, the defendant P. F. Patton prays judgment that the said notes be delivered up and canceled, that the plaintiff take nothing by his suit, that he recover his costs, and for such other and further relief as, under the circumstances of this case, the court may deem just." This answer was adjudged to be frivolous, and, the other defendants having failed to plead, judgment was granted against all the defendants according to the prayer of the complaint, and the defendant Patton appealed.

BURWELL, J. The answer of the defendant Patton avers that he was induced to sign the negotiable promissory notes sued on in this action by a fraudulent conspiracy between the payee, C. E. Graham, and his codefendant, Natt Atkinson. The allegations of fraud are not as definite and particular as the rules of pleading would probably require them to be made, but the answer certainly contains enough to relieve it from the charge of being frivolous. It seems intended to raise a serious question, and, when that appears, the courts will not readily decide such an answer to be frivolous. Erwin v. Lowery, 64 N. C. 321. If it was filed in good faith, and is not clearly impertinent, the defendant is entitled to have the facts alleged in it either admitted by demurrer or tried by a jury. Courts do not encourage the practice of moving for judgment upon the answer as being frivolous. Womble v. Fraps, 77 N. C. 198. But if we consider the motion for judgment in this action for that cause as intended to raise the issue of law that the matters therein alleged, if true, could not affect the plaintiff's right to recover, there was error in granting it, for what is therein alleged, if proved, would be a good defense to the notes, if they were held by Graham, the payee; and, if proved to the satisfaction of the jury on the trial of this cause, those facts so established will impose upon the plaintiff, who is the indorsee of Graham, the burden of establishing the fact that he is a bona fide purchaser for value, and without notice of the alleged fraud in the inception of the notes. Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 166; Cover v. Myers, 75 Md. 406, 23 Atl. 850, 32 Amer. St. Rep. 394, and note; Bank v. Burgwyn, 108 N. C. 63, 12 S. E. 952. If it had been averred in the complaint that the plaintiff had purchased the notes for value and before maturity, and that allegation had been admitted, or not properly denied, then it would have been incumbent on the defendant to allege and prove, not only a defense good against the payee and indorser, Graham, but also that the plaintiff indorsee had notice of that defense when he purchased them. The plaintiff, in his complaint, (paragraph 2,) does not allege that he purchased the notes before maturity, but only "before the commencement of this action." His failure to aver a purchase before maturity relieved the defendant of the necessity of making the allegation of notice, but if, on the trial, the pleadings being unchanged, the plaintiff satisfies the jury that he did purchase the notes for value before maturity, the burden of proof will again shift, and it will be incumbent on the defendant to prove that the plaintiff had notice of his defense. Bank v. Burgwyn, 110 N. C. 267, 14 S. E. 623. The second paragraph of the answer, while not strictly according to the requirements of the Code, (section 243,) seems to us a sufficient denial of the allegations of the second paragraph of the complaint. That denial was itself sufficient to make an issue. Error.

McADEN v. NUTT et al.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; R. F. Armfield, Judge.

Action by John H. McAden, executor, against R. T. Nutt and another. Judgment having been rendered for plaintiff, and execution issued thereon, defendants moved for an injunction to restrain further proceedings thereunder, and to have satisfaction of the judgment entered of record. The motion was denied, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walker & Cansler, for appellants. R. L. Haymore and A. E. Holton, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. We are unable to discover any error in the rulings of the court. The case is too plain to admit of discussion. Affirmed.

In re MEYERS' ESTATE.

ADMINISTRATION—RIGHT OF HUSBAND—COADMINISTRATOR.

1. The right to administer a deceased wife's estate being given a husband by Code, § 1376, in case she dies intestate, and by section 2166 in case she leaves a will without naming an executor, his right to letters of administration is not affected by the pendency of a contest over a will which named no executor.

2. A husband who has the right to administer his wife's estate may have another appointed coadministrator with him.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; R. F. Armfield, Judge.

Morris Meyers and Charles A. Webb were v.188.E.no.16—44

appointed by the clerk of court administrators of Sarah Ellick Meyers, the deceased wife of Morris Meyers. On application of legatees, the clerk revoked the letters of administration, and, the court affirming the order of revocation, Meyers and Webb appeal. Reversed.

Chas. A. Webb, for appellants. Jas. H. Merriman, for appellees.
